4502. Did the Government directors know, as a matter of fact, that notwithstanding their letter to the Government, loans on shares continued to be made?—They must have known it, because I think that you will find them all in the minutes; I think that they were all in the minutes.

4503. I do not think that Mr. Bendir's loan is?—Then there must have been a scroll minute about it.

4504. The next case upon which I will ask you is that of De Quadros and De Lima. Who was De Quadros?—De Quadros was an assistant to Ritchie, Stewart, and Company. De Lima I think was his uncle.

4505. On the 1st of September 1865 you discounted for those two persons a bill of 50,000 rupees. You could not have supposed that that was a trading transaction?—I do not know; Mr. De Lima I think was represented to me as a merchant.

4506. That was on the security of shares deposited; they were deposited at the time when the money was advanced?—Yes.

4507. That bill was renewed again, and was further renewed up to the 11th of April 1866?—Yes.

4508. Again on the 7th of July 1866 it was renewed by the full Board on security being given, and part payment, five Back Bay shares being deposited.—We had further security; we thought it perfectly safe at that time.

4509. Did you consult the directors with regard to the original loan on the 1st of September 1865. I want to know whether the directors did sanction that advance?—I see (looking at the minutes) that there was no meeting on the 1st of September 1865.

4510. If it was sanctioned it must have been before; the 1st of September was the date of the advance?—I see that there was a meeting on the 31st of August.

4511. Just see whether you can find his name there?—No, it is not there; it must have been on the very day when it was granted.

4512. Was not that an advance by yourself?—I suppose so; no doubt it was so.

4513. In advancing to a person in the position of De Quadros do you think that it was a legitimate banking operation?—No; I understood that he was very wealthy, but I cannot defend it as a legitimate operation, looking at it now.

4514. The money, I suppose, must have been wanted for the purpose of gambling in shares?—I expect so.

4515. My colleague has just added up the sums advanced on shares after June 1865; there were 27 lacs on which there was no loss.—Those were not fresh advances.

4516. (Major Innes.) They were fresh advances, every one of them. We have the books to show that. That statement is made out from the books, and if there is any mistake it can be pointed out.—I see what makes up the large amount, namely, the Asiatic Bank.

4517. (President.) We will now take the case of the Asiatic Bank, which is one of the most complicated affairs which we have had to investigate. First of all we will take you through the facts. On the 14th of May 1866 the Board granted a credit of 15 lacs on security?—Yes.

4518. Will you read the Board minute?—(Witness read as follows): "Read letter from Mr. Morrison, agent of the Asiatic Bank, requesting a loan of 15 lacs for that Corporation. Read also a list of securities he is prepared to deposit. Resolved, that the credit be granted upon his giving up all the securities stated in the list, and a written guarantee to deposit, immediately on receipt, the bills and Government paper now on the way from Calcutta and China."

4519. Was that Government paper ever deposited?—No.

4520. Why was it not received?—I do not think that it was ever deposited; it says, "Government paper now on the way from Calcutta and China."

4521. Did you ever call the attention of the directors to the fact that that Government paper was never deposited?—They called my attention to it almost daily. Mr. Lushington used to speak to me about it every day.

4522. The other securities in the list consisted of bank bills, did they not, namely, Commercial Bank, Oriental Bank, Ritchie, Stewart, and Company, National Bank, and so on, to the amount of 8,38,237 rupees?—That, no doubt, is a copy of the list.

4523. There were also acceptances of McIndoe, Rogers, and Company?—Yes, 8,50,000 rupees.

4524. There were shares also, 75 in the Mofussil Press and Ginning Company, 12 in the Bombay and Bengal Steam Ship Company, 28 in the Apollo Cotton Press Company, and 16 in the Colaba Press Company. Do you remember those?—I do not remember what they were.

4525. As to the 75 shares in the Mofussil Press and Ginning Company, do you know what became of those?—No.

4526. Was not there a heavy call upon them, and did you not refuse to pay the call, and were not they forfeited?—That is very likely.

4527. Then as to the 12 shares in the Bombay and Bengal Ship Company, was not there a heavy call on those?—Yes.

4528. And they were forfeited?—Yes.

4529. Three of those items were never realized?—No.

4530. The balance owing to the Bank of Bombay on the evening before the 14th of May 1866 was 4,36,391 rupees, was it not?—I do not remember.

4531. On the 25th of May 1866 you will find another Board minute; the credit was extended to 20 lacs, was it not, on aditional security of 10 lacs, advised by telegram to be on its way from London?—Yes.

4532. That 10 lacs was afterwards realized on the 11th of June 1866, was it not?—Yes.

4533. Can you tell me upon what grounds the Bank of Bombay in May 1866 entered into these large transactions for the purpose of keeping up the Asiatic Bank?—It was the wish to keep up all the banks; it was supposed that the failure of one would lead to the failure of a great many others, and would probably produce a run on the Bank of Bombay.

4534. You had allowed the credit, I think, to exceed 15 lacs on the evening before the 25th of May 1866; it was 15,74,594 rupees?—It looks like it from this (referring to a copy of the account).

4535. Will you turn to the Board minute of the 12th of June 1866, and read the entry?—(Witness read as follows): "Read letter from the agent of the Asiatic Bank stating that his Calcutta agent was unexpectedly drawn upon at short sight from China, and requesting that a credit of four lacs might be opened for him with Bank of Bengal by telegram as formerly. Resolved, that the credit be opened on condition that, besides the securities at present deposited with the bank, the agent here will give a lien on all remittances which may be received from England, China, and other branches of the bank."

4536. Was that a credit of four lacs in addition to the 20, or was it four lacs more than the balance then due?—It must have been four lacs in addition to the 20. I think so; I cannot remember at present.

4537. I want to know whether those four lacs were in addition?—I think not. I cannot bring to my recollection precisely what it is.

4538. The words are "besides the securities at present deposited." The securities then deposited consisted only of the remaining bank bills of the National Bank and the Chartered Bank; the others must all have been realized before, and there were the acceptances of McIndoe, Rogers, and Company?—Yes.

4539. On the evening before the 12th of June the balance was 6,35,422 rupees?—Yes.

4540. Will you read the Board minute of the 3d of July 1866 granting three lacs instead of four?—"Reported that the weekly committee had authorized the secretary to telegraph to the Bank of Bengal to advance the Asiatic Bank three lacs of rupees, if necessary (this amount will be paid back on the arrival of the China mail at Calcutta, as the agent will get five and a half lacs of rupees by it)."

4541. Is that three lacs more than the credit of twenty lacs?—I should think so, because there was to be the additional security of five and a half lacs upon the arrival of the China mail.

4542. How much did you get of that?—I do not remember how much was remitted; I think a very small portion of it.

4543. I think that you got 2,60,000 rupees, about the half of it. What was the balance on the evening of the 12th of July, when that cash credit came to an end?—About 11 or 12 lacs.

4544. The first cash credit terminated on the 13th of July, and a new arrangement was entered into extending the credit until the 1st of September?—Yes, I think so.

4545. Does not it appear clearly that you never received the Government paper?—Yes; we never got the Government paper to the best of my recollection.

4546. And that you did not get 2,30,000 rupees of the funds which were to come from China?—I do not recollect the amounts.

4547. It is proved by Mr. Steel and Mr. Baker?—I have no doubt that you have the facts.

4548. Before I enter upon the new cash credit, I want to ascertain how the old cash credit terminated. All your good securities were gone except one bill of the Chartered Mercantile Bank, and some shares of the Apollo Press Company; and notwithstanding that, the balance due to you on the evening before was nearly 12 lacs?—Yes, 12 lacs.

4549. Was not it therefore so managed that, the good securities not having been deposited, the Asiatic

Bank were in debt to that amount with an insufficient security?—They owed us 11,78,000 rupees, and we had only the security which you have mentioned; I suppose so.

4550. What good security was there, except the Chartered Mercantile Bank bill and the Apollo Press Company's shares?—There was nothing which could be really called good convertible security.

4551. Do you know what the acceptances of McIndoe, Rogers, and Company really fetched; 8,50,000 rupees of their bills fetched only 63,000 rupees?—The bills would not fetch much, but the securities against them would fetch considerably more. The securities against them could not have been sold; I think that it was four or five lacs.

4552. Was not that the exact position, that at the end of that cash credit the good securities were gone, and that the Asiatic Bank was in debt to you 12 lacs?—Yes; I have no doubt that the figures are correct.

4553. How did that state of things arise?—Because we did not get the security which had been promised to us.

4554. That is your reason?—That is the principal reason I should think, I do not know of any other.

4555. As you realized every security ought you not to have retired so much of the cash credit against it, and to have reduced the cash credit by that amount, and not to have allowed them to go on drawing?—Certainly.

4556. Did you do that in the case of this cash credit?—To the best of my recollection I did. After we found that we could not get the securities which they had promised Mr. Morrison came before the directors again, and we came to a new arrangement.

4557. Was not the position this, that on the 13th of July you would have been glad to take almost any security to secure your 12 lacs?—No; I do not think that we should have taken any security; we should have taken security, but we did not think that the position of the Asiatic Bank was so bad.

4558. Had you not a warning with regard to trusting to their representations before you entered into this new cash credit?—Not that I remember.

4560. Then came a new cash credit of the 13th of July. Just look at the Board minute of that date, and read it.—There is Mr. Morrison's application first, and then the resolution of the Board, as follows:—"Resolved that this credit of 20 lacs be continued till 1st September, and that the three lacs due to the bank from B. H. Cama's estate be not drawn until the arrival of the five lacs expected by the trustees from China, on the following conditions: That the agent here give the bank a lien on all remittances from head office and branches, and that the trustees of B. H. Cama give the bank a lien on their expected remittance from China, and that any further securities which the trustees may hand the Asiatic Bank are to be handed to the Bank of Bombay."

4561. Was not the effect of that this,—that a large dividend of B. H. Cama's estate of 3,33,000 rupees was allowed to be retained by the Asiatic Bank, although the Bank of Bombay was entitled to draw it out?—Yes.

4562. I know that no loss has been incurred, but was not it running a very great risk if the Asiatic Bank had failed?—Cama's trustees would have paid that.

4563. You were one of the trustees?—Yes.

4564. I should very much doubt whether you would have been entitled to do so after entering into such an arrangement as this, just to accommodate the Asiatic Bank.—The Asiatic Bank, I suppose, was in that position that unless we had done so we should have had to advance another three lacs, which would have been placing us in just the same position.

4565. What were the securities deposited?—There is first a draft on the Chartered Mercantile Bank of one lac; there is then McIndoe Rogers and Company's promissory note of eight lacs; then the Bombay Coast and River Steam Navigation Company's shares, three lacs; then a lien on funds now on the way from Calcutta, two lacs; then a lien on Java Guilders at Calcutta, and to be remitted to Bombay, three lacs. Then Maud M. Heerjee and Company's promissory note to Premchund Roychund 2,56,000 rupees; then 10½ Apollo Press Company's shares 2,25,000 rupees; then 84 Iron Ship Company's shares, 68,000 rupees; then a bill on B. F. Cama, Son's and Co., 50,000 rupees.

4566. The draft on the Chartered Mercantile Bank was realized. McIndoe Rogers and Company's bills for eight lacs realized 63,852 rupees?—It might have been so, but the property could not have been sold, or it would have realized more than that.

4567. The Bombay Coast and River Steam Navigation Company have turned out well. Then the next are a lien on funds now on the way from Calcutta, two lacs; and a lien on Java Guilders at Calcutta, and to be remitted to Bombay, three lacs, that makes five lacs. Did you ever get those five lacs?—I do not think that we did. I do not remember how much we got from Calcutta.

4568. You never got a shilling of that. Did not Mr. Morrison represent to you that he had received a telegram that those were available in Calcutta, and could be drawn for by him?—I think so. I think the amount was seven lacs.

4569. No, it was five or five and a half lacs. Have you read the evidence as to that?—No, I have not seen all the evidence.

4570. Mr. Morrison failed to give you those sums?—I believe that he said that he misinterpreted the telegram.

4571. Did you ask to see the telegram?—I think that we saw it; I could not say for certain that we did see the telegram. I saw some of his telegrams with the transaction above the cipher.

4572. Can you say that you saw this telegram before you acted upon it?—I cannot; I do not know that he said that he had a telegram at the time when he wrote his letter; it must have been after this.

4573. He produced a telegram, and said that he had misunderstood it and had read "pounds" for "dollars."—Yes, that was his explanation.

4574. Have you read the evidence of Mr. Steel, who happened to be the agent in Calcutta of the Asiatic Bank at that time?—Yes, I read his evidence in the newspapers.

4575. Mr. Steel said this: "I can explain Mr. Morrison's statement, that he had been misled by a telegram received from Calcutta, in cipher, as to funds which he expected; it was owing to our code of signals. There was no word in it to represent dollars, and I used the one for pounds instead, and advised 70,000*l.* as coming by the French steamer. In this instance there should have been no mistake, as I told him in the last part of the telegram that he might draw for one and a half lacs; even if he had been misled, the last part of it ought to have corrected him; he was only authorized to draw for one and a half lacs. I had used the same word on former occasions. I do not think that it had ever been misunderstood before." Did the bank directors read that telegram or get a translation of it?—I know that we had some of the telegrams. I do not know whether they had seen that one.

4576. At the termination it was said that Mr. Morrison was only to draw for a lac and a half?—They could not have seen that telegram.

4577. Do you think that it was a prudent way of doing business to advance such a large amount without looking at the telegram?—I believe that the directors had perfect confidence that Mr. Morrison was acting in good faith with them.

4578. Had you perfect confidence in Mr. Morrison too?—Yes.

4579. He had deceived you twice before?—On each occasion he was had up by the directors and he gave them explanations with which the directors were satisfied.

4580. M. and M. Heerjee and Company's promissory note for 2,56,000 rupees realized 68,000 rupees, did it not?—There is an attempt being made to make Cowasjee Jehangeer a partner in that firm, and if so it will be paid in full.

4581. The Apollo Press Company's shares were good securities?—Yes.

4582. The Bank of Bombay afterwards insisted upon additional security; they first insisted upon the remittances from the head office and branches?—Yes.

4583. That was already granted to them in a previous cash credit. Was any assignment made of those remittances?—There was an assignment by which Mr. Morrison engaged to give the remittances if they came, but unfortunately they never came except one from London; the dividend from B. H. Cama's estate was realized.

4584. On the 23rd of August 1866 by a Board minute it appears that the directors took Mr. Morrison to task for his failure to deposit the security of five lacs, which was the only substantial security?—He offered some additional security (witness reads from Board minutes) "To save the Bank of Bombay he offered to give additional security to that already given. Cash on mail day, 23d, two lacs. In Calcutta, proceeds of Government paper and Bank of Bengal shares sent there for sale, 1½ lacs. Stock in trade and goodwill of the business of Rogers and Company, chemists, &c. 3½ lacs. To be received from Shaporjee Dhunjeebhoy and Jewajee Manockjee fully secured by property, two lacs. Claims on Cursetjee Furdonjee, eight lacs (estimated dividend of four annas in the rupee), two lacs. Claim against Rustomjee and Sorabjee Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy, two lacs. Total 13 lacs." I think that we got something more on some other day.

4585. Were the directors satisfied with Mr. Morrison's explanation as to this telegram?—Yes.

4586. Did they get it deciphered and look at it?—I do not remember whether they did or not.

4588. Of the two lacs cash on the mail day the bank received 1,85,000 rupees. — The difference would be the exchange. Mr. Morrison represented to you that he had sent 1,50,000 rupees worth of Government paper and Bank of Bengal shares for sale; did you ever get the proceeds?—We did not get much at any rate.

4589. Did he tell you that the Government paper was already pledged to the extent of 70,000 rupees?—Not that I remember.

4590. Did he tell you that the balance was already appropriated by the Calcutta agent for liabilities there?—No.

4591. We have examined Mr. Steel about it and he gives us that information. It never was received by the Bank of Bombay?—No; at least, if it was received it must have been a very small part.

4592. Did you get the stock in trade and goodwill of McIndoe, Rogers, and Company?—Yes; I do not know what that sold for.

4593. It is put down at 3,50,000 rupees, but it has been sold for only 50,446 rupees. Then there is the promissory note of Shapoorjee Dhunjeebhoy and Jewajee Manockjee two lacs?—That was paid.

4594. There were the claims against Rustomjee and Sorabjee for two lacs, which realized 34,000 rupees, and there was another most extraordinary security which you took, namely, a first lien upon some unraised capital?—Yes; but we never looked upon that as a security; in fact, Mr. Morrison said that he could not give it without the consent of the head office.

4595. Or of the shareholders. There are several bills; the bill of Dady Nesserwanjee for 10,000 rupees realized 1,455 rupees?—The property of Dady Nesserwanjee can be realized, because there are only three creditors, and there is a large property; he has been offered 1,60,000 rupees for it, which would give to the creditors nearly eight annas per rupee.

4596. Let us now see what was the effect of granting the second cash credit. You first of all risked the dividend on B. H. Cama's estate. I consider it a very serious risk, although it fortunately did not terminate in loss. Your best item of security was the cash at Calcutta, was it not?—Yes.

4597. You never got that?—No.

4598. You relied upon Mr. Morrison's telegram, did you not?—Yes.

4599. Without looking at it?—Without looking at it.

4600. And you were deceived?—We were.

4601. Do you think that Mr. Morrison was deceived?—From what Mr. Steel says, I do not think that he could be.

4602. This cash credit terminated on the 1st of September 1866?—Yes.

4603. Just look at the account on the evening of the 1st of September; the balance due to the Bank of Bombay was 16,52,828 rupees, was it not?—Yes.

4604. What authority had you for allowing them to go on drawing after that? There is none in the minutes.—I must have had authority, or I should not have allowed them to go on drawing.

4605. What authority had you to allow them to increase their debt after that?—It was to be increased to 20 lacs.

4606. But the cash credit was only to be extended to the 1st of September, and you had allowed them to draw 16 lacs and odd, and you allowed them to draw after the 1st of September up to nearly 20 lacs. In the next month, when the Asiatic Bank went into liquidation, the debt was 19,66,000 rupees?—Yes.

4607. What authority had you after the 1st of September to allow them to overdraw?—We were to give them credit up to 20 lacs.

4608. But they had not availed themselves of it up to the 1st of September; why did you not close the account then?—I supposed that if they had not taken it they were entitled to it up to 20 lacs.

4609. They were not entitled to it after the 1st of September.—I cannot give an explanation; but I had given orders to the ledger keeper that Mr. Morrison was entitled to draw to the extent of 20 lacs, and I believe that I was justified in doing so.

4610. Did you let the directors know that Mr. Morrison was drawing after the 1st of September?—I must have done so, because they took particular interest in that account. Mr. Lushington will tell you that he was very often speaking about it.

4611. It resulted in a loss very differently estimated. I believe that there is a dead loss of 3,50,000 rupees, although a great deal has been realized.—It has not all been realized.

4612. Everything has been sold now which is tangible.—But I do not think that they have sold a property which is a very large one; and I know that Mr. Rogers sold that place for 17 lacs of rupees, so that it must have realized more than 60,000 rupees. He did not get the money.

4613. We must now come to another transaction. Do you remember the application of Dossabhoy Dhunjeebhoy in the year 1865? Who was Dossabhoy Dhunjeebhoy?—Premchund's manager.

4614. On the 27th May 1866 he had 30,000 rupees, and on the 31st August 1865 he had 70,000, making one lac. There is no responsibility resting upon you with regard to those amounts, they were approved by the board; it was to be an advance upon approved security. Those are the words of the minute.—Yes.

4615. No security was lodged at the date of the advance, and not until the 16th of June afterwards.—

You very often find that the dates when they were entered in the security department, were not the dates when the securities were received, as we had a very great press of business.

4616. We have nothing safer than the bank's books to go upon. If the securities were entered as received on a certain day when they had been received before, they would be entered erroneously; will you undertake to say that these securities were deposited before?—No, but in many instances I should say that that was the case.

4617. I want to know how it was that until the 16th of June no securities were deposited for an advance which you made on the 27th of May?—I cannot give you any more information; we should take his promissory note.

4618. Did Premchund make it smooth with you?—No.

4619. Dossabhoy Dhunjeebhoy was Premchund's manager?—Yes; but I considered him a man of some considerable importance.

4620. Did you give him any extra credit because he was Premchund's manager?—No.

4621. Then you lent him 70,000 rupees on the 31st of August on the security of shares which were not deposited till the 6th of September, that just shows how very irregular the practice was.—It was utterly impossible for me to say. I simply saw that a bill was to be taken, and so many shares deposited.

4622. Do you remember his applying to be allowed to sell his 25 Bank of Bombay shares, and five Port Canning's which he deposited as security, and buy Back Bay shares with the proceeds?—I think that I do recollect it.

4623. He was allowed to do so?—We took one security instead of the other.

4624. There was no loss upon this transaction, but do you consider that a legitimate operation for a bank to enter into?—I considered, from the position of the Bank of Bombay then, that anything which would improve our position was legitimate.

4625. It was in fact gambling; you entered into a speculation with Dossabhoy Dhunjeebhoy to pay your debt by gambling with the securities which he had lodged with you.—It was not gambling.

4626. In this case I admit you did gain 4,700 rupees.—We knew that there was a certainty of our gaining.

4627. Was not the bank by doing that a party to a speculation in shares; did not the bank directors themselves become a party to it?—No.

4628. Were not the shares to be bought with the view of a rise, by which means the money would be gained?—Yes.

4629. He said, "If you will let me sell those securities and invest them in something else, I shall make such a sum of money as will partly pay you off"?—Yes.

4630. You acceded to that, and let him take out his securities, and invest them in this speculation. I admit that you gained 4,716 rupees, but do you think that a proper transaction?—It would not be so in ordinary times.

4631. But do you think that extraordinary times justify people in doing what is wrong?—I do not think that it was wrong; but it would certainly not be justifiable in an ordinary time; we were just liquidating at the time, and endeavouring to get the best that we could.

4632. There was another similar transaction with Roychund Deepchund; you allowed him to do just the same thing?—Yes; but it was unfortunately not so good a time.

4633. You did not lose by it; but I want to know the system, and how you could have allowed it?—I think that those were the only two instances.

4634. Is it not extraordinary that, in the only two instances in which you did, one of the parties was Premchund's manager and the other his father?—No, if anybody else had asked it, I daresay we should have done the same thing.

4635. Are you able to explain why you gave the privilege to these two persons and not to others?—If others had asked for it, and if we had thought that we were more likely to make by it, particularly when we had so many bad debts, we should have done it.

4636. Do you think that that was proper banking?—No, certainly not; in fact we were not banking then.

4637. There are a few more loans which I wish to ask you about; take the case of Gubbay, on the 4th of October 1865 you lent him 2,50,000 rupees?—Yes.

4638. You had no securities at that date; there were 53 United Victoria and Colaba shares deposited in March 1866, and there has been a loss of 53,256 rupees in that transaction; can you explain how you came to grant that cash credit?—No, I cannot.

4639. That is a very large advance, and the bank was then in a very bad way.—We thought that things were getting better then.

4640. You granted it without security?—Yes; I believe that Mr. Gubbay could have got it anywhere.

4641. What has become of Mr. Gubbay, why has he not paid the whole?—I believe that the directors compromised it afterwards.

4642. Hormusjee Cursetjee had two cash credits; on the 28th March 1866 he had 20,600 rupees, on the 15th April 1866, 15,000 rupees; security was deposited on the 28th of March, and there is a loss of 25,000 rupees.—I forget who he was.

4643. The two loans together were only 35,600 rupees, and there is a loss of 25,000 rupees upon them; that was in April 1866, when one would have thought that your eyes were open to the value of every share which you took?—He is not a new man, I think.

4644. Those are the only two loans outstanding against him?—But he must have been a customer before; I do not recollect his name at this moment; I know now who he was, he was the son of Cursetjee something; he was a very wealthy man.

4645. You were almost in liquidation at that moment?—Yes; but at the same time we wanted to make as much money as we could in order to pay expenses.

4646. One would have thought that with all your experience at that time you would have taken care to be secure?—I do not think that we could have had a better name in Bombay than that.

4647. You have lost an enormous proportion of that loan?—It is all realized.

4648. Who valued these securities when you took them?—I do not know. I suppose that I should do it myself; I should myself take the market price at that time, because they were not very high then.

4649. I want to know how this enormous loss arose?—The man failed like other people; that is the only reason which I can give.

4650. Do you recollect the Imperial Banking and Trading Company?—Yes.

4651. They had a bill discounted for three lacs on the 28th of March 1865, and another for two lacs on the 30th of March 1865; one lac of that was paid off, and there was a renewal for one lac on the 11th of October 1865. On the 1st of March 1866 they had 2,60,000 rupees.—That would be a renewal too; that was the balance, I think.

4652. You obtained a decree for that amount from the High Court?—Yes.

4653. You had no security for any one of those advances?—No; but I never granted any of them; it must have been a renewal. I renewed when I got a certain sum down. I took what trouble I could to get it in, and we got a judgment, and thought that it would be paid in full.

4654. There were two bills, one of Doongersey Gopajee, the Muccadum of Merwanjee Framjee Panday, and the other of Dhunjeebhoy Pestonjee, his nephew; the one for 2½ lacs, and the other for 2 lacs?—Yes.

4655. Both these loans were subsequently transferred to the names of Premchund and Mayabhoy Premabhoy, who gave you a promissory note instead?—Yes.

4656. Are you sure that Back Bay shares were deposited on that occasion?—I am certain.

4657. These men had 10 Back Bay shares, but were they transferred?—Yes, I am certain that they were; in fact we had the Back Bay shares till the very last moment when they were sold.

4658. Were these transfers brought before the directors?—Yes, they were brought before Mr. Hannay, I think.

4659. And at this time did he prefer Premchund to the Imperial Banking and Trading Company?—We did not know anything about the Imperial Banking and Trading Company; we only knew that there were two names. I now learn that the transaction was one belonging to the Imperial Banking and Trading Company. We had two names, Dhunjeebhoy Pestonjee and Doongersey Gopajee.

4660. The loss has been enormous, namely, 2,80,000 rupees. I will now come to the case of Pestonjee Nowrojee Khras, who was he?—He was shroff to Ritchie, Stewart, and Company.

4661. You advanced him on the 18th of April 1865, 25,000 rupees, and on the 26th of August 1865, 50,000 rupees; there has been a loss of more than 40,000 rupees by him.—I do not know that the securities are realized.

4662. How came you to grant the first advance to him?—I do not remember.

4663. Was not he recommended by Premchund?—Yes, or very likely Mr. Tracey. I do not remember who recommended him.

4664. For the second advance shares were deposited, were they not?—Yes.

4665. Do not you recollect that second transaction of 50,000 rupees; do not you recollect Premchund speaking about it?—No; he might have done so, but I do not remember it.

4666. Do you not remember his saying that he did not want his name mentioned?—No.

4667. Is not that your handwriting (handing Exhibit A 112 to the witness)?—Yes, I see that I said so.

4668. You said that Premchund did not want his name mentioned?—Yes; I do not know why he did not.

4669. You wrote to Mr. Tracey to ask him about Pestonjee?—I do not know why Premchund said so. I did not know that I had ever written. Mr. Tracey recommended Pestonjee Nowrojee Khras.

4670. It did not excite your curiosity, and you did not ask Premchund why he did not want his name mentioned?—No; I do not remember his saying so to me, but he must have said so, because I have written it.

4671. You recollect the loans to Rustomjee and Sorabjee Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy?—Yes.

4672. Some of those took place in your time?—Yes. I think that I gave two lacs to Rustomjee.

4673. About the 15th December 1865 you advanced him 2,10,000 rupees; how came that to be granted to him?—He had become liable for all Sorabjee's loans, 2,12,000 rupees; he was liable to the bank for 12 lacs when you gave him this cash credit?—Yes; I distinctly remember the application being made to me, and I went to Mr. Hannay with it, and asked him what should be done (I forget whether Rustomjee was a director of the bank or not); he said that he thought that he ought to be compelled to sell his bills, but that it was perfectly safe to give the money to him.

4674. What was the case which he made?—I think that exchange was bad at the time, and he wanted an advance in the hopes that in a fortnight or three weeks the exchange would improve, and that he would be able to sell on his London correspondents.

4675. Was not a distinct promise given that the amount was to be paid in 17 days?—It was a certain number of days, I think.

4676. Is not that your writing? (handing Exhibit A 39. to the witness.)—Yes.

4677. "The present is only for 17 days, which will positively expire on the 29th, without let or hindrance. Let him have it. R. H." You acted upon that.—Yes.

4678. Do you not remember that under the old Act there was a distinct prohibition against over-drafts being allowed?—I do not remember whether there was a distinct prohibition or not. I know how that was got over.

4679. Was it ever got over under the old Act?—Yes; it was got over in this way, that a man got a loan instead of over-drawing his account. Say that I wanted 10,000 rupees, they would debit a loan account.

4680. And then they would get security?—No, not immediately.

4681. Not under the old Act?—No; of course it was to very small amounts, but that was the way in which it was done.

4682. It was illegal if there was that system.—I believe that that is also the practice in London.

4683. Did not a regular system of over-drafts spring up in the year 1866?—No, not more than before.

4684. There was also a provision in the original Act 10 of 1863 in the Schedule B. preventing over-drafts, was there not, but which was struck out in the Legislative Council?—I did not know that, but I know that as it was passed there was nothing of that sort in it.

4685. These are all memoranda relating to over-drafts in the year 1866, (handing Exhibit A 31. and A 32. to the witness.)—These are Mr. De Ga's slips. The Asiatic Bank ought never to have been an over-draft, and it ought to have been put in the credit ledger.

4686. Were not there at different times estimates made of the position of the bank?—Yes.

4687. The Government directors in their letter of 31st March 1866 say, We beg further to report that the total amount of loans and discounts outstanding on the 30th December at both the head office and branches was Rs. 381 lakhs, that out of this Rs. 163 lakhs are overdue, and that 30 lakhs have after a careful and impartial scrutiny, been set down as the amount of the probable eventual losses. From the balance sheet, a copy of which is annexed, it will be observed the bank will, after allowing for all losses, and after having paid a half-year's dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, be possessed of about three lakhs in excess of its capital," that is to say, assuming the capital to be properly invested. How was that "careful scrutiny" conducted?—I made out a list of all loans and securities, including every rupee which was out at the head office, and the same at the branches.

4688. That was in July 1865?—That was the first list, and the next one was made out in the same way at the end of the next half-year, and each director took it and went carefully over it; they were I think for a week or ten days over it, and each gave his own opinion, and they were very close, they were within two or three lakhs.

4689. Did they examine you about every item?—No, but they looked at the amounts and the security, and considered the position of each man at that time.

4690. How did they come to a conclusion, supposing that they differed; had they regular meetings to consider the state of the bank?—Yes, three of them I think went over the list, and discussed the position of each man.

4691. The Government directors did it?—Yes, and I think that the commercial directors were there.

4692. Did they take the value of the shares at the price at which they were on the 31st of March 1866; or did they take it on the 30th of December previous?

25 Nov. 1868.

—They must have taken it on the 30th of December previous, because there was no valuation on the 30th of March ; they proceeded on the previous half-year's account.

4693. Then subsequently there was another valuation ?—There was a valuation every half-year.

4694. But there was a subsequent valuation by a committee of the bank, was there not, which very much increased the amount ?—Yes ; by a committee appointed by the Government. The bank directors estimated that all the reserve and profit and loss was gone, about 30 lacs, and also 50 lacs of capital. The Government appointed a committee, and they added 34 lacs to that amount, making 84 lacs of capital, and that report was sent in to the Government.

4695. How did the Government directors' committee value the securities ?—At the lowest value of the day.

4696. What did the other committee do ?—They took a more unfavourable view of the return of insolvent estates, and also the value put upon some landed property.

4697. What was your opinion of that valuation of 30 lacs on the 30th of December 1865 ?—As far as I could judge I thought that it was right ; we were in a state of great uncertainty as to the previous half-year as to how things would turn out.

4698. Were you not awake at that time to the whole rottenness of this share mania ?—No, I was not.

4699. Were not the Government directors either at their subsequent valuation ?—No.

4700. Did they ever hope that any of those ginning, and spinning, and cotton cleaning companies would turn out well ?—They were very good ; they were what were wanted, but too many of them were started at one time.

4701. (Major Innes.) The report which the committee, consisting of Mr. Harrison and Mr. Hunter and another gentleman, sent in, was less favourable than the other estimate which had been sent in immediately before ?—Yes, by 34 lacs.

4702. Was any action taken upon that by the Government of Bombay in the shape of writing to the bank to make inquiries ?—No, I do not think that there was any further reference. The report was sent in by the bank to the Government, and I think that there was a letter from the Government afterwards, stating that they thought that the report was satisfactory.

4703. Another estimate was afterwards sent in by the bank to the Government, was there not ?—Yes, in the beginning of 1867.

4704. That was still more unfavourable ?—Yes ; that left, I think, very little more than half the capital.

4705. Was any explanation required from the bank about it ?—No ; it was proposed that the capital should be reduced one half.

4706. It was accepted ?—It was accepted.

4707. Was there no inquiry made as to whether it was not too favourable ?—No.

4708. It was accepted without any inquiry after all the mistakes which had been made before ?—Yes.

4709. And no letter was received by the bank ?—Not that I remember.

4710. With respect to the examination about Premchund, I did not quite catch what you said with reference to the sale of the jewels, when Sir Charles Jackson said that they had realized 240,000 rupees ?—I said that they could have been sold for more, I think, in Bombay.

4711. Do you think so when Bombay was so poor ?—Yes ; a good many people could have bought jewels.

4712. I thought that the losses in Bombay had been so great that they could hardly have afforded to buy such jewels there ?—There was plenty of money in Bombay.

4713. Were you secretary at the time ?—No ; the jewels have been sold since I came home.

4714. What was the exact meaning of what you wrote to Mr. Tracey when you said that you regretted that the three lacs of over-draft could not be included in the 25 lacs ?—I said that I could not put it in then.

4715. Do you know why you could not put it in ?—There were other sums which would have exhausted it ; there were hoondies in fact falling due.

4716. The explanation which you gave to Mr. Tracey about it was that the securities were not sufficient ?—Yes.

4717. Was that the reason, or was it that the sums which you had already authorized Premchund to draw against those 25 lacs would have exhausted the amounts ?—There were hoondies falling due, and they would have to be provided for out of that money. It was also partly because I did not think that the security was worth what it was represented to be worth.

4718. It was on that day that as you said the directors had taken up the case ?—Yes.

4719. You wrote to Mr. Tracey to say that on that very day the directors had decided to take up the case ?—Yes.

4721. Did you propose it ?—No ; Mr. Tracey himself asked me to take it out of the 25 lacs.

4722. Was that before the 22d or on the 22d ?—I do not know.

4723. What was the relevance of your reply to Mr. Tracey with regard to including the three lacs in the advance of twenty-five, when the advance of the twenty-five had been already exhausted, and the matter had not previously been before the directors ?—I should say, "He cannot have it out of the 25 lacs, it is all gone."

4724. What were those 25 lacs made to include ?—Our own hoondies, and an additional amount of eight lacs, the payment to the Asiatic Bank, and the payment to the Bank of Hindustan.

4725. What was the payment to the Bank of Hindustan ?—I do not know ; but that was one of his immediate demands.

4726. Were not the representatives of those banks present ?—Yes.

4727. Why should the claims of those banks on Premchund be brought forward for payment out of the 25 lacs any more than the claims of the Bank of Bombay ?—I do not know ; but they insisted upon the money being paid, and the other banks knew it well enough.

4728. Were these sums, which were to be paid to the Bank of Hindustan and others, sums which were intended to be paid before securities were lodged ?—They were included in the immediate requirements.

4729. When you wrote to Mr. Douglas and said that the three lacs were all that you intended to advance until the securities were received, did you intend that these other banks should be paid before the securities were lodged ?—No.

4730. Do you know that on the very day of that letter, namely, the 28th of April, you paid five or six lacs to those very banks, making nine lacs as the aggregate sum paid. That is to say, the three which you mentioned and six more, to two of these very banks ?—Yes.

4731. Ought those six lacs to have been paid ?—Yes ; it was an immediate demand.

4732. Before the securities were lodged ?—I had got securities.

4733. Had you got the jewels ?—No.

4734. (President.) You got the jewels the next day ?—Yes.

4735. (Major Innes.) The 28th was the day on which you wrote that letter to Mr. Douglas, and on that very day the bank debited Premchund's account with six lacs ?—I cannot say.

4736. Those 25 lacs were in no way intended to cover any of the existing debts of Premchund to the bank?—No; except to meet the hoondies as they fell due. At that time, I believe, we considered the other debts perfectly secure.

4737. In the list of the overdues, beyond three lacs which was sent to the Government, how were the sums owing by different people supposed to be entered. If any person owed more than the identical sum put against him in that list would it be shown anywhere else?—No; that list shows exactly what it is represented to show.

4738. Supposing that there are a good many parties to several bills all mixed up with each other, that for instance four of their names are on one bill and two or three on another, how would it be shown?—The whole amount ought to be shown, I think.

4739. The amount to Premchund is not shown anywhere?—No, it was not overdue.

4740. A considerable portion was overdue?—All over-dues are there.

4741. Where would the sums be got from?—From the different ledgers.

4742. Supposing that one bill was for two and a half lacs, and another for one and a half lacs, and another for two lacs, each being under three lacs, what certainty was there that a man who owed in that way altogether more than three lacs would be included in that list?—If it was overdue it would certainly be so. We had a daily list showing the bills falling due every day.

4745. Would there not be some uncertainty as to including in that list a case where a man owed on several bills, each of which might be under three lacs?—None whatever if it was past due.

4746. Would there be no tendency to pass over each bill which was under three lacs?—None whatever, because there was then a register showing what was past due.

4747. Every single bill in which a man was concerned was not put against that man's name?—Every bill would be. It was not a register requiring to be balanced like a debtor and creditor account.

4748. Then that list would be wrong if it did not include all sums which any man owed, when he owed above three lacs?—Yes, if it was past due.

4749. When a loan or cash credit was past due it was entered, and not merely a bill?—Yes.

4750. The bill to Khuttow Khemjee was not included?—He was only on one bill.

4751. You say that there would be no difficulty in preparing that list?—No; I do not think that the assistant who prepared it found any difficulty at all.

4752. You would be astonished if the whole of the outstandings against Atmaram Madhowjee, which were between 26 and 27 lacs, were not there?—If they were past due they ought to be there.

4753. Take the case of Atmaram Madhowjee, did it show anywhere that that sum of 26 or 27 lacs was outstanding?—I cannot say whether it included them, but it ought to have done so.

4754. How would you know that such a book as that general ledger was right?—I should trust to the assistant, or accountant, in making it up, it was not a book like a general ledger which you had to balance.

4755. And therefore, in order to ensure that it was right, greater care should be taken?—Yes.

4756. What was done in order to ensure that it was right?—A very good assistant looked after it. The only reason which I can give to you why Mr. Stuart did not get it in his time is that everything had gone into the past due ledger.

4757. You had to collect under the name of any party not merely those bills in which his was the principal, but also every bill in which he was a second party. Were these also brought in?—Certainly.

4758. When a man was in a transaction with Diver and others, would it be entered against his name?—I should think so; it ought to be. In making the statement I see that they have put Diver and others under the heading of "Financial Association," because at that time I had the Financial Association as debtors, and had got a judgment against both parties.

4759. Was that book which you have mentioned laid before the directors?—It must have been, because it was made up in the directors' room.

4760. You did not like to mention at the meeting the sum which Premchund owed; but could not that book have been shown to, and seen by, the directors without the bank managers knowing anything about it?—Certainly. Mr. Chapman says that he did not know, but he was a new director. He had only been a director for a day or two before, and he could not know; and the same is the case with Mr. Norman.

4761. With respect to Premchund's jewels; you thought that Hurryvullubdass was likely to be a purchaser of the jewels?—I did; not for himself but for the Guicowar.

4762. He spoke about it?—Yes; and I said, "Any that you want can be sent up to Baroda. I will send them up to our own agents.

4763. You were glad to hear it?—Certainly I was.

4764. Did you keep up the notion?—Yes, for a long time.

4765. Did you write to Hurryvullubdass?—No; I did not see him for a long time again. I was told that he had gone to Baroda, and I know that he did so. I did not see him for a very long time afterwards, until I found out that he had come back; and the answer which I got from him was that they were of rather a small class of stone.

4766. With regard to the meeting where you say that there was no document prepared, you state that you spoke to Mr. Lidderdale afterwards about the minute?—Yes.

4767. What did you do?—I showed him what I had written out from his dictation, and he revised it.

4768. That was a record of the proceedings?—Yes.

4769. What document was there as to an agreement binding the bank managers?—Mr. Kelly was to prepare that, but I never got it from him.

4770. Was it on precise or definite orders that you made each advance after that?—Yes; the directors arranged for eight lacs to be advanced up country.

4771. When any director gave you orders to make these advances, did you let him know that the bank managers had not bound themselves, or that the security had not been lodged?—Yes; they knew it. Mr. Lidderdale came in and was there most of the day.

4772. All that time the money was being advanced?—Yes.

4773. Did you yourself make any objection to it?—I forget; I may have done so; I think that it is very likely.

4774. Would you not have done so as secretary, and as taking an interest in the safety of the bank?—Yes; but I suppose that I thought with others that the bank was perfectly secure. I certainly thought that.

4775. More especially when you were secretary of the bank, did not you think that, for your own responsibility, and your own credit, things ought to be ship-shape, and that before you advanced money you ought to get security?—It was represented to the meeting on that very day that unless Premchund got money he would be in a serious position.

4776. I do not mean that, but did you not get some document for your own protection?—Any document which I might have written would certainly have been better than nothing, though it might not have been in legal form, and I regret now that I did not.

4777. As far as I can see, you did not take any steps to protect yourself. What were the arrangements in the bank for protecting the bank against carelessness on the part of accountants and clerks in writing up these books, and making the entries in them, which they should have done?—The accountant was responsible, and the head of each department under the accountant.

4778. Who was responsible for omissions?—The head of the department certainly should be responsible.

4779. Who was responsible for omissions in the Application Book?—I do not think that the accountant had anything to do with that book. It would be the ledger keeper, Mr. De Ga.

4780. Was he the head of a department?—He was at the head of the ledgers. He had charge of them.

4781. Was it possible for a series of omissions of that sort to take place for eighteen months, and to escape the notice of the secretary?—Perfectly possible. The book was of no use to me as secretary.

4782. Was not it likely that at meetings of the directors you would notice those things?—I never opened the book. It was for the directors to open it.

4783. Do you think that they would be likely to call up the secretary and ask him?—They would ask him if they wanted him.

4784. When you get a person like Mr. De Ga as the head of a department, surely there is some necessity for a check. What check was there over Mr. De Ga?—If you have a check over every head of a department you must double your establishment. There is a check in essential matters.

4785. This is a very essential matter, namely, the persistent omission of a certain class of information from a book which was for the special information of the directors?—It was not so very essential as keeping the accounts correct.

4786. Anything in a chain of accounts must be correct, because they have to balance?—But that was his principal duty.

4787. This was a book for the information of the directors, surely a check was necessary?—In a large establishment I do not know that you could have such a system of check.

4788. The secretary himself was the person to check it, was he not?—I never looked at it.

4789. Was the secretary in the habit of looking at the books which were to be laid before the directors?—Certainly not. I never looked at them unless the directors opened them and drew my attention to them.

4790. At what books did the secretary look?—He had to look at no books.

4791. Mr. Blair told us that the duty of the secretary was to open the letters, and to do what Premchund told him; surely there must have been something more than that?—Yes, the opening of the letters was mere routine work.

4792. I should imagine that the secretary was responsible for a system of check or control. Can you tell me what system of check or control there was by which he should know that things were going on right?—He had the balance sheet every half year.

4793. It would not take him five minutes to look at that. What did the secretary do so as to know that things were properly done in the bank?—I do not think that it was the duty of the secretary to see that the books were properly kept.

4794. Whose duty was it?—The accountant's.

4795. I come back to the Application Book; it was not the duty of the accountant to see to that, was it?—He had all the books, but it was not like his ledgers or the Day Book.

4796. Or any book in which a mistake would be detected by the balances?—Yes; or in which the omissions would be found out; in fact, if it had been a book requiring to be balanced they must have been found out in a very short time.

4797. Then how was it a book which Mr. Blair could possibly have omitted looking at every now and then?—I cannot say whether he looked at it or not, but I know that it was very rarely that I opened it.

4798. What is to be thought of a system by which an important book like that could have a series of omissions, and in fact a system of omissions, and no person whatever know about it except a man like Mr. De Ga. You did not know of it, and Mr. Blair did not know of it, and the directors were misled for a year and a half as to what was going on in the bank?—It was not supposed to be so very important at that time; the directors knew well enough what was going on in the bank.

4799. Then do you mean to say that the omissions in that book were quite immaterial?—I did not look at it as being of so much importance, knowing the business of the bank so well as I do.

4800. Then what was the use of such a book?—I do not justify withholding these entries from it; they ought to have been in it.

4801. As to the general ledger, what was the good of it?—Which?

4802. The one as to which there is uncertainty when it was begun?—The use of it was to ascertain how much each man had against him.

4803. I think that you made some remark disparaging to it, and to the effect that it was not of much use?—No, I think that the book was most useful, because it showed at once from the different departments in the bank what amounts were against each man.

4804. Was it ever looked at?—I have seen Mr. Hannay look at it over and over again.

4805. Was it looked at by anybody except Mr. Tracey and Mr. Hannay, whom we cannot examine?—I do not know that Mr. Tracey looked at it, but Mr. Hannay did.

4806. Have you any remembrance of any one of the directors looking at that book?—I cannot tell you, but the book lay on a table in the directors' room.

4807. Who suggested the making of the book, was it your suggestion?—It was Mr. Blair's, I think.

4808. Do you remember when?—No; it was in the beginning of 1865. I believe that he says that he heard of it after he came back from Ajmere.

4809. That was within six weeks of his departure?—Yes.

4810. Then, in fact, that book would not be of much use in his time; was it used in your time?—It was used a great deal, because I very often had to refer to the assistant who was writing it up to get the outstandings against particular people.

4811. We have been told repeatedly that one grave cause of the extent of the advances which had been made, and the large sums outstanding against various persons was that the answers which were given as to those outstandings never included more than one description of advance. After this book had been started when does it ever appear to have been of the slightest use, because we have not found that it was ever turned to use in any way?—It certainly could not have been of the slightest use in one way, namely, in preventing the granting of further credits, because the system was stopped.

4812. Was it taken advantage of in this way, that a list of all the sums outstanding against one man was ever shown?—It was shown to me.

4813. Was any list ever prepared and laid before the directors, showing the whole sum for which any man was liable to the bank?—I believe so, but I do not remember; it would be, certainly, if they asked for it. I am perfectly certain that Mr. Hannay frequently asked for returns of that sort.

4814. What arrangement was there for ensuring that the money was paid into the bank which was promised to be paid in, and upon the faith of which promise money was lent?—A record of all money to be paid in or paid out was kept by the ledger keeper; and where that was not done it would be reported.

4815. What check was there against the failure to lodge securities upon the faith of the receipt of which money had been lent?—There would be a memorandum sent to the registrar of securities.

4816. Do you know that there were failures in that respect?—I did not know that there were failures, except for a time. I think that you will find that in many instances where securities were promised we noticed it and wrote repeatedly for them.

4817. In the letter of the 30th of June 1865, from the Government directors to the Government of Bombay, it was described what sums of money had been advanced on shares, and what shares had been accepted as security; did that list include only the head office, or did it include the branches?—I forget; there would only be the Kalbadevi branch, I suppose, which would have any such transaction.

4818. Do you not remember?—No.

4819. I suppose that a detailed list was prepared on which to base that abstract?—Yes.

4820. What, according to the practice of the bank, would have been done with that detailed list which gave the results mentioned in the letter?—I do not know that they were required to make a list, the registrar of securities would simply have to give so many Back Bay shares and so many Elphinstone shares out of his ledgers.

4821. Supposing that he prepared a list, what would be done with it?—It would be kept among the records of the bank for the year I should think.

4822. Supposing that there was an error in it, how would you trace it back, how would you explain anything wrong in it, how would you be able to get at it?—You would very soon find out from the books if there was an error, without a list at all.

4823. I wish to know from you how that list was prepared, and also what ought to have become of the list on which these figures should have been based?—I do not know.

4824. There was no such list in the bank. Were all those papers destroyed every year?—No; the papers are kept, but a great many of the papers of the bank unfortunately got rather loose in removing from one bank to another.

4825. You have no recollection of that list?—No.

4826. When the Government directors said in this letter on the 30th of June, about two and a half months after that system of advancing on shares had begun, that it had been discontinued for some time, do you know why it was intended to discontinue it?—We should very soon have had all the shares in Bombay.

4827. It was not because you found that you were giving out money faster than you intended?—I suppose that that would follow if we continued advancing at the premiums put down there.

4828. The system of giving cash credits was introduced in your time?—Yes.

4829. And security was taken?—Yes, a promissory note on demand; it was done by other banks as well.

4830. Securities were occasionally taken?—Yes.

4831. When securities were realized, what was the rule of the bank as to the way in which the realization of these securities was shown; for instance, I allude to the case of the Asiatic Bank?—The proceeds were placed to the reduction of the debt.

4832. If you reduce the amount from 25 to 10 lacs, and the cash credit is still extant, they can draw up to the 25 lacs. The system of cash credit means that the person who has it can draw up to the maximum limit, if the period of credit is not exhausted; and the person in the bank who attends to that account is authorized to honour the party's cheques up to the limit; and that is what was done in the case of the Asiatic Bank?—You are quite correct in that; but you forget that we did not get the securities which we were to get in the case of the Asiatic Bank, which would have cleared us up to the whole amount.

4833. Apparently, the very best thing which the Asiatic Bank could have done would have been to have realized all the securities, and to have paid the money in, and then to have drawn to the maximum again. What was the system to guard against their doing so?—In the case of the Asiatic Bank, if we got all the securities which we were entitled to, the 20 lacs would have been paid off.

4834. You got a lot of securities, and they became nullified, because, after the proceeds were credited to their account, the Asiatic Bank again drew up to the maximum?—No, they would not have done that. The securities were more than the amount.

4835. The securities originally were more than the amount. After some of the securities were realized they again drew up to the maximum?—Yes.

4836. What is the meaning of your having a security, and what system is it by which a cash credit can be drawn against after the securities have been realized?—I must stick to my own opinion, namely, that we expected these securities from Calcutta. My opinion is that we were perfectly right in what we did.

4837. What was that?—We allowed them to draw more than the securities represented in the expectation of receiving the full amount of securities from Calcutta and other places.

4839. Would not the directors insist that the proceeds of the securities should be kept in hand, and that the Asiatic Bank should draw on an account which should be irrespective of the securities?—I can only say what I have said already on that point.

4840. I am distinctly to understand that you say that it is perfectly right that the securities might be credited to that account, and that the people to whom credit was given might still be able to draw up to the amount?—I never said so; that would simply be giving them money without any security at all.

4841. You are aware of Mr. Kelly having been ill on the occasion of the meeting regarding the loan to Premchund?—Yes.

4842. Do you think that he was in a fit state to do his duty at the bank?—I thought that he was, but he was very ill.

4843. Were you in any way responsible for seeing that the document which he should have prepared was prepared at once?—I was at him almost every day about it, and I was always promised it.

4844. Was it a paper which would have taken any time to draw up?—It was drawn up by one of his partners, and afterwards torn up, but he did not know anything about it. Possibly Mr. Kelly would have drawn it up otherwise, as he attended the meeting, and knew the arrangement.

4845. (President.) Is there anything which you wish to add?—I should like to make a remark. I found by Mr. A. Brown's evidence that he had evidently been misinformed in Bombay about a transaction as to Mr. Crawford, or rather a letter assigning a claim of Mr. Crawford's against the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company, and that Mr. Brown had been informed that the value of this claim was 70,000 rupees, and that it had been mislaid by me. I distinctly deny that. That letter was in existence when Mr. Stuart took charge, and Mr. Stuart had it one day, and I understood that it was given to him by the security department—by Mr. Fraser, junior. I knew that it was lost before I left, but I was never accused of losing it before I saw Mr. Brown's statement. I say that it was there in Mr. Stuart's time. I think that Mr. Stuart must have forgotten, or I do not think that he would have allowed Mr. Brown to say that.

4846. He might not have been present in the room; he was not there every day. I wrote to Bombay to Mr. Rodgie to find out what the amount was, and he wrote to Mr. Hurrell, Mr. Crawford's partner, and he says that we could not have got it without having a legal assignment of the amount, and that the whole amount would be 5,000 rupees even if we had got it. I am talking of the late Mr. William Henry Crawford.

4847. Do you allude to the valuation of his shares taken over, together with his bill of costs?—I was referring to the bill of costs. We had got a part of the debt. Of course I am willing to take any fair responsibility.

Adjourned to the 27th November at 11 o'clock.

PRESENT:

President.

SIR CHARLES JACKSON.

Member.

MAJOR MCLEOD INNES.

Secretary.

F. D. CHAUNTRELL, ESQ.

27 Nov. 1868.

(President.) I will take this opportunity of saying that we have got into arrears in some of the ministerial part of the business of the Commission, and that after to-day we shall adjourn until next Thursday. By that time we hope to have the assistance of our colleague Mr. Melvill, who is now, I am glad to say, recovering from a bad attack of pleurisy. We have had a letter from Colonel Ballard, which the Secretary will read.

(The following letters were read by the Secretary.)

"India Office, 24th November 1868.

"From the Secretary, Bombay Bank Commission, to Colonel Ballard, Lasswade, Edinburgh.

"Sir,

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th instant, and am directed by the Commissioners to apprise you that they deem it right to afford to every Government director of the late Bank of Bombay an opportunity of presenting himself before them for examination should he desire it, having regard to the accusations which have been made by the shareholders against the Government directors as acceptors of bribes in the shape of allotments of shares which had been run up to a high premium.

"The Commissioners will be prepared to take your evidence on Thursday week, the 3rd proximo, at 11 a.m., in Room No. 200 of this office, should you wish to appear before them for the purpose. They do not themselves propose to summon you, as you do not appear to have acted as a director of the Bank prior to July 1865.

"I have, &c.

"(Signed) F. D. CHAUNTRELL,

"Secretary, Bombay Bank Commission."

"Lasswade, near Edinburgh,

"Sir, November 26th.

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th November, stating that as I was not a director of the Bank of Bombay previous to July 1865, the Commissioners do not propose to summon me for examination, but having a view to the accusations which have been brought against Government directors as acceptors of bribes in the shape of share allotments, they would take my evidence if I desire it. The short period during which I acted as a director was subsequent to the time when the Bank's money was lent so profusely, and the only evidence I could give on the matter of share allotments would be to state that during the period I sat at the Board I had no share transactions of any kind; and the only allotment I ever received was one of two Back Bay shares a year previously.

"I would rather not take a journey to London at this season, and request you will ask the Commissioners whether they consider it desirable to have any further evidence, and if so, whether they could not put the necessary questions in writing. I will come up to London if they wish it.

"I have, &c.

"(Signed) H. BALLARD.

"The Secretary to the Bombay Bank Commission."

(President.) That is all that we have found out against Colonel Ballard, namely, that he had those two Back Bay shares on the 1st of July 1864. That was a year before he was a director. (To Mr. Le Messurier.) Is it your wish that he should be called?

FRANCIS STEWART CHAPMAN, sworn and examined.

Mr. F. S. Chapman.

4848. (President.) I believe that you are a member of the Bombay Civil Service?—I am.

4849. What office did you hold in the beginning of 1865?—I was collector and magistrate of Sattara at the commencement of 1865.

4850. When were you appointed Secretary to the Government of Bombay?—In the early part of March 1865 I was called down to act as Secretary to Government.

4851. When were you appointed a Government director of the Bank of Bombay?—I was appointed to act as a Government director on the 8th of March 1865, and I believe that I took my seat at the Board for the first time on the 16th of March.

4852. When did you resign?—About the 20th of April 1866, I should think; I cannot be sure of the date, but some time towards the end of April 1866.

4853. Your last sitting was on the 24th. Did you receive any instructions on your appointment as Government director?—None whatever.

4854. How did you ascertain what the duties of a Government director were?—I am sorry to say that I did not ascertain them; I had no guide to enable me to do so, and I had nothing but my own judgment to act upon in the matter; there were no specific duties which we were to perform laid down; there were no official instructions given us of any sort.

4855. Then you were expected to know your duties intuitively?—Quite so.

4856. Were you ever in a bank before?—Never, and I wish that I had never been in this one.

4857. Did you, on becoming a director of the bank, receive any orders to communicate with the Government?—No. I was in constant communication as secretary to Government with the members of the Government, and with the Governor, but I had no official instructions to communicate in any particular way.

4858. Not originally?—No.

4859. What did the supervision or the superintendence of the Government directors amount to at the time of your appointment? I am not speaking of the period after the panic.—It appeared to me not to amount to much. On the first day that I joined the Bank I made my bow to my brother directors, and we were told that there was no business to be done, and we walked out.

4860. What did the superintendence of the Government directors amount to at the time of your appointment?—They sent in certain weekly returns to the Government.

4861. Did they ever make inquiries as to the Bank management? I am speaking of the period before the panic.—No. As I have described, to the best of my recollection no business of any sort was brought before us at the first few meetings which I attended. My recollection will not serve me precisely, but I believe that you will have evidence to the effect that no books were put on the table at the first few meetings. I should not like to depose to that fact because my memory does not serve me, but I believe that you will have evidence to that effect.

4862. When was the letter dated 8th September 1865 received from the Secretary of State?—If I had the office file here I could tell precisely; I suppose that it was received within 22 or 23 days afterwards.

4863. The Secretary of State for India says in that letter, which is addressed to the Governor in Council: "But above all it should be the care of the Government directors to watch very closely the proceedings of the Bank, in order, so far as their influence extends, to prevent any repetition of imprudent management, and any disposition on the part of their colleagues to depart from sound principles should be forthwith communicated to you, in order that you may take such measures as may seem to you to be necessary in reference thereto."—With your permission I should like to go a little further back, before the date of that letter. I should state to the Commission that the first intimation which we, as the Government, received, I believe, was a private note from Sir Charles Wood, now Lord Halifax; he was Secretary of State, and he wrote to Sir Bartle Frere and sent a general warning, and said, "Do tell your Government directors to keep their eyes open," or words to that effect. There was nothing definite to tells us where the danger was to be apprehended, or any specific warning, but there was a general warning to that effect from Sir Charles Wood, and that was the first that I ever heard of anything going wrong.

4864. Do you remember the date of that note from Sir Charles Wood?—Sir Bartle Frere showed it to me the other day, and to the best of my recollection it was dated the 2nd of March 1865. I probably saw it shortly after joining the bank.

4865. Was any new system initiated after the receipt of that private note?—I am sorry to say that we did not take such steps as I now think we ought to have done. I satisfied myself by looking at the general daily account to see the proportion which the assets bore to the liabilities, but no minute inquiry as to the nature of those assets was initiated by us.

4866. After the receipt of the letter of the 8th of September were any steps taken? I want to know now about the supervision of the Government. After you got this letter was anything done further in the way of supervision by the Government?—I should explain to you that in August 1865 I left the Bank, and was away on duty up country, and did not return till the end of the year or the commencement of 1866; but, as the Commission are aware, by that time business of every description was brought before the directors, and therefore they considered, I have no doubt, that every precaution which could be taken, as regards doing any bad business, was already provided for.

4867. There were no instructions given to the Government directors as to what their duties were to be, and pointing out how they were to proceed in protecting the Government?—None whatever.

4868. Do you recollect the Governor General's letter of the 17th of January 1866, which is printed at page 10 of the Blue Book, in which he inculcated greater vigilance on the part of the Bank authorities? The last paragraph of that letter says, after referring to what had been done in regard to the Bank of Bengal, "I am desired strongly to recommend to His Excellency the Governor the adoption of similar vigilance in regard to the affairs of the Bank of Bombay, and to remark that, in the opinion of the Governor-General in Council, the pursuance of such a course would effectually check the recurrence of difficulties similar to those under which the Bank of Bombay has been lately struggling. Loans and other banking business would be more cautiously conducted; the purchase of bills on Calcutta would not be sanctioned, when, as in a late case, every available rupee in the Bank was necessary to meet local demands; and, lastly, the interest and control of the local Government in the financial affairs of the presidency would be advisably increased to the general advantage of the state."—I think that by the time when that letter reached us, and in fact as regards the past generally, I may say that there was the closest supervision which the directors could exercise, as regards all new business. I do not think that it was possible for anything to escape their notice, unless it was voluntarily withheld from them.

4869. Were you called upon to send any written reports to the Government from time to time? I know that there are two reports, namely, of the 30th of June 1865 and the 31st of March 1866, but were you called upon to report generally and periodically?—No. I, as Secretary to Government, used to get, returns from the Secretary of the Bank of the state of the liabilities and assets almost daily, which I used to lay before the Governor. I suppose that every day we got returns as to the general totals of the Bank.

4871. (Major Innes.) They showed balances?—Yes; it was very unfortunate for us that we were contented with those, and did not see more into the nature and details of them.

4872. (President.) I believe that you lived with one of the members of the Council?—I used to live with Mr. Ellis.

4873. I suppose that you were in daily communication both with him and with the Governor?—I was on the most intimate terms with Mr. Ellis.

4874. You say that you took your seat at the Board on the 16th of March 1865, and that at the first few sittings there were no books on the table?—I guarded myself by stating that I was not prepared to say so from my recollection, but, I believe, from what I have heard elsewhere that you will get evidence of that matter.

4875. You never saw a book of outstandings?—No; I was very much surprised when Mr. Donald Robertson mentioned such a book.

4877. That is consistent with the evidence which we have received in India. We have also been surprized at hearing about this book. I believe that shortly after you took your seat at the Board you became very anxious about the proceedings?—Yes; I felt that we were mere ciphers, and at that time I confess I was quite ignorant of the duties, and I felt a certain amount of diffidence in protruding my ignorance in the matter. I had no reason to apprehend that anything was specifically going wrong; but at the same time I felt that we were kept in entire ignorance of what was going on at the Bank.

4878. I believe that you asked Mr. A. Brown at the end of April 1865 whether he was satisfied with the way in which the business was done?—I believe that I did.

Mr. F. S. Chapman.

27 Nov. 1868.

4878*a*. I believe that you complained to him as to the utter ignorance in which the directors were kept as to the business, and everything which was going on?—I did so, I believe.

4879. Did you and he agree in opinion that the directors were ciphers?—Yes; and Mr. Lushington, who was my Government colleague, was of the same opinion.

4880. You also agreed in opinion that the Secretary was apparently uncontrolled?—Yes; that was our opinion.

4881. What did you resolve upon with Mr. Brown?—This was at the Board meeting of the 4th of May 1865. A good deal of discussion took place.

4882. Before that, did not you agree to act together?—We intended at that time to see to matters for ourselves, and on that occasion, on the 4th of May 1865, a good deal of conversation took place at the Board, relative to the mode in which business was conducted, and I think that there was a strong feeling on the part of some of the directors that it was not advisable to interfere much with the Secretary. There was a talk about constituents disclosing their affairs and their affairs being published, and matters of that sort.

4883. I believe that the persons present on that occasion were Mr. Hannay, Mr. Lushington, yourself, Mr. Tracey, and Mr. Brown; was not Premchund Roychund present?—Is his name on the Minutes?

4884. No.—I should not like to say.

4885. I believe that the resolution eventually come to was a species of compromise?—I should say that that resolution does not represent the real practical understanding which was arrived at; the practical understanding arrived at on that occasion, to the best of my recollection, was, that the hitherto unlimited powers of the Secretary were abrogated, and that for the future we were to have all business placed before us; and I think that if you look at the subsequent proceedings you will see that that was practically done.

4886. We do not find that to be the case in the resolution. This is the resolution, "Resolved that no new constituent of the Bank be allowed credit beyond three lacs of rupees, without the special sanction of three directors."—Yes.

4888. Did you object to them?—I do not say that we objected to them, but I say that in addition to that special resolution, there was a practical understanding that for the future business was to be laid before the Board.

4889. Surely it was a great pity, if there was such an understanding, that it was not inserted in the minutes?—I think so, but I consider that what I state is borne out.

4890. The panic came on afterwards, and then everything did come before you; you were in a fright; but what you have stated does not appear in this resolution?—Precisely so.

4891. Does not it appear, in point of fact, that you knew at this time that the Secretary was advancing three lacs and upwards upon his own authority?—I believe that he had been advancing up to any amount, up to that time.

4892. And is it not the conclusion from that resolution, that you allowed him to continue to do that in all old cases?—Unquestionably; there can be no other deduction from the resolution.

4893. Is there not another deduction from that resolution, namely, that you required three directors to be consulted only in the case of new constituents?—I think so.

4894. And that three directors were not to be consulted in the case of old constituents?—That is the logical sequence of the resolution, no doubt.

4895. You have heard from Mr. Robertson's evidence, and from his letter of March 1868, which no doubt you have seen, that he did not consider himself controlled by that resolution?—Yes, but at the same time you will permit me to say, that when an entire change of practice took place, as it did subsequently to that 4th of May, in the shape of bringing every single application before the Board, I think that, to all intents and purposes, the Secretary would not have been acting fairly towards us if he had gone on, or if in any exceptional cases he had given anything upon his own authority. I think that that resolution is an unfortunate one in many respects.

4896. That would be a very fair conclusion for you to draw if the panic had not come on?—I admit that we were influenced by the panic.

4897. I admit that from that time a great many things were brought before the Board?—Yes, and I should say that it was not an unfair inference that those cases which were not brought before the Board were improperly kept back from the Board. I consider that we are responsible for everything which took place as regards loans after the 4th of May 1865.

4898. You were three to two on that board day; why did not you have your own way. If Premchund was not there, there were three to two?—To the best of my recollection it never took the form of an actual division.

4899. Mr. Lushington proposed the resolution, did he not?—Perhaps he did, but to the best of my recollection, it never took the shape of a formal division, and was not put to the vote. It certainly was not a very business-like proceeding, and I regret that it was not more specific; but that was the understanding which was arrived at.

4900. If it had been adopted ten months sooner it would have been a different thing. You were present at the board meeting of the 12th of April 1865?—I was.

4901. Did you approve of the resolution which was passed on that occasion?—I regret to say that I did.

4902. You approved of rescinding the old resolution forbidding any loans on shares, unless they were brought before the Board?—To the best of my recollection that old resolution was never brought to our notice, certainly not prominently, so as to provoke any discussion on the subject.

4903. It is set out in full on the minutes?—I know that it is.

4904. Did you approve of advancing upon shares as an abstract proposition?—I did at the time.

4905. Did you approve of advancing upon the premia of shares?—I approved of the whole of that resolution, I am sorry to say.

4906. But did you understand at the time that it would justify your advancing upon the premia of shares?—Unquestionably. But I should state that with regard to the disastrous consequences which resulted from this resolution, especially with regard to advancing on shares of the Commercial Bank and the Asiatic Bank, we had no idea that a royal charter conferred the privilege of obliging you to pay up the capital over again; nor was it until after the decision in the High Court that we were obliged to become responsible for those shares. It did not influence us at the time.

4907. Did you understand at the time when you passed this resolution that it would allow you to advance upon shares the calls of which were not paid up?—We did not look closely into the question of the liability which we were incurring at the time, but I certainly did give my consent to that resolution.

4908. Who proposed it?—It was proposed by Mr. Hannay, the Chairman.

4909. You see that the words are "Resolved that the Secretary be authorized at his discretion"?—I am sorry to say that I know the words perfectly.

4910. Was there any discussion upon that?—No discussion at all.

4911. Then again there was a little hedging at the end, "and it is to be distinctly understood that such advances are only to be granted to first-class applicants"?—Yes.

4912. But I suppose that you must admit that the Secretary was allowed to be the judge of who were first-class applicants?—Quite so.

4913. What was the object or the policy of that resolution?—To the best of my recollection the explanation given to us by the President was that there was a demand for money; that a good number of the people who were in the habit of dealing with the Bank had invested their capital largely in these concerns, and that, subject to the precautions which are stated at the end of the resolution, it would be an expedient thing to afford them assistance; and that there was no risk in doing so, and so on.

4914. Did you lay considerable stress upon your having a great deal of capital lying idle?—Yes.

4915. That was one object?—That was the principal object, I think.

4916. Did you not hear that at that time you had more capital than you knew exactly what to do with?—I think that that was alleged as a reason why we should make use of it in this way.

4917. Then came the panic at the end of May 1865, and there was a run on the Bank?—Yes.

4918. Which necessitated the telegram of the 15th of June 1865 from Sir Bartle Frere to the Governor-General?—Yes. With the permission of the Commission, I will state that it will perhaps explain much better what course I took, if they will allow me to put in some letters which I addressed to Sir Bartle Frere.

4919. From whom did Sir Bartle Frere get this information as to the danger of the Bank?—From myself.

4920. Did you address any letter to him?—I did. I will tell you how the correspondence originated. The first letter which I received from Sir Bartle Frere was dated the 8th May, in which he said that he had heard a rumour that the Bank had advanced on 131 Back Bay shares at the rate of 25,000 rupees per share. He said, "Is this rumour true?" and warned us that such a rumour existed. My answer to Sir Bartle Frere was as follows; it is dated 10th of May (Exhibit marked A 153):—I said: "Your informant must, I think, be in error. To the best of my belief, up to last Thursday, the Bank had hardly advanced at all on Back Bay shares, and in a few instances where they had done so the shares had been taken as collateral security." I am sorry for that expression "collateral security"; I am afraid that it will appear very frequently. "The other day Lushington and I spent some time in looking over the books, and have directed a statement to be prepared showing the number of individuals and firms to whom advances above one lac have been made, and the security by which they are covered. This statement will be ready by to-morrow, and I shall then be able to send your Excellency precise figures as regards Back Bay shares. There can be no doubt that advances were in the days of prosperity very recklessly made on personal security." That was my first intimation to Sir Bartle Frere. I added: "It would be suicidal to press for payment now, and the policy of the Bank for some time past has been to decline all fresh applications, and to renew in cases where it would be hopeless to expect immediate payment." That was the commencement of my correspondence with Sir Bartle Frere. There are other matters in the letter which do not require to be read. Then on the 11th May, the day following, having got this information from the Secretary to the Bank, I wrote to Sir Bartle Frere another letter (Exhibit A 154), as follows: "In all rupees 6,94,750 have been advanced on 35 Back Bay shares, or, on an average, rather less than rupees 20,000 per share. The following will show how much has in all been advanced on shares."

4921. Have you a list of the Back Bay shares?—Yes.

4922. There was one case of 80 Back Bay shares to Kursondass Madhowdass himself alone?—The figures which I sent to Sir Bartle Frere were taken from a letter addressed to me by Mr. Donald Robertson: "Back Bays 35 shares, rupees 6,94,750; Elphinstone Land 324 ditto, 6,40,000 rupees; Asiatic Bank 890 ditto, rupees 3,04,250; Commercial ditto 3,580 shares, 12,99,800 rupees. The above sums represent the total amount that has been advanced solely on shares. The Bank hold a number of Back Bay and other shares, which they have thought it prudent to take into safe custody. From two to three large loans have been made on personal security. Pray pardon this hurried note." I will read Mr. Robertson's letter to me, which is dated 11th of May 1865 (Exhibit marked A 155): "My dear Mr. Chapman. Since the resolution was passed to advance on shares the book shows how much has been given out in that way;" and then follow the figures which I have already read. "Besides the above, we hold a considerable number of Back Bay shares which we took into safe custody from those names who have large loans from the Bank on personal security; men such as B. H. Cama, Cursetjee Furdoonjee, and Kursondass Madhowdass. These loans were not nominally granted on shares, but it was thought well to have some security collaterally independent of their personal standing. Several of these large loans, Premchund tells me, will be paid up very soon." The letters which I have read constitute my first correspondence with Sir Bartle Frere. Then came the run upon the Bank. I communicated that fact to Sir Bartle Frere.

I wrote on the 8th of June 1865 to Sir Bartle Frere as follows (Exhibit marked A 156): "I have just returned from the Bank meeting. From what I can learn matters are looking as black as they well can. The first thing that came before our notice was some correspondence that took place yesterday between the manager of the Mercantile Bank and our Secretary. It resulted in the former sending a cheque for the whole of the deposits in our hands, amounting to 25 lacs. The affair originated in silly pique, and on two of the directors calling this morning on the Manager, was satisfactorily settled. I have instanced this fact to show the great jeopardy in which the Bank is apparently placed. There is such an entire absence of all confidence, that a run may take place any day. If this should extend to the large depositors (the Commercial Bank, for example, has 40 lacs in our hands), we should have to suspend payment. There is, I hope, little chance of the contingency I have alluded to ever taking place, but there is no use disguising the fact that it is on the cards. At all events, there can be no harm in anticipating and preparing for the worst. To this end I have asked Mr. Hannay and the other directors to prepare and submit any feasible scheme that may occur to them by which Government could assist them if they were placed in the straits I have referred to. When they have done so I will lose no time in laying it before your Excellency. I hope I shan't be considered an alarmist for having written in this style. On paper we are in a very satisfactory state, but the list of overdue bills is not a pleasant sight. The list, too, of debtors, whose bills have still to run presents a very different aspect to what it would have done six months ago. Men who were then supposed to be good for crores are now either insolvent or else on the verge of bankruptcy. In the days of prosperity our management was characterized by what now appears to have been most reckless conduct. It is a satisfaction to me personally to feel that the mischief was done before I had any connexion with the Bank."

I was not then aware of the extent of the advances on shares.

My letter continues thus: "I do not for a moment mean to imply that one would have acted otherwise than the former directors did. It is easy enough to be wise after the event." That was my first letter to Sir Bartle Frere, that was dated on the 8th of June 1865.

Mr. F. S. Chapman.

27 Nov. 1868.

On the following day, the 9th, I wrote again as follows (Exhibit marked A 157): "I enclose a note just received from Mr. Hannay, and would suggest the advisability of a telegram being despatched to the Governor General, asking him to depute to your Excellency the authority referred to, to the extent of a crore and a half. I was at the Bank this morning with Lushington, and we both urged on the Secretary the necessity of taking legal proceedings against the parties whose bills are over due. It is difficult to get the lawyers to act, as they are all over-worked, winding up bankrupts' estates. The next crisis is expected early in July. I propose remaining here until I receive your Excellency's instructions as to whether you wish me to proceed to Poona.

"I would beg to suggest that Colonel Ballard be appointed a Government director in lieu of Mr. Mangles, whose place has not yet been filled up."

This was Mr. Hannay's letter to me (Exhibit marked A 158): "I have seen Kelly, who has gone carefully over the different Acts." (This was with regard to the power of Government to assist out of the currencies.) "He says that no power to make use of currency reserve in the hands of mint masters is left with local Governments; Clause 10 of Act 19 (1861); however, gives power to the Governor General and Secretary of State to use this money to the extent of four crores."

(Witness.) He is quite wrong there in what he says.

(Witness continues to read.) "Matters here are so serious that we might be in difficulties any day, and it is time to think how best to face and meet them. I firmly believe that if the Governor had power, in case of need, to lend the Bank, say, a crore to a crore and a half, hardly any of this money would be needed. As soon as it was known that there was assistance at hand in case of need, the necessity for it would in all probability die away."

On the 13th June 1865 (Exhibit marked A 159) I wrote the following letter to Sir Bartle Frere. "I have just arrived (that is, at Poona) "11 p.m., having made up my mind quite suddenly this afternoon to run up and personally communicate to you Excellency the state of money affairs in Bombay. I hope to do myself the pleasure of coming over to breakfast to-morrow."

On the 14th I wrote the following letter (Exhibit marked A 160):—

"14th June 1865, 8 p.m.

"My dear Sir Bartle Frere,—I have just received the enclosed notes. They depict very forcibly the critical state of affairs. Ellis has written to say he will be up here by the 7.30 train. I have kept copies of the enclosed to show him," "P.S.—Your Excellency will observe that the letters are dated yesterday."

I received this letter from Mr. Hannay without any date, but I presume that it must have been either the 13th or the 14th of June: "Any word from his Excellency? Cash is running away like smoke; we will not be able to go on much longer without assistance, I fear. At this rate Monday might bring us to a stop." It was on the receipt of that letter that I put myself into the train, and went up to see the Governor.

On the 13th of June Mr Hannay wrote the following letter to me:—

"Things do not look pleasant to-day. Balance is, as you saw, down last night to 98 lacs, exactly one-third of liabilities. To-day mercantile draws five lacs, and there are hosts of other cheques coming in. I may mention that for the requirements of next mail much cash will also be withdrawn. Natives seem determined not to pay, so that the banks have nothing coming in; and unless we get assistance (say power to pay away one crore and a half of currency notes from the treasury balance) I fear we shall have to close the doors on Monday. As I have said before (and all with whom I have spoken agree with me) if the public knew that the Bank would be supported, I believe the natives would take courage, and again pay in money. We have, however, now had an opportunity of seeing them in their true colours, and very nasty ones they are. They have ruined their credit for ever."

That is Mr. Hannay's opinion. He also forwarded to me a letter from Mr. Andrew Grant, who, I believe, was the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, and was considered a great authority on the state of affairs at Bombay. Mr. Hannay, in another letter of the 13th June 1865 (Exhibit marked A 161) says, "The enclosed from Grant will in some measure tend to show you what outside views are. The remark about the conduct of Government you may pass over. This refers to that unfortunate 18 lacs which Lushington has had to kick backward and forward."

4923. What does that refer to?—That is something connected with the Government balances.

4924. That is what Sir John Lawrence referred to?—Yes. Mr. Hannay continues as follows:—"To-night people seem very anxious indeed, and declare on all hands that unless Government aid us, it will be a case of general ruin. This, as you are aware, has long been my opinion, and I think that His Excellency would be more than justified by the opinion of the world were he to accept the responsibility of permitting us to use part of the currency balance. If we have to stop, the ruin would not be confined to Bombay. It is now the pivot of exchange for the whole East, and the havoc would be terrible. If anything is decided upon, kindly telegraph, as people are terribly anxious." That is from Mr. Hannay, dated the 13th of June. I will read Mr. Grant's letter.

4925. The Governor acted upon that letter?—Yes.

4926. Will you read it?—This is the letter from Mr. Grant to Mr. Hannay (Exhibit marked A 162): "I am sorry to see the Bank of Bombay statement for the past week, which looks as if things were going from bad to worse. The conduct of the Government seems strange, and is making people anxious. Several people have been to me, asking whether it is possible to induce the Government to increase the issue of notes for a few months to some extent over and above their usual proportion to the coin and securities on hand, so as to increase the circulation temporarily, and give accommodation; and it is said the Bank directors had taken some steps in this direction. I don't know whether this may be true or not. There are a great many difficulties connected with such a course, but it really seems as if some such measure is imperative to save us all from ruin. What do you think of it yourself? Of course any request for such relief ought to be made by a large body representing the whole monetary interests of the place, in order to have weight with the Supreme Government. Even then I doubt if the Simla folks would admit the gravity of the crisis, or the necessity for the step."

I think that these letters illustrate the period. On the receipt of this information, as to the great risk which was hanging over us, the Governor, as you know, telegraphed to the Governor-General for permission, if need be, to make use of the currency reserve, and permission was granted.

4927. The Governor-General's reply was, "Use your discretion, you will be supported?"—Yes. I can read the letters which passed at that time between myself and Sir Bartle Frere.

"17th June 1865. (Exhibit marked A 163): My dear Sir Bartle Frere, I am delighted at the news Ellis has just brought." (We were in great doubt as to whether we should get the authority or not.) "I have just telegraphed to Hannay to the following effect:—'Excellent news from Simla. Full authority given to this Government.' Enclosed is a note from Hannay. I propose going down to Bombay to-day."

Mr. Hannay wrote to me on the 16th of June. I should explain, before reading this letter, that the Governor had declined to act on his own authority in a matter interfering with the currency reserve, because he said that he thought that if he acted upon his own authority, and it was not upheld, it would only make matters worse, by rescinding any permission which might have been given. This is Mr. Hannay's letter (Exhibit marked A 164) :—

"The Governor takes a correct view of the case. If the Governor General did not uphold his action, the effect would assuredly be ten times worse than if the remedy had not been tried. I was in hopes, however, that under present pressing need we might have felt assured of his sanction. I hope the reply may be favourable, and that we may have it speedily. It would be just like an open loan; the Bank would only draw for what was really necessary. I got your telegram at 11 p.m., and this morning at 6 a.m. sent you one as per copy enclosed.

"With reference to Ballard, you are aware that 23 lacs of bar gold is counted as cash as usual; this in ordinary times being readily convertible, but at present can only be sold in small lots. Yesterday Ballard declined to grant us notes for it. Would that we had more gold and fewer past due bills. Now these are not times for too strict readings of Acts. I hope, therefore, His Excellency will authorize him to advance notes on hand; he can sell at leisure, on account of the Bank. Surely this is not asking very much.

"The next part of my telegram we could act on at once by instructing agents to pay money into local treasuries, in consideration of receiving collectors telegrams; the Mint to give us credit at once, the Bank guaranteeing any expenses that may be incurred. With the exception of the Oriental and Asiatic, local banks (old) have behaved very badly. The Mercantile should not have forgotten that the Bank of Bombay saved it from closing its doors during a sickness in its infancy. No money is coming in, nor will it come till after 1st July, I fear."

There is a postscript to this letter. He had received the news that we were supported. "Our best thanks to Sir Bartle for his prompt action re Ballard. Your telegram was a great relief. There was a considerable withdrawal in the morning; but few cheques have been presented these last two hours. If it was known that Government would support us in case of need, I dare say we would have a crore paid in within ten days. We have asked the Bank of Bengal to give us a credit to the extent of 50 lacs."

I wrote to Sir Bartle Frere on the 20th June 1865, this permission having been received (Exhibit A 165). "A very marked amount of confidence was established directly it became known that Government were prepared to assist the Bank in case of need. From what I can learn there is little chance of aid being now required. I have taken care to tell the directors very plainly that Government would not consider themselves justified in adopting so extreme a measure, unless the Bank was actually in articulo, and that therefore they should not relax their efforts to help themselves. They are in treaty for an open loan with the Bank of Bengal. The Mercantile and Agra treated us shamefully, and I hope you approve of our proceedings in returning them the wretched pittance they had left in our hands, and declining all further dealings with them.

"I communicated Sir C. Wood's objections regarding the advances on shares to the directors. I fear the measure cannot be justified. In palliation of it, it can only be said that the shares were taken in a great measure as collateral security; that the amount actually advanced was comparatively small, that the Bank had at the time upwards of two crores lying idle, and that the demand for accommodation, on what then appeared excellent security, was very urgent. The Bank will gradually assimilate their charter to that of Bengal and Madras. Mangles never formally resigned. I take blame to myself for not having brought to your Excellency's notice the circumstance of the vacancy having occurred. If I remember right I did so verbally some time ago. Ballard is, I think, on the whole, the best person to appoint; Marriott is so much away from Bombay. Our cash balance last evening was 97 lacs, and yesterday the receipts were three lacs in excess of the withdrawals. Our liabilities, payable on demand, amount to two crores, and some 30 lacs, and our fixed deposits to about half a crore. The following is the latest state of the currency account;—" and so on about the currency. "I have telegraphed to Madras, and requested them to send what money they can spare by the steamer of the 24th. Lushington sent up to Poona a statement of the probable balances in the different Treasuries at the end of June and July respectively, after all expenses had been provided for. The Directors ought (and I believe do) to feel very grateful to your Excellency for the prompt and decisive action that has been adopted. There is no chance, I fear, of Lushington and myself getting the requisite information to enable us to submit an official report before the mail."

On the 21st of June 1865 I wrote this letter (Exhibit A 166): "My letter of yesterday will have informed your Excellency that I lost no time in disabusing the directors of the idea that they need take no steps to help themselves. The scheme started by Mr. Brice was, I am told, quite an impracticable one. The Bank of Bengal have promised to accommodate us to the extent of 20 lacs on the ordinary terms, but state that we must furnish special security if we require more. I do not know whether we shall accept their liberal offer on these terms. Madras has promised to send the large sum of 10 lacs by the steamer of the 24th. I am very vexed about that telegram, but doubt whether the public received their first intimation from it. It is commonly asserted that the fact of the Government of India having vested this Government with discretionary power was known in the Bazaar on the Friday night, and that the intelligence came from Calcutta." I beg to call the attention of the Commissioners to that point, because I expect that I shall have occasion to refer to it afterwards, with regard to the disclosure of intelligence from Calcutta.

Witness continues to read.—"I have just returned from the Bank. We have decided upon consulting the solicitor regarding that utterly false statement in to-day's 'Gazette.' Under any circumstances it seems to me most desirable that it should be publicly contradicted. Goodness knows our sins have been heavy enough to meet any amount of abuse, but no good can possibly result from these malicious attacks. There is a great deal of personal and party feeling at the bottom of these attacks. The impression is that Hannay and Tracey are tools in Premchund's hands. My own conviction is that these two men are thoroughly honest and upright. As far as I can learn, they have not, directly or indirectly, received the slightest assistance from the Bank; on the contrary, the Asiatic is one of our best supporters."

That was the Bank with which Mr. Hannay and Mr. Tracey were connected.

"I enclose an amended statement of the probable cash balances at the end of the current and of the next month."

On the 21st June I wrote again as follows :—

(Exhibit A 167.) "After I wrote this morning Lushington assured me that the contents of the telegram were not divulged by any of the directors. As I mentioned in my letter, the news is said to have been known in the Bazaar the previous evening; it was certainly known long before the telegram was opened. Lushington hopes that the new director will be a resident of Bombay. Foggo's appointment would be a very distasteful one to the other directors, but perhaps their feelings are not entitled to much consideration. On the whole, I am inclined to think Ballard would be the best man, and in this opinion Lushington concurs." That brings us down to the 21st of June 1865.

Mr. F. S. Chapman.

4928. Did not you, on the 21st of June, get a telegram from the Governor General's Military Secretary?—No.

4929. There appears to have been one received. This is from the Confidential Appendix. (Exhibit marked A 188.) Sir Bartle says, "Since I began this letter I have read your Military Secretary's telegram of the 21st." Did you not get, on the 21st, or the next day, a telegram inquiring whether you had taken steps to ascertain the quality of the good outstanding bills and securities which the Bank held?—I do not remember that telegram; it was probably sent direct to the Governor, especially if it came from the Governor General's Military Secretary.

4930. This is the answer of Sir Bartle Frere to it: "This was done some six weeks ago, when Sir Charles Wood drew my attention to the management of the Bank, and the result was better than I had expected. The advances on shares without collateral security were not large, nor the prices at which they were valued then high. There ought, of course, to be no such transaction at all; but they were not heavy, nor, at the then prices, attended with much risk." Did you go into the matter then?—I have read out the letters.

4932. What was your idea about it then?—I think that we were entirely deluded, and that the term was a delusion; but I myself believe that in the first instance the Bank officials deluded themselves, and then succeeded in deluding us. I can only give you my idea of it by a practical illustration. For instance, I might lend you a 5*l.* note under ordinary circumstances; but I might probably receive from other friends similar applications, and I might say, "I would not mind lending you this 5*l.* note, but I am rather short of cash, and I should like to get your watch into my custody as security for it." It is difficult to state how far I should be influenced by my estimate of your personal character, and how far your watch would influence me.

4933. Did you ask yourself the question to what the security was collateral?—That was my opinion. I admit that it was an entire delusion, but we were certainly deluded at the time.

4934. If you or Sir Bartle Frere had asked to what it was collateral, you would have found that it was a little piece of paper, namely, a promissory note?—I am not going to defend it; but I suppose the Commissioners know with whom this bright idea of collateral security originated.

4935. I suppose that it originated with Mr. Blair?—No. From the papers it appears to have originated with the Bank of Bengal. I do not wish for a moment to defend it, because I am satisfied that it is a delusion.

4936. You did not institute any inquiry at that time. It is only those letters that Sir Bartle Frere acted upon. You had not made any inquiry six weeks before?—No, certainly not.

4937. On the same day that Sir Bartle Frere wrote the letter of the 22nd of June, which is in the Confidential Appendix, the Governor General wrote him a letter, which you will find at page 2 of the Blue Book. It is a very important letter, because he grapples with the whole thing. The letter says: "The attention of the Governor General in Council having been lately drawn to the state of the affairs of the Bombay Bank, I am directed to request that with the permission of His Excellency the Governor, a full report may be furnished as soon as possible on this subject."

Then it goes on to say in the next paragraph, which is most important: "The chief points on which information is desired are the precise position of the Bank in regard to its assets and liabilities; what have been the losses of the Bank since the commencement of the present commercial crisis; what is the present amount of overdue bills; what proportion of their amount may be fairly expected to be realized; and what are the prospects of the Bank with reference to the bills which have yet to run?"—Precisely.

4938. You see how important that is. It does not merely ask, what are the overdue bills, but "what are the prospects of the Bank with reference to the bills which have yet to run," which would have taken in the question of all bills renewed over and over again?—Exactly.

4939. Was that letter referred to you and to Mr. Lushington to report upon?—I believe it was. In fact, if you happen to have the office files you will see the precise fact. It is impossible from the Blue Book to state what action was taken on the letter.

4940. It was before you?—Yes.

4941. Is your report of the 30th of June 1865 meant to be an answer to this inquiry?—Partly. I will explain what I mean by "partly."

4942. Then I find that the day before you sent in this report of the 30th of June you wrote a letter from yourself to yourself?—Exactly.

4943. Which put the thing very loosely?—Perhaps so.

4944. You will find it dated 29th of June 1865, and addressed to yourself and Mr. Lushington as Government Directors of the Bank of Bombay. In that letter, avoiding the stringency of the Governor-General's enquiry, you write as follows: "I am directed by his Excellency the Governor in Council to request that you will draw up for submission to the Government of India, and Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State, a confidential report on the present state of the Bank of Bombay, with special reference to the causes which have induced the present difficulties of the Bank, and which are said to leave little hope of a dividend to the shareholders for some time to come. You are requested especially to note the changes in the direction and Secretary's office, and the period when any changes of system or management took place. This is necessary in justice to your predecessors as well as to yourselves. In the public criticisms on the Bank's management which have been published the difficulties of the Bank have been laid, to no inconsiderable extent, at the door of the former Government directors, and two of them (Messrs. Birch and G. Inverarity) have been denounced by name as arch-speculators in shares. It is only just to the Government directors of past years to show under whose management the mistakes, if any, were committed, which have injured the Bank. Your report should notice whether there are any and what differences between the charters of the three Government Banks in India, and whether any change in these respects is advisable as regards the charter of the Bombay Bank." I suppose that your report of the 30th June 1865 must have been written before that letter?—This letter was written on the 29th of June, as you say, from myself to myself, and the other is dated 30th June; they were probably written simultaneously.

4945. What was the real object of that letter of the 29th June; you did not answer the Governor-General's inquiry?—That is quite true.

4946. Was it to substitute another letter and to answer it, instead of replying to the Governor-General's demand?—I think that our object in writing the letter of the 30th June 1865 was to put the Government in possession of the only specific information which we were capable of affording them at that time.

4947. I have no doubt about that, but I want to understand the object of this letter of the 29th being written just the day before, when you must have had the other one prepared?—I have no doubt that we had the other one prepared.

4948. Was not the latter written rather as a reply to this letter of the 29th instead of as a reply to the letter of the Governor General, which it was not?—Certainly not. I think that the letter which we wrote on the 30th June 1865 contained the only reliable information which we could place the Governor General in possession of. At that time I think it was out of the power of any human being to state what the effect of this crisis would be.

4949. Then was this letter of the 30th June an answer to the Governor General's letter of the 22nd June; was it intended to be so?—I should say not. I do not think that we intended it to be so.

4950. It certainly is not an answer to the Governor General's letter.—No, and I do not think that it was intended to be so.

4951. Then was it intended to be an answer to this letter which you wrote at the same time?—No, I should say not. Our letter of the 30th June 1865 was written with the intention of supplying the Secretary of State with the information which he had asked for.

4952. What was the letter of the 29th of June written for?—It was written to obtain the information which was asked for, I should fancy.

4953. Then was the letter of the 30th of June an answer to it?—No, I should say not.

4954. Was that letter of the 29th June 1865 ever answered?—I do not think that that letter was ever answered.

4955. We will now take this letter of the 30th June; it states, "In reply to your endorsement No. 583 of this day's date, forwarding for our information, and for any observations we may wish to offer, a copy of a Despatch from Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State regarding the advances made by the Bank of Bombay on shares of certain Joint Stock Companies, we have the honour to submit the following explanations"?—Yes.

4956. There therefore seems to have been no hesitation in your mind at that time that there were advances on shares?—We had the idea of "collateral security," I have no doubt, running in our minds.

4957. "The resolution authorizing the adoption of the measure in question was passed on the 12th April last, and was to the following effect."—You will observe that the resolution rescinding the other one is not noticed in its body. I cannot explain that omission. I cannot give you any light on that at all.

4958. The first thing which strikes you in this report is, that it leaves out a most important part of the resolution of the 12th of April.—Quite so.

4959. It leaves out the rescission of the resolution of the 6th of August 1863?—Quite so.

4960. You must have had that resolution before you?—I have already stated that when the question of making these advances was put before us on that 12th of April, to the best of my recollection our attention was not drawn to the rescinding of that resolution.

4961. That I can very easily suppose, but when you were writing this letter you surely took this resolution and copied it?—I have no doubt that I copied the ipsissima verba which I received from the Secretary of the Bank.

4962. Did you not take the Minute Book in your hand?—To the best of my recollection, I wrote this letter from Poonah.

4963. Then you did not see the Minute Book?—Certainly not. I did not copy this from the Minute Book.

4964. Then from whom did you get this copy of the resolution?—I should say from the Secretary of the Bank.

4965. Are you able to say whether the Secretary sent up to you this portion of the resolution?—I am not prepared to say so. I should be very sorry to say that he had purposely kept a part of it away, or that it was not sent to us, but I am very much struck by the fact that it was not embodied in this letter; and, as I have already said, I distinctly state that when the resolution was agreed to on the 12th of April, no discussion took place as to the propriety of rescinding the resolution of 1863.

4966. Then I am to understand that you throw the onus of keeping back that passage on the Secretary, and that you are not yourself aware of having done so?—I am not at all inclined to throw the onus on the Secretary. I can only say that, to the best of my recollection, I embodied in this letter the information which I received from the Secretary; but far be it from me to say that the Secretary did not put that passage before me.

4968. I have already gone through the resolution itself, and it requires no further comment. The letter goes on to state, "On the above date the Bank's balance stood as follows:

	Rupees.
"Cash and currency notes at Head Office - - - - -	2,06,09,357
"Ditto ditto at Branches	85,00,246
"Rupees -	2,91,09,603"

—Yes; nearly three millions.

4969. Lying idle?—Yes, so we were told.

4970. Have you any reason to doubt that fact?—Not the slightest.

4971. I quote again from the letter:

"Taking into consideration that the above large amount was lying idle, and that there was much demand for what then appeared to be only temporary accommodation, the directors (ourselves included) agreed to make these advances, subject to the conditions above enumerated."

How did it appear that there was only a temporary accommodation required?—We were told, to the best of my recollection, by Mr. Hannay, when he proposed this measure, that these people had their capital invested in these securities, that they could not realize them at that moment, that it was just at a time when a good deal of uneasiness had set in in consequence of the news of the cessation of the war, and we thought that it would all pass off. That is the explanation which was given to us, and on which we unfortunately acted.

4972. Was not that news of the cessation of the war the very news which ought to have made you careful?—Quite so; there is no doubt about it.

4973. The letter adds, "And in doing so, they have not, it is admitted, exceeded the powers of their charter. There was a slight difference of opinion as to the rate at which the land shares should be valued; but as is customary the point was carried by the majority. The directors considered that the above measure would entail little or no risk, and would afford much relief at a time of considerable pressure. A total sum of 41,70,800 rupees was advanced on the security of the following shares." The first item is "39 Back Bay shares"?—Yes.

4974. You said in your letter to Sir Bartle Frere that the number was 36?—Yes.

4975. You had improved upon that, and had found 39?—I did not look at the letter which I had previously sent to Sir Bartle Frere. I accepted these figures as correct.

4976. You did not include in that statement the 80 shares deposited by Kursondass Madhowdass for safe custody, or the 10 shares of Cursetjee Furdoonjee, or the 8 or 10 shares of Byramjee Hormusjee Cama?—No; these were the number of shares consequent upon that resolution.

4977. What was the information which you received from the Secretary as to these other shares?—I have already read you his letter.

4978. I want to have it a little more particularly. Did he say that they were not deposited as security?—I will read to you his letter. He specifies the shares which were taken subsequently to this resolution, and then he goes on to say, "Besides the above, we hold a considerable number of Back Bay shares, which we took into safe custody from those names who have large loans from the bank on personal security; men such as B. H. Cama, Cursetjee Furdoonjee, and Kursondass Madhowdass. These loans were not nominally granted on shares," and so on.

4979. But were not they really granted on shares?—I should say so distinctly now, knowing what I do.

4980. Why did you not sift that expression "nominally"?—I did not suspect anything at that time. I wish that I had.

4981. If you had you would have found that there was an agreement that they should be considered security as much as any other security?—Quite so. I believe that in a great measure this resolution was passed with a view, so to speak, to legalize the past as well as the future. I do not consider that we were at all fairly treated on that occasion. Coming as we did new to the Bank, I think that it was the duty of the secretary, and of any one connected with the bank who had known of the previous practice, to inform us of it. It was put before us as a new thing.

4982. You were not informed on the 12th of April that there had ever been a thing of the kind done before?—Certainly not, and I do not consider that we were treated with candour; it was put before us as a new plan.

4983. Your letter goes on to say, "The above shares were taken as collateral security." You did not inquire to what they were collateral?—We were deluded entirely by that term "collateral."

4984. The term itself really means "side by side"?—Yes. I am quite aware of the error which we committed in that respect.

4985. Your letter continues: "Even in the present depressed state of the market those of both the Land Companies are considerably above par, the Back Bays being quoted at about 100 and the Elphinstones at 50 per cent. premium." Do you know why these particular companies were selected?—Simply, I should say, because they represented what were considered at the time the most solvent institutions of the day, and because also, I presume, the parties whom it was intended to assist had invested most largely in those particular shares.

4986. You did not know that Mr. Hannay was mixed up at that time with the Back Bay Company and the Asiatic Bank?—No; I should say that I did not; and looking now at the thing fairly and impartially by the present light, I do not believe that that resolution was proposed by Mr. Hannay with the view of favouring any particular object. I quite admit that it was a most unfortunate resolution, but I think that it was done in good faith. I do not think that there was any intention of favouring any particular company; and I would especially allude to the fact that the most disastrous shares were the Commercial Bank shares, which appear to have been largely advanced upon; and I do not believe that anybody in the direction was specially interested in the Commercial Bank.

4987. Were the shares of the Back Bay and the Elphinstone Companies selected because those were the shares which were quoted highest in the market at that time?—Probably; and because they were the shares which were held in the best general repute.

4988. It is quite clear from your own statement how enormously you had advanced upon the premium of the shares?—Quite so.

4990. Your letter proceeds to say "All advances of this description have for some time past been discontinued." Where did you get that information?—I presume from the Bank officials, and I think that I must have got it from my own knowledge of what took place. Without wishing to quibble upon words, I think that those words "some time" must be taken with reference to the period when it occurred. The whole transaction originated on the 12th of April, and the words "some time" might well apply to a fortnight; and I have looked over the proceedings, and I cannot see that any advances were made for a fortnight prior to the letter.

4991. We have found seven which were actually made in the months of May and June.—I cannot see anything after the 15th of June, and therefore a fortnight would probably meet those words "some time."

4992. There was no loss upon four of those advances on shares; upon three of them there was an actual loss. On the 27th of May there were three advances; one to Dossabhoy Dhunjeebhoy of one lac, another to the Bombay Joint Stock Corporation of two lacs (there was a loss upon that), and another to Manockjee Limjee of four lacs.—As far as my recollection serves me, I do not think that many of these shares were alluded to in the resolution.

4993. But we have the fact.—I consider myself responsible for what appears in those resolutions, unless anything to the contrary appears. If, after the application was taken into consideration, we granted a loan on the merits of the case, independently of all shares, and if the secretary, or the executive of the Bank, took shares in addition, I consider that I cannot be held responsible.

4995. Do any such advances appear on the Board's proceedings?—Yes, I see some here. I have them down in my notes.

4996. Before you made that statement, did you go to the Secretary, did you show this letter to the Secretary before you sent it off?—To the best of my recollection, I wrote it from Poona, and I do not think that I could have had any opportunity of showing it to the Secretary. In the commencement of May we were alive to the imprudence of the measure of advancing on shares I think.

4997. Your letter concludes with the following passage: "Pending an alteration in the charter, steps will be taken to make known to our colleagues in the direction the wishes of the Secretary of State; and we have no hesitation in saying that they will willingly assent to be placed in all respects on the same footing as the Banks of Bengal and Madras." Did Mr Hannay acquiesce very quietly in this?—Yes; Mr. Hannay, like everybody else, felt that the Bank was then entirely at the mercy of the Government. They were not at all riding the high horse in those days. They had on a previous occasion been doing so; they had wanted to dictate their own terms to the Government, but they were very humble then.

4998. That was when that letter of the Governor General was written?—I see that Mr. Hannay writes: "With respect to the letter of the Secretary of State, we must consider this most tyrannical communication on Thursday next." I cannot be responsible for Mr. Hannay's opinion of what was tyrannical or not. Every one connected with the Bank was in a very humble state of mind about that period; they had been helped out of the mud by Government aid, and I think that you will observe that in a demi-official letter to Sir Bartle Frere, I stated the fact that objection had been taken by the directors to advances on shares, and also that the Bank were willing to be assimilated to the Banks of Bengal and Madras.

4999. There was a letter from the Bombay Government to the Secretary of State of the 8th of July 1865?—Yes.

4999*a*. You, as Secretary to Government, I suppose drafted that letter?—I did not draft that letter, for this reason, that my own conduct was referred to in the matter, and I did not think that it would be becoming in me to sit in judgment on my own conduct. I believe that this letter was probably written by Sir Bartle Frere himself; I certainly did not write it.

5000. That was followed by the answer of the Secretary of State to the Bombay Government. No question arises upon that, except that you say that no specific instructions were given in consequence of that letter?—No specific instructions.

5001. Then follows a letter of the Governor-General of India to the Bombay Government of the 13th January 1866, in which he says: "On a full consideration of all these circumstances, and with special advertence to the Secretary of State's Financial Despatch of 2nd June, addressed to your Government, the Governor-General in Council is of opinion that an examination into the affairs of the Bank should no longer be delayed, with a view to such a revision of the terms upon which its business has been, and is conducted, as may seem expedient. The Governor-General in Council considers that the examination should comprise an investigation, not only into the assets and floating liabilities of the Bank, but into its transactions especially during the past six months." Then he accounts for not having pressed for an answer to his previous letter, in which he much more minutely stated what he wanted, because the Governor in Council had represented the thing as likely to improve.—I think that we all thought so at that time.

5002. He says: "But as the Government of India was subsequently assured, from a copy of a despatch addressed by your Government to the Secretary of State, No. 12, dated 8th July 1865, forwarded with your letter, No. 619, dated 10th July, that the liabilities of the Bank, though unusually large, were not likely to result in heavy loss, and that its difficulties were for the most part of a temporary character, his Excellency in Council was unwilling to press for an immediate inquiry which might have given rise to unfounded alarm and impaired the credit of the establishment."—Quite so.

5003. The date of that letter is important; 13th of January 1866 is the date when that report was called for?—Quite so.

5004. It is important to know why there was a delay?—I am prepared to state the reason of the delay.

5005. Then comes another letter, of the 17th January, at page 10 in the Blue Book, inculcating vigilant future management?—Yes.

5006. We have already asked you about that, and you say that no further steps were taken?—No, inasmuch as the Government were satisfied that all the direction were fully alive to the danger from what had taken place, and that their eyes were open, and that they were exercising the closest supervision.

5007. Then comes your next report to the Government, which is an answer to that inquiry; that report is at page 30 of the Blue Book, and is dated the 31st of March 1866.—Yes.

5008. You say: "We would in the first place beg to point out that the Government of India, in their letter calling for this information, have, in alluding to what are termed the 'monetary convulsions' that have occurred in Bombay during the past year, apparently mixed up two totally distinct events. The crisis that occurred in June last was a purely commercial one, brought about by the excessive and wild speculation that prevailed in Bombay during the year 1864, and by the sudden intelligence of the cessation of the American war. The December crisis, on the other hand, was occasioned by a return of commercial prosperity, the great demand for cotton, coupled with the introduction of a comparatively novel system of payment by advances, having created a drain on coined silver such as the Currency Department were unable to cope with. The Bank was at this epoch in no difficulty as regards its own affairs." Have not you, and has not Sir Bartle Frere in one of his minutes, raised an entirely false issue?—I think not.

5009. Where does the Governor General say that you were answerable for the December crisis?—I cannot say until I have looked through the letter.

5010. He begins by saying: "The frequent recurrence of financial pressure and commercial difficulties in the city of Bombay has engaged the serious and anxious attention of the Governor-General in Council."—We had only had two crises then, namely, the June one and the December one; and the December one, as we considered, was not in any way connected with the Bank of Bombay.

5011. Did the Government of India say that it was?—I think that it is obvious that they did so; we thought so most certainly. We most distinctly understood them to refer to that. They go on to say in the third paragraph on page 9 of the Blue Book, "On each of the occasions above referred to." There were no other occasions except those.

5012. The words are "On each of the occasions above referred to the Bank of Bombay, so far from being in a condition to afford the aid which might reasonably have been expected;" that is to say, they were not able to afford the aid, but they did not say that you had caused the crisis.—They commenced by saying "The frequent recurrence of financial pressure and commercial difficulties in the City of Bombay has engaged the serious and anxious attention of the Governor-General in Council;" and then in the third paragraph they say, "On each of the occasions above referred to, the Bank of Bombay, so far from being in a condition to afford the aid which might reasonably have been expected from an establishment which held the Treasury balances, was itself in circumstances of embarrassment." We denied being in circumstances of embarrassment.

5012*a*. Do you mean to say that at this epoch, the Bank was in no difficulty with regard to its own affairs?—We thought so then most certainly.

5013. Did you think that your securities, in which most of your capital was invested, were satisfactory?—Of course I do not think so now; but, when I drafted the letter, those securities had, as you heard from Mr. Robertson yesterday, been valued by men whose opinion I considered myself bound to adopt. They were the commercial directors of the place, and I confess that I should not have considered myself competent to differ from their opinion. In our letter to the Government we distinctly stated that that valuation was not our own, and we gave them to understand that it was annexed to the balance sheet of the Bank, and that we did not attempt to make any valuation of our own.

5014. A great portion of the capital was outstanding at that time, and has never been recovered.—Just so. It was a very smiling landscape in those days, and a very delusive one, unfortunately.

5015. Had you at that time gone into the affairs, or examined the securities yourself?—I had looked over this list of outstandings, and I saw the way in which they were covered, but I decline altogether to accept any responsibility for the data, or figures, of this report. I think that it is stated in the body of the letter that we had accepted the valuation of the commercial directors. I believe that the valuation is a correct one, and I will instance my belief by what I think is as strong evidence as you can have. It so happened at that time that the Secretary of State for India had said that he withdrew the objection to Government directors holding shares in the Bank of Bombay. At that time the shares in the Bank of Bombay were at about par, and the Secretary of State said that we might hold 40 shares, which was equal to 4,000*l.* worth of shares. I considered that statement to be such a correct one that, on the strength of it, I telegraphed home to my friends in England to advance me 4,000*l.* with which to purchase 40 Bank of Bombay shares, believing, as I did, that the capital was then intact. I cannot give a better illustration of my faith in the accuracy of the statement.

Mr. F. S. Chapman.

5016. In your letter of the 31st March 1866, you go on to say: "With regard to the first occasion, previous to April 1865, loans were granted with an amount of recklessness that appears now to be almost incredible. Not only were credits given to individuals and firms of recognized mercantile position to an extent far in excess of the limit that prudence demanded should be placed on such transactions, but persons who were not even engaged in any ostensible commercial pursuits were accommodated with large sums of money, which could only have been required for purposes of share speculation." That is a very just and correct statement, and it would almost do for our Report.—I have to express my regret now that in writing that, I did not take more blame in the early part of April and May for those advances on shares, which I did not know then would turn out so disastrously. I think that I ought to have taken more blame on ourselves at that time.

5017. You must have gone into this matter, and have got all these facts?—Yes.

5018. Had you examined into these large loans?—I was guilty of looking at the list of outstandings and loans.

5019. You had had a list of outstandings prepared?—Yes; we had had it prepared as far back as June or July, in the shape of a tabular statement.

5020. And I suppose that you had made inquiries as to the credit of these people who had had these large loans?—This is the sort of conversation which took place at the Bank: "How about So-and-so's loan?" I can specify one instance, namely, that of Cursetjee Furdoonjee. Mr. Stewart would say: "I have heard that he has shipped cotton very largely; he is in a position to pay 12 annas in the rupee, and if he goes on much longer he will be able to pay the whole 16 annas." Before that report was written all the heads of the great native trading community were believed to be perfectly solvent. None of the gigantic failures—the Agra, the Asiatic, the Commercial, and so on—had taken place at that time. I admit that it was an entire delusion, but still there it was.

5021. Your report continues: "As the gentlemen who were the official directors during the period referred to are not in the country to defend themselves, we have some hesitation in passing judgment on the management, but, as far as we can see, it admits of no justification."—Exactly.

5022. But then you go on to say: "The only excuse that can be offered is that at the time this most wild speculative excitement set in the Bank had the misfortune to double its capital. Money was very plentiful throughout Bombay; a number of new monetary institutions, under the denomination of Banks and Financials, had sprung into existence, thereby occasioning a good deal of competition, and the consequence was that the Bank, looking too much to making a high dividend, and over confident in the experience of the past (it is believed that a sum of 25,000 rupees would fully cover all the losses the Bank ever sustained) employed its capital in a very imprudent manner, and instead of having it available in the hour of need, the great bulk of it was locked up in loans and advances to parties from whom it was hopeless to expect punctual payment." I quite agree with those statements. The only other point to which I wish to call your attention particularly in this report is as to the part in which you contend that you did gather up your resources. On the 30th of June 321 lacs were outstanding?—Yes, I think so.

5023. You say that 79 lacs were realized?—Yes.

5024. And you say that 126 lacs were overdue?—Yes.

5025. What became of the other 116 lacs?—I suppose that they had been renewed.

5026. Did you inquire into those renewals?—No.

5027. That was a very important point?—It was a most important point. I will take the case of Cursetjee Furdoonjee, or the case of any one of these enormous loans. We believed at that time that those people were coming round; there had been an immense rise in the price of cotton, and I confess that that was a matter in which I was guided by the opinion of commercial men.

5028. If you had looked into that matter, I think that you would have seen how very dangerous it was.—I have no doubt that the whole of this report was illusory. I quite admit that. I quite admit that those figures were illusory; but I say that at the time when it was written I did not believe that it was so. We could not foresee those gigantic failures which followed a few months afterwards.

5029. You do not report upon an important fact, namely, that in September and October 1865, you had a great rise in the value of shares, which, if you had availed yourselves of, would have enabled you to have got out with a very slight loss in comparison.—I quite agree with that. I think that that is a great reflection upon our management. I was absent from Bombay for the whole of the autumn of 1865, but I quite concur that in my opinion that is a most serious charge against our management at that time, namely, that we did not realize. But I submit that the question of realizing securities is one upon which Government directors could not possibly give advice. We did not know the state of the share market, and if these people had put shares to any extent into the market, the probability is that the whole thing would have collapsed. I do not think that the Government directors can be chargeable in that respect.

5030. I am not applying it particularly to the Government directors.—Looking to the whole management, I admit that it was a very great blot in our administration at that period, that we did not get rid of the securities, if there was an outlet for those securities.

5031. There was no attempt apparently to take advantage of that very great rise?—No; it would have been a very great benefit to us if we had done so.

5032. Did you know at all that Mr. Donald Robertson and Mr. Blair had been largely engaged in share speculations?—Not at all.

5033. You were not aware that Mr. Donald Robertson himself was holding shares to a large amount?—No. I had not the smallest acquaintance with Mr. Robertson, and knew nothing of his affairs.

5034. You knew nothing of Mr. Blair's previous proceedings?—No. Mr. Blair was with us a very short time.

5035. You were not in Bombay when the share mania took place, about June 1864?—No.

5036. You say in paragraph 19 of your letter of the 31st of March 1866, "The operations of the Bank, not only during the past six but during the past ten months, will, we believe, bear the strictest scrutiny, and there is no prospect of the loss of a rupee on a single new transaction entered into during that period?"—Yes.

5037. No doubt great losses had taken place before that period?—Whatever took place during those six months we must be responsible for, for we did it with our eyes open.

5038. In the next paragraph you say, "With regard to the future, the only practical difference between the charter granted to this Bank and that granted to the Bank of Bengal is that contained in section 32 of Bombay Act X. of 1863, authorizing advances being made on shares, and we have reason to believe that the directors would have no objection to its being expunged, as for the last ten months this power has never been made use of."—Exactly.

5039. You will find that there were a great number of advances on shares during that period.—I have the particulars extracted from the minutes, and I cannot see that I was ever present on any occasion when advances were made on shares. I was absent from the commencement of August till the end of the year.

5040. Mr. Norman, who was the other director who signed this report with you, had only just come into the direction.—Yes. I wrote the report, and was responsible for it.

5041. In those months there were a great number of advances on shares. It was a very hazardous statement. Did you make any inquiry of Mr. Robertson before you made it?—To the best of my recollection I sent a draft of my letter to Mr. Hannay for verification as to figures, and I am not certain whether I sent it to Mr. Robertson; I am not prepared to say that I did. I got my figures from Mr. Hannay, and my facts also in a great measure.

5042. Mr. Hannay must have misinformed you immensely. I will give you the number of transactions.—Do those appear on the proceedings?

5043. Some do, and some do not. There were no less than 30 transactions on shares in those 10 months.—I think that it is very possible that when those applications came before the Board they never appeared in the form of applications for money to be advanced on shares. I think that it is very likely that they were disposed of on their merits, irrespectively of shares.

5044. No; there were a great many of them on shares.—I am only hazarding that as a surmise. I cannot conceive how any Government directors, having committed themselves on two occasions to this opinion, could have authorized advances on shares. I am sure that I could not have stultified myself to that extent.

5045. You appear to have been absent at Poona at that time. There is the case of Mr. Bender on the 11th of December 1865; had you come back then?—No.

5046. Take the case of Cowasjee Pochajee on the 15th and 22nd of August 1865; were you then at the Board?—No.

5047. You had come back on the 28th of March 1866?—Yes, certainly.

5048. In the case of Hormusjee Cursetjee on the 28th of March 1866, the security of shares was deposited.—Will you kindly refer to the minutes. I believe that I was present in March 1866.

5049. On the 28th of March and the 5th of April 1866 he got two advances on the security of shares?—I do not see them down in the minutes.

5050. Just look at the week before.—The week before is the 19th of March. I see Hormusjee Dhunjeebhoy.

5051. That is not the name.—I do not see those applications at all.

5052. How could that loan have been granted upon shares without being brought before the Board?—I decline all responsibility for it. The understanding was that all business should be brought before the Board, and if it was not brought before the Board, I decline all responsibility for it.

5053. Why did you not put upon the minutes that all business was to be brought before the Board. If you had done so you would have protected yourselves?—I think that it was a very great mistake our not doing it.

5054. At the very time when you say that that verbal arrangement was come to, you had a discussion, and it could have been added to that minute then if you had only acted with a little firmness?—It was very careless not to have it put down.

5054*a*. You had something put down, but not that?—Exactly.

5055. I find that this report to the Governor General is dated 31st of March 1866?—Yes.

5056. I find that it was not sent to the Governor General at that date; for on the 12th of May he says: "The Governor General in Council cannot but express his regret and surprise that any delay should have occurred in the receipt of this report, on the result of which the character of the Bank and its future arrangements with the Government so greatly depend. His Excellency trusts that no further time will be lost in furnishing the information so urgently required." At that very moment you had made your report?—We had got into another difficulty then.

5057. Then on the 19th of June 1866 the Governor General says, "Meanwhile his Excellency in Council awaits with anxiety the long-expected report on the affairs of the Bank."—Yes.

5058. That report was asked for on the 13th of January 1866?—Yes.

5059. You actually had it prepared and ready to furnish on the 31st of March 1866?—Yes.

5060. And yet on the 19th of June 1866 the Governor General had not had it?—Yes.

5061. What explanation have you to give of that very great delay?—I can only say that it was laid before the Bombay Government on the date which it bears; and I believe that the Blue Book contains a good many minutes which were attached to it by the Government.

5062. The Governor writes a minute which is dated 29th May 1866; probably he began to write his minute after he got the letter of the 12th of May from the Government.—I think that on that point, perhaps, Sir Bartle Frere will be able to tell you that he was in very frequent demi-official correspondence with Sir John Lawrence on the subject. I really cannot say why the members of the Government delayed minuting on the letter; our letter was placed before them on the particular date which it bears.

5063. Are you aware whether there is any demi-official or confidential correspondence other than what is contained in this Confidential Appendix?—I have not read that Confidential Appendix.

5064. You perhaps are not able to say, or feel a little delicacy in saying, what was the reason of this great delay?—No, I have no delicacy about stating it.

5065. I see that the Governor wrote his minute on your report upon the 29th of May 1866, and that Mr. Ellis wrote his minute on the 11th of June.—They got into a sort of currency discussion at that time, and they mixed up the two things.

5066. On the 8th of September 1866 there was the report of a committee on the Bank losses, which is printed at page 58 of the Blue Book?—Yes.

5067. Will you tell me how that committee came to be appointed?—Yes. It so happened that Mr. E. F. Harrison, who was an officer of the Bengal Government, and who is now at the head of the Financial Department, was at Bombay on duty connected with his account department. We were aware that he was held in very high estimation by the Government of India, and they probably had the fullest confidence in him. By that time we had had three separate valuations of the assets of the Bank. There was the original one in June, in which the possible losses were estimated at 30 lacs; there was the subsequent one in December, in which that estimate was adhered to; and there was the one at the half-yearly meeting, in which the loss was put down at an additional amount of 50 lacs; that was after the great failures. At that time there was still a great deal of distrust existing in Bombay, and a great number of letters appeared in the papers, and there was a good deal of doubt in the public mind as to whether even that report, placing the losses at 50 lacs additional, making in all 80 lacs, was a correct report or not. The Government of Bombay believed that the directors who were then in office were as competent men as could be obtained to make the valuation. However, I believe that I made the suggestion to Sir Bartle Frere. I said, "The Government of India are constantly asking for information from us as to the assets and liabilities of the Bank."

5068. You have ceased to be a Government director?—Yes; and I said, "It seems to me that we cannot do better than avail ourselves of the assistance of Mr. E. F. Harrison, and we will associate with him two gentlemen, whom we believe to possess the greatest amount of confidence in the community." Sir Bartle Frere acquiesced in that arrangement; he applied to the Government of India for the services of Mr. Harrison for that particular duty; he received the required sanction, and that Commission was appointed. The Hon. Mr. Hunter was associated with Mr. Harrison.

5069. What Mr. Hunter was that?—I forget the firm to which he belonged; but, at all events, he was supposed to be entirely free from speculation of all sorts, and his firm was supposed to be one of the few which had not speculated. There was also a native appointed, Dinshaw Manockjee.

We were most desirous to get a correct idea of the assets, and that Commission was appointed for the purpose. We did not want to throw discredit on the Bank directors, and to show them that we doubted the accuracy of their report.

At that time we had in the direction men in whom the Government had the fullest confidence, and we suggested confidentially to the directors that we proposed to make this additional inquiry into the assets; but we said, "We would rather that this proposition should come from you, and not emanate from us, inasmuch as we do not wish it to be thought that we cast any reflection on your management, or on the accuracy of your estimates. Therefore if you will apply for this Commission, we shall be prepared to grant it." And I believe that the Commission was actually appointed by the Government, but nominally at the request of the directors. That is my recollection of the matter.

5070. Had not the Government of India anything to do with the nomination?—Nothing whatever; it was suggested by us. At that time I was most anxious to get anything approaching to a reliable estimate. There was the report of these directors in the summer of 1866, and there were still doubts about its correctness on the part of the public, and we thought that that was the most satisfactory way of assuring the public that we had really ascertained the worst.

5071. That Commission added to the former estimates of loss a sum of 34½ lacs?—Yes.

5072. Making upwards of a million of capital?—Yes; and there is a million since then. I am sure that you must agree that it was impossible for any one at that time to have arrived at anything like an estimate that could be relied on. I do not know what course could have been adopted. It shows that we were most anxious to arrive at the truth.

5073. Did you draft the next letter; I see that it is signed "J. King, Acting Under Secretary to Government, Bombay." It is at page 59 of the Blue Book?—I did not draft that letter. At that time there had been so much abuse and obloquy cast on the directors, that it was impossible to get any respectable people to serve as directors; and we were obliged to act very tenderly towards them, or they would have thrown up, in a body, the office of director, which was not by any means an enviable office.

5074. In that letter the Government of Bombay compliments both the directors and the committee; and then the Government of India, a few days afterwards, on the 3rd of October 1866, compliments nobody; and there is a particular passage to which I wish to call your attention. It is the sixth paragraph of the letter of the 3rd of October. "The wide discrepancy between these several estimates, framed during a period not exceeding six months, renders it more than ever necessary to insist upon the production of the detailed information which the Government of India called for in the 15th paragraph of their despatch to Bombay, dated 13th July last, No. 1456, but which, notwithstanding repeated reminders, has not yet been furnished."

5075. Was the form of the tabular statement which you sent to the Bank of Bombay on the 24th of October 1866 drawn up in accordance with the minute particulars asked for by the despatch of the 13th July 1866?—No.

5077. How was it that such an important inquiry as this, asking for detailed information, should have been cut down to such inconceivably small limits as are comprised in those headings?—My belief is that the Government at that time were of opinion that it would be most inexpedient and unadvisable to furnish the Government of India with such details as they required. I have no doubt that Sir Bartle Frere will be prepared to tell you why he acted in that way.

What the Government of India wanted us to do was to send almost a transcript, I believe, of all the books of the Bank of Bombay over to them, or certainly information which the Government of Bombay considered that it would be highly inexpedient to let out from the Bank. I have no hesitation in saying that to the best of my recollection the Government of India never called for that information in any specific tabulated form. I am certain that this form is in Mr. Erskine's handwriting, and I believe that he prepared it as a sort of compromise for the Government of India.

We believed that in sending the report of the special Commission, of which I have spoken, to the Government of India, we had put them in possession of everything which it was material for them to know. They wanted to know precisely what were the assets and the liabilities of the Bank. We had to the best of our power obtained that information, in the best form, and in the best way that we could, and we furnished it to them without any delay.

5078. Do you mean to say that it was anything like furnishing a complete statement to the Governor General of India, to confine it to sums of above three lacs?—I am not prepared to say anything about that statement, except that I believe the statement to be quite a useless one, and I never expected that they would get any information from it. The information which we thought that we could give the Government of India was the information obtained by a Commission at which one of their own officers had presided, and who had gone round to Calcutta, and could have told them anything which they wanted to know.

5079. Was it considered that the frame of that heading would prevent any statement or disclosure of bills which had been renewed over and over again?—I admit that I think that that statement is quite a valueless one for any practical purpose.

5080. You had by that time some experience as a Bank director?—I was out of it at that time.

5081. But still you had some experience as a Bank director?—Quite so.

5082. I suppose that you were fully competent at that time to have told the Government that the statement would be utterly useless to the Government of India?—It was about the time when the charter was to be renewed, and they kept on saying, "We must have this."

5083. I think very properly.—The Government of Bombay did not think so. I believe that they thought it an improper request; that is, in my opinion, the reason why they did not comply with it. I am only an executive officer, and you will probably hear that from Sir Bartle Frere; but my impression is, that they considered that it would be inexpedient to expose the affairs of the Bank by any statement to be sent by post two thousand miles.

5084. They either wanted to make a statement, or they did not; if they wanted to make a statement, surely they ought to have made a correct and full one; ought they not?—Certainly.

5085. And if they intended to send a valueless one, they had better have sent none?—I do not say that they wanted to send a valueless one, but I only say that this statement was not calculated to inform the Government of India.

5086. Or to inform any one?—No.

5087. The letter of the 13th of July 1866 from the Government of India to the Government of Bombay is printed at page 27 of the Blue Book, and it contains the following passage: "That there may be no further misapprehension on this subject, the statement which his Excellency the Governor General in Council requires is comprised in the following particulars:—

"1. The banks, firms, and individuals to which the Bank is under advances.

"2. The dates and amounts of such advances.

"3. The securities upon which they have been made, and the sums advanced upon each security."—Yes; the Government wanted us to send them a complete statement.

5088. If you had done that you might probably have saved the expense of this Commission?—Very likely; but I do not see how we could have done it without appointing some one specially for the purpose of doing it. They wanted every particular of the Bank to be sent to Simla or Calcutta; and the Government of Bombay considered it inexpedient to do so.

5089. But did the Government of Bombay write and say so to the Government of India?—I believe that communications of that sort were made by Sir Bartle Frere to Sir John Lawrence.

5090. You would rather leave it to Sir Bartle Frere to speak to that point?—Yes. As an executive officer of the Government it was my business to do what they told me. I am merely giving you my conjectures and reasons why they did not do so. I should like it to be taken down that it is mere opinion on my part that that was the motive which actuated the Government of Bombay, namely, that they considered it to be inexpedient.

5091. The demi-official correspondence which we shall have is, I see, referred to in one particular place, at page 95, of the Blue Book; the reference to it is in a letter from Mr. Lushington, of the 15th of November 1866, in which he says, "In reply to your demi-official communication dated 3rd instant, I am directed to inform you that the Governor General in Council will be prepared to take into consideration the expediency of renewing the agreement with the Bank of Bombay, on receipt of the information called for in July, of the liabilities of the Bank, and of the proposed bye-laws of the Bank for the conduct of business; the liabilities above referred to need not embrace details relating to the names, &c. of the persons concerned."—Quite so.

5092. Do you mean to say that that justified the Government in restricting the tabular statement to sums above three lacs?—This letter was never addressed to the Government at all; they had a habit of addressing their own officers (of whom Mr. Lushington was one) direct; and this was a letter addressed, as you will observe, if the Blue Book is accurate, from Mr. E. H. Lushington to Mr. J. L. Lushington; it was not addressed to the Government of Bombay at all.

5093. Do you think that the demi-official correspondence did authorize the Government in any way to reduce the returns simply to sums above three lacs?—I would rather not commit myself to any opinion upon that point. I can only state that the information called for by the Government of India was not furnished, and I would rather confine my answer to that point.

5094. I understand you to say distinctly, that that return of sums above three lacs was asked for by the orders of the Bombay Government, that in fact it was drawn up by Mr. Claude Erskine, a member of the Government of Bombay?—Yes, it is in Mr. Claude Erskine's handwriting; he was a member of the Council of Bombay.

5095. The next point to which I will take you relates to Mr. Brown's release, and I will refer to the Board minutes of the 6th of July 1865. You recollect that the secretary was authorized at his discretion to sign any deeds or resolutions which might be agreed to by other managers?—Yes.

5096. Do you recollect who proposed that resolution?—I cannot charge my memory with stating. I should think, most probably the chairman; he generally took the initiative.

5097. Did you oppose that resolution?—I did not; I acquiesced in it.

5098. Do you think that it was prudent to give the secretary such extensive powers as that?—I thought so at the time, and I am not prepared to say that I do not think so now; all these meetings of creditors required very prompt action to be taken, and if you had confidence in the integrity and intelligence of your executive officer, I cannot see why he should not be competent to decide what was best for the interests of the Bank.

5099. Do you not think it would have been better and safer for you to have said that he should attend the meeting and report to you?—To the best of my recollection, business of that sort required to be very promptly dealt with; they wanted to get rid, as quickly as possible, of all these doubtful people, and to put their affairs in as straight a condition as possible, and my impression is that very prompt action was required. It was not a matter which you could, with any degree of advantage, refer to a body of men, but if you had confidence in the integrity and intelligence of your executive officer, he was a proper and fit representative to act in your behalf in such matters; and I must say that, looking back now, I do not think that it was a mistake. Of course it is a matter of opinion.

5100. It is a matter of opinion. I should have thought it very much wiser to let him report to you. That was Mr. Lidderdale's opinion, was it not?—Yes; and if you will allow me I should like to state my reasons for differing from Mr. Lidderdale. I think that I can put in a connected form the whole story of Mr. Brown's release. Mr. Brown was being hunted from two opposite sides of India. The attention of Sir Bartle Frere was first directed through the newspaper to the fact of Mr. Brown's enormous liabilities, and to the fact of his having obtained this release. He extracted the part of the newspaper, and he wrote as follows:—"I would beg the Chief Secretary to draw the attention of his brother Government directors of the Bank of Bombay to the letter to the 'Times of India,' of which a copy is annexed, and to submit a memorandum, such as can, if necessary, be sent to the Secretary of State on the subject of the release said to have been given to a debtor to the Bank." That was when Sir Bartle Frere's attention was first called to Mr. Brown's case. I was quite aware that Sir Bartle Frere objected most strongly to the action which the Government directors had taken in the matter in acceding to Mr. Brown's release, and therefore, in submitting the explanation of the Bank, I considered it fair to my brother directors, although I was no party to Mr. Brown's release myself, as I was not present, to state how I had acted in the matter, and I wrote as follows:—"In submitting this correspondence for the consideration of the Honourable Board, I beg to explain that I declined to support Mr. Lidderdale's proposal, dated 13th July last, because I considered it too indefinite, and because I considered it would only hamper the Secretary, without effecting any good. At the same time, I informed Mr. Lidderdale I should be happy to support any proposition he might bring forward for defining and limiting the Secretary's powers with reference to these meetings of creditors. On the occasion of Mr. Lidderdale's specific proposition to refuse Mr. Brown his release, I was absent in Poona. It is difficult, after the event, to hazard an opinion how one would have acted had one been present, but in justice to my brother Government directors, I think it right to state that in all probability I should have done as they did. It was, I believe, clearly ascertained that Mr. Brown had not withheld any assets at the time the release was granted to him, and that no possible advantage to the Bank could have been derived by the institution of legal proceedings. The main and original mistake was, as it seems to me, ever granting the loans."

That was my view of Mr. Brown's release; and, as I stated at the time, the reason why I did not support Mr. Lidderdale's proposal was that I considered that it was not fair to give to an officer indefinite instructions unless there were special reasons.

5101. If there were special reasons he was to refer the matter to the Board?—Who was to be the judge of what the special reasons were? He was called upon to act in concert with a great number of representatives of other banking institutions.

5103. His liabilities are 43 lacs, and his assets are 14,000 rupees. He said 25,000; but that statement is corrected by his own trustee, Mr. Robertson, who said 14,000 rupees were realized. Can you believe that justice was done in that hurried way?—I believe not. I think that it was perhaps a mistake granting that release to Mr. Brown. With regard to Mr. Brown's liabilities, no release was granted to his partner, Mr. Best; and if any creditor wished to have the matter sifted in the Insolvent Court, there was no reason why Mr. Best should not be proceeded against. Brown and Best, I believe, were liable for all the three loans.

5104. No; they were only jointly liable for one of the three loans. Mr. Best was not liable for the other two. Mr. Lidderdale raised the question as to giving such large powers to the secretary, and the point is, whether you should not have adopted something more definite. For instance, you might have moved an amendment upon his motion to the effect that the secretary should report all these cases to you.—I certainly think that that would have been better. I suppose that was my reason for not supporting Mr. Lidderdale upon that occasion. I say in my letter, "At the same time I informed Mr. Lidderdale that I should be happy to support any proposition he might bring forward for defining and limiting the secretary's powers with reference to these meetings of creditors."

5105. You say that you were not present at the meeting?—No; I was not responsible for Mr. Brown's release.

5106. Did you inform yourself of the grounds upon which the directors thought it inexpedient to let Mr. Brown go through the Insolvent Court?—I say that it was, I believe, clearly ascertained that Mr. Brown had not withheld any assets at the time when the release was granted.

5107. Do you know the reason why it was thought by the directors inexpedient to let Mr. Brown go through the Insolvent Court?—No.

5108. You never heard that they considered it impolitic that the public should know that such loans were made with the money of the Bank?—No. I was very anxious about this matter of Mr. Brown's release. I did not wish to screen myself from responsibility, and from the blame which I knew would attach to my brother Government directors, and therefore, in submitting the case of Mr. Brown to the Government, I placed before them the minute which I recorded on a similar occasion, when there was a wish to release Mr. Taylor. I said, "I think the best plan will be to reconsider this question at a full meeting of directors." That was with respect to Mr. George Taylor's release. "The main and, indeed, only point which it seems to me we have to consider is the course that will be most conducive to the interests of the Bank. I submit it is no part of our duty to put ourselves forward as the censors of commercial morality; and proceed against these men simply with a view to ensuring their punishment. If, therefore, it can be satisfactorily shown that the Bank is likely to recover more by private arrangement than by legal procedure, I would most certainly adopt the former alternative. In deciding this point I quite concur with Mr. Lushington that we should not be deterred by a fear of exposing our own bad management."

I had no apprehension with respect to our own bad management.

"Whatever course may be adopted I beg most strongly to record my protest against any different treatment being shown to different individuals similarly situated. Messrs. ———" (there is a blank here, but the names are Messrs. Taylor and Diver) "are, I understand, jointly our debtors, and whatever steps are taken against the one should be taken against the other." There was a proposal to release Mr. Taylor, and, I believe, to consign Dr. Diver to gaol, or not to release him.

5109. Then this case was brought before the Board and was fairly discussed, but it was not so in the other case?—I thought that it was fair to read that.

5110. I have now to call your attention to the tabular statement of Mr. Brown's debts, which was sent to the Government of India. I believe that it was prepared in the Bank of Bombay?—I do not think that it was.

5111. We have distinct evidence that it was.—I think that that evidence is erroneous.

5112. Who prepared that statement?—I believe that I prepared it from Mr. Robertson's letter.

5113. Mr. Robertson's letter agrees verbatim with the statement?—Yes.

5114. Did you enquire into the facts and dates?—No.

5115. You simply made up the tabular form from that letter?—Yes; I had no reason to believe that there was any concealment of any sort.

5116. I suppose that in following that letter you thought that you were telling the Government what the loans originally granted by the Bank of Bombay were?—It never occurred to me to have any mistrust; there were the three transactions put in the order of the amount.

5117. But unfortunately they are in the reverse order of date?—Yes.

5118. So as to look as if the Bank was increasingly cautious instead of increasingly reckless?—I do not think that there was any intention of that sort; it never occurred to me at the time, and it does not occur to me now.

5119. You did not know that 45,000 rupees was not the original sum granted?—No; I thought that it was a more convenient way to send the information to the Government of India in a tabular form.

5120. You exercised no scrutiny yourself into the matter?—No.

5121. You adopted Mr. Robertson's letter verbatim?—Yes.

5122. Are you prepared to say that that tabular form was prepared by you?—The heading is, "Statement showing the several loans granted by the Bank of Bombay to Mr. Brown, the nature of the securities by which they are covered, and the value of such securities at the present day." I prepared that heading myself.

5123. Then you, I suppose, thought that they were the sums originally granted?—I had no suspicion about the matter, and I cannot say that I have any now. I do not think that there was any intention to mislead.

5124. Here is the evidence of Mr. Clarke; he says most distinctly that he prepared the form.—My recollection is that I made the heading of that tabular form.

5125. It is extraordinary that he should have volunteered that information?—Yes; especially of a criminating character.

5126. What is the meaning of this addition, "N.B. This statement was prepared on 10th March 1866." You first sign it, "F. S. Chapman, Chief Secretary to Government;" why do you then put that nota bene?—Because it was not sent to the Government of India till 1867, and I wanted them to know that it was prepared in March 1866.

5127. At page 113 of the Blue Book, in your letter to Mr. Lushington of the 16th of March 1867 you say, "The foregoing will show the Governor General in Council the view taken by the Government of Bombay in this case; the opinions were recorded long ago, and it seems that no useful object would be attained by now prosecuting the subject further. I am in conclusion to apologise for the delay in replying to your letter." It appears that the Governor General sent for that statement on the 10th of February 1866?—Yes.

5128. And it was more than 13 months before he got the letter?—Yes.

5129. Can you explain that?—Yes. It was my duty as Secretary to draft letters for the approval of the members of the Government. I drafted a reply to the Government of India, and placed it before the members of the Government on the 13th of March 1866, and that statement was not returned to my office till the 3rd of March 1867.

5130. That was not the usual way of doing business in Bombay, was it?—I do not think that we can be found fault with for want of promptitude, but as to this particular occasion I dare say that you will have an explanation. My explanation is that the letter was placed before the Government in March 1866, and was returned to me in March 1867; there was no delay on my part.

5131. Did not you ever remind the Government of it?—No; I am sorry to say that I did not, although it was my duty to do so. We thought that the whole thing had been done with. The members of the Government recorded very strong opinions, implying considerable censure upon our conduct with regard to Mr. Brown's release. The inquiry emanated from the Governor himself, his attention having been drawn to the newspaper report.

5132. Can you explain to us how there was so great a delay in the transfer of the Treasury balances at the branches established by the Bank?—I cannot tell you that; I think that the Bank wanted to get better terms, and that a great deal of correspondence went on.

5133. Did not you write to the Governor General to get leave to transfer these balances?—I think not, that I think took place before my time.

5134. After May 1865 almost all advances made by the Bank were brought before the Board, or the weekly committee, were they not?—They were brought before the Board, that was the understanding.

5135. What was the case with renewals?—I think that we trusted entirely to the executive of the Bank as to renewals.

5136. That was a very important duty?—It was.

5137. Many of these bills have been renewed over and over again?—Yes, I think that I may say that we trusted generally to the executive of the Bank to retrieve the errors of the past, and we contented ourselves very much by seeing that no new bad business was done.

5138. You were aware that there were loans on personal security merely, even in your time?—I should like to see them.

5139. Do you not remember Mr. Lushington disapproving of one particularly, namely the one to Cursetjee Hormusjee Chinoy. There is a discount minute of 11th May 1865 upon his application?—I do not think that I was present on that occasion.

5140. (The President, looking at the Exhibit A. 70.) Mr. Lushington strongly objected to lending money on personal security; I wish to know what part you took in it. Is there a minute there of yours? You agreed with the president, Mr. Hannay, on that occasion as to lending money upon personal security?—I did.

5141. Cursetjee Hormusjee Chinoy's application was No. 2 on the minutes. Mr. Lushington raised the discussion, and said that he thought that all the great losses had been incurred in loans on personal security. He says: "I would grant no loans on personal security only." Then Mr. Hannay says: "Cursetjee Hormusjee Chinoy is an old constituent, and has always been considered a good man. I would discount his draft." Then Mr. Brown says: "I agree with the President on applications 1, 2, and 4." Premchund of course agreed. He says: "I agree with Mr. Brown. Application 5 is good also." Then Mr. Lushington objects, and Mr. Brown says: "It is true that credit is for a time severely shaken in Bombay, but I cannot agree with Mr. Lushington that on these accounts all loans on personal security should be refused; such a policy would surely precipitate a panic, and recoil tenfold on the Bank itself." Then you wrote, "I agree with the President in cases 1, 2, and 3, and will adopt the course suggested by Mr. Brown in case No. 4." That was a late period for your faith in personal security to remain unshaken?—Those people were very good people, the name of Premabhoy Hemabhoy was a historical name in Western India.

5142. But No. 2 is C. H. Chinoy's?—Yes.

5143. Did you sign the monthly returns to the Government?—I should like to see them.

5144. They do not refer in the headings to personal securities only (Exhibit A. 25 A, was shown to the witness)?—They were published in the Government Gazette, I believe.

5145. The information was such as hardly to call the attention of anybody to the fact that loans were going out on personal security, the words being merely "other securities."—Yes.

5146. I will call your attention to the loans on landed security. There is the case of Dossabhoy Merwanjee & Co., which was in your time. If you look at the Board minute of the 17th of May 1865, you will see that you were present, and that you referred that matter to the solicitor?—Yes.

5147. The directors granted them three lacs?—Yes.

5148. Was there any discussion at the Board on that day, namely, the 17th of May 1865? The Bank had first of all granted them one lac on the 24th of February 1865, that was before you were on the direction. The order was passed on the 17th of May that they should have three lacs if the solicitor was satisfied with the security, and if the current loan was paid off. It never was paid off, but on the 23rd of May the Bank granted them two lacs, and on the 9th of June one lac more.—I see that on the 17th of May a loan of three lacs was made to Dossabhoy Merwanjee & Co., and the terms on which it was made were the condition that the Bank's solicitor should be satisfied with the security; we left it entirely to the solicitor.

5149. Was there any discussion at the Board upon the matter on that day?—I do not remember it.

5150. Did anybody refer to the 34th section of the Act, which says, "nor shall they make any loan or advance on the mortgage or in any other manner on the security of any lands, houses, or other immoveable property, or on the title-deeds relating thereto"?—I do not think so, but I observe that at this Board meeting we required the solicitor to be satisfied that it was in order; the object of the loan was to pay off current loans.

5151. Was there any discussion upon the legality of such a transaction?—I presume that there must have been some doubt, or else no reference would have been made to the solicitor.

5152. Was your attention called to the terms of the Act?—I suppose so.

5153. What was the doubt about it?—I cannot call to mind the particular circumstances, but I apprehend that, unless there had been some question, we should have disposed of the matter without reference to the solicitor.

5154. I have no doubt whatever that if the Bank had lent a man a certain sum of money upon a promissory note, and if in the next year he had come and said, "I cannot pay you, but here is my land," the Bank might have taken the land as security, they not having lent the money upon it; but in this case they actually lent money upon land at the time when they took the security.—Was it beyond the amount required to pay off the current loans?

5155. Yes, the amount required to pay off the current loans was only one lac, and you lent three lacs.—I cannot explain it at all, but we evidently had a doubt in our minds. Latterly the bank became a sort of pawnbroker; we had ships and land, and every thing which we could lay hold of.

5156. Supposing that you have an antecedent debt, you may take any security you like, but here is the actual lending of money upon a house.—We referred the matter to the solicitor.

5157. Do you remember a letter being written by the Government of India on the 11th of July 1866, calling for particulars as to the loans to Shapoorjee Dhunjeebhoy and Atmaram Madhowjee? Do you remember Shapoorjee Dhunjeebhoy, he was the brother-in-law of Rustomjee Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy?—Yes.

5158. He had a large loan, and passed through the Insolvent Court, and there was a large loan of two lacs to Atmaram Madhowjee. The proceedings in the Insolvent Court attracted the notice of Sir Bartle Frere, and he wrote a letter to the Bank to ask how such loans could possibly have been made, and they said, "Let it stand over till Mr. Chapman returns." The following is the minute of 31st July 1866: "Read the following letter from Government regarding the advances made by the Bank to Atmaram Madhowjee and Shapoorjee Dhunjeebhoy, No. 744 of 1866:—Financial Department, Bombay Castle, 26th July 1866. To the Secretary and Treasurer, Bank of Bombay. Sir, I am directed to request you will, with the permission of the directors, favour Government with the following information with regard to advances made by the Bank to Atmaram Madhowjee and Shapoorjee Dhunjeebhoy, insolvents, statements purporting to represent whose liabilities have appeared in the newspapers. First, the total amount advanced to each. Second, the date on which such advances were made, together with the names of the directors and secretary at the times. Third, the nature of the securities on which these advances were made. Fourth, the authority on which they were made, i.e., whether on that of the full Board, or on that of any individual director. Fifth, the total amount of loss that the Bank has sustained by these advances I have, &c. &c. Signed, J. King, Acting Under-Secretary to Government. Resolved that the consideration of a reply to this letter be deferred until Mr. Chapman, Chief Secretary, has been communicated with on the subject, he being expected in Bombay on Friday next the 3rd instant."—I do not remember any communication being made to me about it.

5159. The Government surely would insist upon an answer?—Yes. We should have had it in our list of unanswered letters, and should have called for it.

5160. I do not find that an answer was ever sent. Was this draft ever sent (handing a document to the witness); were you ever consulted about that? Is that a draft of the letter?—This is a draft apparently of a letter from the Bank to myself. I do not recollect ever receiving this letter, and I do not know anything about the draft.

5161. Upon that occasion the Government seem to have been awake, and to have put some very sensible questions. You do not recollect what was eventually done?—I do not.

5162. Will you look at the proceedings of the 9th of November 1865 on the Board minutes. You were not present, I think, at that meeting?—I was not.

5163. Did that letter ever get to the Government?—I presume that it did.

5164. Was not your attention struck with the enormity of such a statement as that?—It certainly would have been, I think. I am not quite certain whether at that time this delusion with regard to collateral security still existed, but I confess that this letter is incomprehensible to me.

5165. It is as follows:—

"9th November 1865.—The Secretary, Government Financial Department,—Sir, I have the honour to acknowledge your endorsement No. 922, of 26th October, enclosing copy of a communication from Sir Charles Wood. I am requested by the Directors to say in reply that it appears to them the Secretary of State has either been much misinformed relative to the transactions of the Bank of Bombay, or else that he has quite misunderstood the information supplied. The Bank of Bombay has never advanced money directly on shares; but during the trying crisis that occurred in the early part of this year, the times were so exceptional, that the Directors considered it prudent, seeing so much money was lent on personal security only, to obtain as much collateral security as possible when granting loans." And the last paragraph is, "With reference to the alteration of the charter, this is a matter over which the directors have no control; but, seeing that the clause referred to has never been taken advantage of, the Directors do not see that any charge is either necessary or desirable."—Yes.

5166. It appears to me to be about the most monstrous statement which I ever saw in my life. Did it attract your attention when it came to you?—I cannot say about that. I wish that this letter had been traced to us in the Secretariat, but in the absence of the original letter I cannot say what action was taken upon it. I must say that it struck me as a very extraordinary letter when I read it the other day.

5167. You had actually taken power, by resolution on the 12th of April 1865, to lend money on shares?—Yes, I think so now; but I believe that in common with others we were under the delusion that we were not lending on shares.

5168. If you do not defend the letter, of course I can say nothing more.—I have nothing to say in defence of it.

5169. You took your seat at the Board on the 15th of March 1865. What was the practice with respect to the branches at that time; have you any recollection?—Not the slightest. I do not think that we knew anything at all about them.

5170. I suppose that their affairs did not come before you till the panic, and that then you began to look after them?—No.

5171. What was done then?—In April 1865 I think letters had been written restricting them.

5172. In April you told them not to lend beyond 20,000 rupees, and in May you told them to send up all their available cash balances?—Yes.

5173. Do you remember having any investigation into their affairs then?—No.

5174. Was none ordered at that time?—Not to my knowledge.

5175. What was your view of the Bank's affairs generally. How do you think that the affairs of the Bank were conducted after you had passed the resolution of the 4th of May 1865?—I did not trouble myself as I am afraid, perhaps, I ought to have done, with respect to looking into the executive detail of the Bank. At that time we thought that all persons connected with the Bank, the directors, the secretary, and everyone else, were fully alive to the very narrow escape which we had, and we thought that every sort of precaution was being taken to prevent bad business being done.

5176. Were not you extremely anxious and nervous about the Bank?—The whole business has occasioned me more anxiety than anything that I have ever had to do with in my life.

5178. Were not you considered nervous?—No; I should not say that I was. I think that we were all fully alive to the great danger which we very narrowly escaped. We thought that we had got into smooth water decidedly, and that we were sailing away very pleasantly and comfortably.

5179. If we have heard that you were very nervous, and were always going to the Government, and saying that you thought that things were going on wrong, and that you were not satisfied, and that they thought you too nervous, that is incorrect information?—I should say so, decidedly; and I cannot take credit to myself for having been a bit wiser than my neighbours.

5180. What was the state of the Government at the time; were they anxious?—Decidedly. I think that to Sir Bartle Frere and Mr. Ellis this Bank was an unceasing source of anxiety.

5181. It was a subject constantly before them?—Most constantly before them.

5182. Were you communicated with at all, after you left the Bank, about its affairs?—Yes. I used to hear from Mr. Lushington, and I used to hear from Mr. Charles Chapman, I think.

5183. Were you communicated with, with reference to the large loan to Premchund?—No. It so happened that, as I think, I left for Mahableshwur some days before that loan came on.

5184. You did not hear of that loan at all?—Not until afterwards.

5185. You were not consulted at all about the Asiatic Bank transaction?—No.

5186. Is there any further information which you can give us?—I think that it was our misfortune (speaking individually for myself and for Mr. Lushington also) to enter the Bank at a most precarious time. I believe that we all acted for the very best, and I am certain that there was no want of zeal and activity on our part. For myself I can say that it was an unceasing source of worry and anxiety to me.

5187. During the time that you were connected, or before you were connected with the Bank as Government director, did you receive any allotment of shares?—Certainly not while I was a Government director.

5188. Had you received any before?—Yes. Eight months before I joined the Bank of Bombay I received 30 shares in the China Bank.

5189. Did you receive anything else?—I received some shares in 1863, which I believe I hold now. I received 60 shares in the Western India Hotel Company, which I hold. I took those shares because I believed that an Hotel was very much wanted in Bombay.

5190. Those two allotments, I should think, did not encourage you to go on?—No. I do not wish to take credit to myself for not having received allotments, but I wish to explain that I came down to Bombay after all these good things were given.

5191. You were not in Bombay at the time?—No.

5192. Did you ever enter into any commercial speculations, or any speculations of any sort, whilst you were a director of the Bank of Bombay?—Certainly not.

5193. Did you know that any officers of the Bank were engaged in mercantile speculations?—No, I certainly did not.

5196. You were a director of the Bank when the letters were written to the Bombay Government in March 1866?—Yes.

5197. Was Colonel Marriott a director then?—Yes, he was a director at the time when he wrote that minute.

5198. What was the position of the Government directors at the Board; were they treated as on a par with the mercantile directors?—I think so. As far as my recollection serves me, this was the sort of way in which business was conducted: the President would lay before us an application, he would say, "Here is an application from so and so;" and then one member would say, "to my knowledge he is engaged in the China trade, and we have had transactions with him," and so on. Loans were always fairly and fully discussed, and there was no opportunity, as I thought, of showing any favouritism towards any one.

5199. Was there any tendency on the part of Mr. Hannay or other directors to overbear the Government directors?—I should say not, decidedly.

5200. Would not the minute of Mr. Hannay on Colonel Marriott's minute (vide Blue Book, p. 40) lead to the supposition that Mr. Hannay was overbearing?—I never considered him as such.

5201. Did you defer much to Mr. Hannay?—I did defer a great deal to Mr. Hannay. I believed that Mr. Hannay was a thoroughly competent man. I knew that he took the greatest possible interest in the Bank, and I should have been very doubtful about giving any opinion contrary to his.

5202. In fact the Government directors were apt to be guided by Mr. Hannay and others who were considered competent commercial directors, in granting loans?—Decidedly so.

5203. Then in what did you consider your official duty to lie?—When these applications were laid before us, I think that our presence there prevented anything like undue favouritism or influence being exercised. There were representatives from the different firms, and the matter was fairly discussed, and the nature of the business in which the applicant was engaged, and so on.

5204. Did you consider that you had anything special to do in the way of seeing that the Act was adhered to?—The only occasion apparently which occurred of that sort was the case of the loan which has been pointed out; we referred it to the solicitor.

5205. Did you consider it your special duty to see that there were sets of rules, and so on, for the guidance of the officials of the Bank, and for its proper management?—No, we did not do that; and I think that it is very much to be regretted that we did not.

5206. You said that at some of your first meetings you and other directors came to the conclusion that you were kept in ignorance of the proceedings in the Bank?—I never stated that we were purposely kept in ignorance.

5207. The words which you used were that you were kept in ignorance; do you adhere to those words?—I do not mean to say that we were purposely kept in ignorance.

5208. Have you any reason to believe that you were kept in ignorance?—I think that the only occasion to which I referred in my evidence was the occasion when we were induced to acquiesce in the resolution of the 12th of April 1865. I think that it was not ingenuous on the part of any one who knew that advances had been made, not to have told us.

5209. Had you ever any reason to believe that the management of the details of the Bank was such as to mislead you as to what was going on?—Do you mean with regard to the way in which the books were kept?

5210. Yes.—No, I believe not.

5211. Have you any reason to believe that the books were so kept as utterly to nullify the wishes of the directors on any point?—No, I believe not.

5212. If you had agreed that a firm should get a loan of 20 lacs, and that certain securities should be taken against that loan, do you think that it would have been against your wish, and that of the other directors, that as those securities were realized they should be credited against that loan, and that advances should be made afterwards so as to keep the whole loan up to its full?—Certainly, I think that the loan should have been closed. I heard your questions yesterday to Mr. Robertson upon that point.

27 Nov. 1868.

5213. And you do not agree with him?—Certainly not.

5214. When the list of overdues was sent in by the Bank to the Government of Bombay, and was sent on to the Government of India, not giving the information which the Government of India wanted, did the Government of Bombay get that information themselves which the Government of India wanted?—No.

5215. Did they ask for it?—No.

5216. Was there any reason why they did not ask for it?—My impression is, that the Government of Bombay considered that it would not be fair to ask the Bank to disclose, either to themselves or to anyone else, the nature of the business of their constituents; that is my impression of the reason why it was not pressed.

5217. Then they took the whole responsibility of not having for themselves the information on which they might afterwards have to act with reference to assisting the Bank; they declined to get for themselves the information which the Government of India wanted in case they had to take action with reference to the Bank?—Yes, they gave the Government of India all the information which they themselves possessed. I wish to be understood as merely giving my impression.

5218. I should like you to give the knowledge which you have as secretary to Government; you have a good deal?—Perhaps I have. My impression is, that the Bombay Government, with regard to the state of the Bank, put the Government of India in possession of what you may consider the salient points as to the position of that Bank. They found out in the best way which they could what were the assets, and what was the amount of the liabilities, and they communicated those facts in a lump to the Government of India.

5219. In what way did you get at the assets?—I am speaking specially with regard to the report of the Commission which was appointed to value those assets.

5220. As secretary to the Government, and moreover a director of the Bank, when you got the report of that Commission did you go into the details?—No.

5221. What reason had you for considering that they were making an under valuation of the assets?—I can only repeat what I have said before. We had the very highest officer of the Government of India, who happened to be accidentally present in Bombay at the time. We presumed that he was probably an authority with whom the Government of India would be satisfied. We associated with him two of the most impartial local authorities that we could find, and we gave the Government of India the benefit of those gentlemen's opinions.

5222. At the same time strongly discrediting it. You got their report; did you get details to support you in discrediting that report?—I am not aware that we did discredit it. We gave the Government of India the benefit of the two estimates, and I believe that the Government of Bombay furnished the Government of India with every particle of information which they themselves possessed, and that there was no wish to keep anything back from them. If you ask me, as Mr. Chapman, why it was done, my impression is, that they considered it inexpedient to divulge the affairs of the constituents of the Bank, either to themselves, or to the Government of India.

5223. What grounds had they for saying that they preferred one estimate to the other?—Perhaps they thought that in Mr. Harrison, Mr. Hunter, and Dinshaw Manockjee they had got extremely desponding individuals, and that it was a mere question, do you prefer so and so's estimate to so and so's estimate? But there was no wish to leave the Government of India in the dark; the opinions of both parties were placed before them as quickly as they were arrived at.

5224. Do you still say that there was no wish to leave the Government of India in the dark when the Bombay Government had persistently declined to give the information which the Government of India wanted, and, still further, had declined to obtain it themselves?—They had the gross liabilities and assets of the Bank, and my impression is that they considered it inexpedient on grounds of general policy to publish more.

5225. No publication was necessary?—I have known a good many things to transpire from Calcutta, and people have been very ready indeed in sending information from there.

5227. Was that estimate accepted?—I fancy that it was.

5228. When you saw that these estimates one after the other differed by 50 lacs, did you consider it expedient then to ask for details, or to get at the reasons for the different estimates?—The reasons were apparent to the Government themselves. There was an obvious decline in the securities; for instance, in 1867 there was a regular sort of extreme to which securities of all sorts went. For example, Back Bay shares, which in liquidation I believe have realized something like 2,500 rupees, were at the very lowest time, in 1867, at 300 rupees; they went up and down. It would have been very erroneous to have made an estimate based upon the 300 rupees, as they have actually realized 2,500 rupees.

5229. Then what is the meaning of an estimated loss to the amount of nearly half the Bank's capital?—I merely instance those figures to show the fluctuation.

5230. As you are aware of great fluctuations in the estimates, and in the value of the securities, was there any reason for not obtaining and recording with your Government the details upon which the estimates, which, after all, were sent on to the Government of India, were based?—I think that there was an objection to have those details laid before the Government. We did not require them ourselves. I believe that the Government had confidence that certainly since 1866 every one connected with the Bank was making as fair an estimate as it was within the power of human ken to make, and they trusted to that estimate.

5231. They did not consider it requisite to obtain the same estimate for themselves?—No, certainly not.

5232. What was the arrangement current in the Bank with reference to any letters which the Government directors had to write to the Government of India; were the letters which the Government directors wrote to the Bank filed in the Bank records?—Any letter which was sent for information, for instance, the letter sent to Sir Charles Wood, objecting to the transfer of shares, I have no doubt was kept in the records of the Bank.

5233. What was the arrangement current in the Bank with reference to any letters which the Government directors had to write to the Government of India; were the letters which the Government directors wrote in the Bank filed in the Bank records?—I am not prepared to say; they would certainly be either filed in the Bank, or in the secretariat.

5234. When you wrote these letters, how was the information arrived at, and were there any means for the Bank officials to know that you had given incorrect information?—Whenever we wrote a letter, the information contained in that letter was derived from the secretary of the Bank, or from the chairman through the secretary.

5235. There is a letter, for instance, with regard to the resolution of the 12th of April 1865, which you say that you wrote from Poona?—I wrote it from Poona.

27 Nov. 1868.

5236. It was supposed to go from you and from Mr. Lushington ?—Yes.

5237. Was it in any way filed in the records of the Bank ? Or where would the facts upon which it was based be got at ?—I should think most probably in the Bank.

5238. Of course any letter which you wrote must have been based upon certain data, which data, I presume, would have been tacked on to the rough draft ? —Yes.

5239. Would that not have remained in the Bank ? —I should suppose so. You will observe that in our own records, however unsightly the files may appear, the smallest scrap of a note is kept. I am not prepared to say what system was adopted in the Bank, but as regards our own office, namely, the secretariat, every scrap of paper was most jealously kept.

5240. For instance, when you quoted the resolution of the 12th of April 1865, the beginning of that resolution, referring to the former ones, was omitted, you believed that you had got that information from Mr. Robertson. Was it possible that you put a more definite question to Mr. Robertson than you wanted, and that the information was written down too definitely ?—I cannot say. I certainly got those figures from the Bank.

5241. Then when you were asking for information from the secretary, you would not have the previous letters ?—No ; otherwise one could follow out the whole sequence of the correspondence.

THOMAS LAWRENCE SECCOMBE sworn and examined.

5242. (President.) You are Secretary in the Financial Department of the India Office ?—Yes.

5243. The documents in your hand are documents which you produce from your department ?—Yes.

5245. In whose handwriting is the pencil memorandum "Bengal guaranteed" on page 17 of that draft bill ?—That is in the handwriting of Mr. Hobart, the assistant secretary in the Financial Department. At my request Mr. Hobart went through it, to see whether there were any differences between this and the former Act, and the Act for regulating the Bank of Bengal ; and this is one of his notes.

5247. What is the other document which you produce ?—It is the minute paper prepared in the Legislative Department, and approved by the Secretary of State in Council, leaving to its operation the Act 10 of 1863, passed by the Council of the Government of Bombay, for the re-incorporation and re-constitution of the Bank of Bombay (Exhibit marked A. 169).

Adjourned to Thursday, 3rd December, at 11 o'clock.

PRESENT :

President.

SIR CHARLES JACKSON.

Member.

MAJOR MCLEOD INNES.

Secretary.

F. D. CHAUNTRELL, ESQ.

3 Dec. 1868.

(Mr. Morrison.) My name is Anthony Morrison, and I have come here to tender my evidence to the Commission. I will, with your permission, read a statement which will not occupy more than a few minutes.

5248. (President.) What information have you to give to the Commission ?—

(Mr. Morrison.) I was in Bombay the whole time, and I think that I have information which will be valuable with reference to the evidence which has been already given in Bombay.

5249. (President.) Upon what points do you wish to give evidence ?

(Mr. Morrison.) I was lately the manager at Bombay of the Asiatic Banking Corporation. I am able to give important evidence as to the causes of the inability of the Bank of Bombay to pay its debts, and the circumstances attending such inability. My name has been frequently mentioned in the evidence taken by you at Bombay, and accounts, more or less inaccurate, have been given in such evidence as to transactions with which I have been connected. In some of these accounts reflections have been made upon my conduct and character. I was absent during the whole time that you were receiving evidence at Bombay, and I have therefore had no opportunity of correcting the false statements in the evidence given before you. For the purpose of affording you correct information on the subject of your inquiry, as well as to remove the erroneous impression as to my conduct occasioned by the untrue statements made to you at Bombay, I have come to England, and I arrived only on Monday last. I have to request that you will appoint some early day which may suit your convenience to examine me on oath, and that you will favour me by directing your secretary to send me your summons addressed to Bacon's Hotel, Lincoln's Inn Fields, where I am at present staying.

(President.) We should not wish, of course, to prevent you from explaining certain parts of the evidence, but we should be reluctant to have you examined as a witness solely on that ground. But you say that you are able to give us important evidence about the Bank of Bombay, and we will therefore call you on Thursday next.

GEORGE INVERARITY sworn, and examined.

Mr. G. Inverarity.

(Witness.) Before the opening of the ordinary business of the day, I wish to make one remark, if I have your permission to do so.

(President.) We have no objection.

(Witness.) I am here as a spontaneous and voluntary witness. For family reasons I have been residing in Italy for some time, and I have come a very long distance, at great discomfort and personal inconvenience to myself. When I received your summons I was at Milan, and there was some doubt whether it had legal force against me, it therefore remained optional with me whether I should come or not, but I felt it to be my duty to the Commission that I should come, so that they might not suppose that I possessed knowledge which they wished to have, but could not get, because I was absent. I also wished to come, in order that people might see that I did not stay away.

5249*a*. (President.) I believe that you were well advised to come, though I do not think that you can give us much information. I believe that you are a member of the Bombay Civil Service?—I was.

5250. What office did you hold in the year 1863? —That of Commissioner of Customs in Bombay.

5251. When were you appointed a Government director of the Bank of Bombay?—I cannot mention the dates.

5252. On the 22d of July 1863 you were gazetted, and you first took your seat at the board on the 30th of July 1863?—Yes; and I continued a director from the 30th of July till the 10th or 12th of August 1863 only. After that time I went on duty to North Canara, and I was absent there for part of the summer. While I was so absent orders came from the Home Government that a Government director should not hold shares in the bank. I told the Government of Bombay beforehand that I held some shares in the bank, thinking it positively inexpedient that a Government director should hold shares. When I was in Canara the answer came that a Government director should not hold shares, and that if I wished to continue a director I must sell, or if I wished to retain my shares I must resign. I then resigned.

5253. Your first sitting was on the 30th of July 1863, and your last sitting was on the 12th of November 1863?—Yes.

5254. You were therefore an acting director of the board for 15 weeks?—Yes.

5255. You were a director when the Act passed? —I think that the Act passed before I joined.

5256. But it was not notified in the Gazette until the 1st of August 1863?—The Act came into force as soon as I came into the bank. I had nothing to do with the passing of the Act in any way.

5257. Were you a party to the resolution of the 6th of August 1863? You have probably not had an opportunity of looking at these minutes, as most of the other directors have?—I have not.

5258. That is the resolution? (Handing the minute book to the witness.)—Yes; I must have been there, as my name is entered. I was present then.

5259. You were present at the passing of that prudent resolution, that there were to be no advances on shares without bringing them before the board?—I was.

5260. I believe that Mr. Ryland, the deputy secretary, subsequently wished to upset that resolution of the board, did he not?—I do not know that Mr. Ryland did.

5261. Is not that Mr. Ryland's handwriting? (Handing Exhibit A 32. to the witness).—I do not know; I do not know his handwriting.

5262. He proposed that the resolution of the 6th of August 1868 should be rescinded. You will see a minute of yours attached.—Yes.

5263. Will you read that minute?—"Section 32, clause 1, gives us authority, supposing the banks mentioned are public companies,—if they are not public companies there is no use of further discussion, and of this I presume due inquiry has already been made, and that most of these banks are public companies has been determined. At present we have more money than the manager seems to know what to do with, and it is most desirable that an outlet should be secured; I therefore see no objection to Mr. Ryland's draft proposition being discussed, with a view to being passed on Thursday, when the parties are of undoubted respectability and known means; and the secretary should be held responsible if he advances to those who are otherwise. The danger in respect to short periods to which I would limit such loans is very little more than in the case of ordinary discounts. But the Central Bank is not a public company, and I doubt whether the Comptoir is." (That means Comptoir d'Escompte, I fancy.) "The Commercial Bank has not yet received its charter, I believe, and these three should be excluded. I do object to large balances being allowed to lie in the Bank perfectly idle, as has been the case all this monsoon; and if the new charter allows us to deal as above discussed, we should not be doing our duty to the proprietors did we not avail ourselves of the latitude and field allowed. The Bank loans would be in proportion to the par value of the stock placed with us; not according to the market value, as apparently supposed by Mr. Cowasjee Jehangeer." That is in my handwriting; that is my minute.

5264. I believe that you subsequently wrote another memorandum. Will you read it?—"Since writing my minute of this date, on Mr. Ryland's draft proposition, I have referred to section 32 of our charter, and do not think the Mercantile, Agra, Oriental, and Chartered Banks can be described as coming within the term 'Public Companies in India.' They are public companies in England, with their branches only in India. I do not therefore consider that the bank can act without further and full information on this subject from its legal advisers, to whom I would suggest this point be submitted. I request the favour of the secretary circulating this amongst the directors?"—That is my minute.

5265. It appears from those minutes that you were anxious to allow of investments on shares?— Not on all shares. I saw no objection, for instance, to the Oriental Bank, and the Agra, and the Mercantile Banks; of course leaving a wide margin for risk. It seemed to me that we were doing our duty to the proprietors.

5266. Was not that matter brought before the board subsequently on the 17th of September 1863? —I suppose that it was. I do not recollect the dates.

5267. Do you remember the discussion which took place?—I think that there was a discussion. I forget the details of it.

5268. Do you not remember that you were overruled?—No, I may possibly have been.

5269. That was the resolution which was passed. (Handing the minute book to the witness.) Just look at it, and refresh your recollection.—It was five years ago. "Resolved, that the secretary be authorized to make advances on stock or shares in Indian railway companies guaranteed by Government, without such stock or shares being transferred into the name of the bank, on the borrower signing a form of agreement to be prepared by the bank solicitors."

5270. They therefore confined the lending on shares to railways guaranteed by Government?— Yes.

5271. Did not they know that an Act had been passed before that time allowing them to do so?—I fancy so.

5272–3. Why did they pass such a resolution as that?—There was a long discussion, I recollect. I suppose that this resolution was passed to dispose of the question. I recollect some of the directors being strongly opposed to money being advanced on bank shares.

5274. Cowasjee Jehangeer especially?—Yes, I allude to him particularly; he was very much opposed to it.

5275. Do you recollect anybody else who was very much opposed to it at that time?—I recollect Cowasjee Jehangeer particularly being opposed to it. I do not recollect the others.

5276. Are you aware that there were cash credits granted on mere promissory notes in the name of one person, or firm, without any security, and that a system of that sort commenced almost immediately after the Act passed?—Was it allowed by the Act?

5277. It allowed you to make loans on cash credit without any limit. That, however, is not the point. I am not asking you whether it was legal or not; but I am asking you whether you knew, as a matter of fact, that immediately after the Act passed a system commenced of granting cash credits on the mere promissory note of a single individual, or firm, without security?—No, I do not recollect it. I was not aware of that fact.

5278. You will see that during the short time that you were a director many such credits were granted. (Handing Exhibit A 33 to the witness.)—Yes; this is all Greek to me.

5279. You never saw that before?—Not that I recollect.

5280. Was the application book laid on the table?—Yes, I recollect that. I used to see it constantly.

5281. Used you to look at it?—Yes.

5282. If I tell you that the cash credits entered in this little Blue Book (A 33) are not entered in the application book you will be very much surprised at it?—Yes.

5283. What other means would you have of finding out the existence of this practice if the cases were not entered in the application book?—I cannot say. I knew so little about banking when I was appointed that I really knew nothing about the details. I considered my duty to be to see that the charter was not exceeded. The matter of granting loans, and who were fit people to give loans to, I rather considered the business of the mercantile directors.

5284. Am I to understand distinctly that you were wholly ignorant of the fact of this practice of granting cash credits on promissory notes in one name without security?—I do not recollect the principle being in existence. I may have heard of it incidentally.

5285. But you do not recollect it?—Certainly not.

5286. No one director has been able to say that he recollected it?—I certainly do not recollect it; I would say so at once if I did. By whom was that book kept? In whose handwriting is it?

5287. Mr. De Ga's. He kept the ledger of the cash credits. As far as you are concerned, there is very little which affects you in that respect. There are only two accounts which commenced in your period which eventually ended in loss. But it is fair to you to say, that as to one of those two accounts it is disputed that there is anything due upon the original grant, and in the other case the bank lent the individual large sums of money afterwards, and non constat that he might not have paid the first debt. There are only two transactions commencing in your time which eventually ended in loss. Do you recollect either of those transactions, one being with Bomanjee Cursetjee Cama, and the other with Dady Byramjee and Company?—Certainly not.

5288. Did you before or during the time that you were a director of the Bank of Bombay receive any allotments of shares?—I may have done so. Yes, I did receive them.

5289. What allotments did you receive before or at the time when you were a director of the Bank of Bombay?—I got Cotton Ginning Company's shares and Mofussil Press Company's shares.

5290. What was the date of those allotments?—It was all about that time. I forget the dates. I had some Royal Bank shares before I joined the direction of the Bank of Bombay. If you will mention the shares I will tell you at once.

5291. I want you to be particular as to what allotments you received before, or during the time that you were a director. You say that you had shares in the Cotton Ginning Company and in the Mofussil Press Company?—Yes, and in the Royal Bank of India.

5292. How many shares had you in the Cotton Ginning Company?—I think that I had 15 shares in the Cotton Ginning Company and the Mofussil Press Company; they were conjoined. There were 10 or 15 between the two, I think, and, if I mistake not, they were afterwards separated. In the Royal Bank I had 100 shares; but that was long before I joined the direction.

5293. I should like you to distinguish between those shares which you had before you became a director and those which you had at the time when you were a director. I am asking about the allotments which you received.—Am I allowed to refer to private memoranda?

5294. Certainly. First of all we will take those which you received before you were a director.—I have no memorandum of those. (Looking at his memorandum book.) I think that the Royal Bank of India was the only one.

5295. You had four Back Bay shares?—That was long afterwards.

5296. I want to ascertain those which you had while you were a director.—I had six shares in the Mofussil Press Company. They were given to me on the 23rd of July 1863, according to my memorandum, and on August the 4th I had ten Cotton Ginning Company's shares given to me.

5297. The Royal Bank shares you had before you became a director?—I think that I had them before I was a director.

5298. Were these six shares of the Mofussil Company at a premium when you had that allotment?—No; I retained them for a long time, and I sold them shortly before I left India.

5299. To whom did you apply for them?—Messrs. Nicol and Company asked me if I would have any, as they wished to establish a Press Company, and I said that I would take some.

5300. How much was paid up on those shares?—Five hundred rupees per share; three thousand rupees altogether. I sold them fourteen months afterwards for three thousand two hundred rupees, so that I got 200 rupees as interest for my money.

5301. You had ten Cotton Ginning Company's shares; how much was paid up on them?—Four thousand five hundred rupees was paid up upon them on the first and second calls, and I sold them on the 3rd of November 1864, fifteen months afterwards, for the same money exactly.

5302. Did you receive any other allotments before, or when you were a director?—I have no memorandum of it. The case of the Royal Bank of India I recollect because I lost money on it.

5303. You received a hundred shares in that bank before you were a director. Just look at your memorandum, and see.—The Royal Bank shares which I had I sold on the 2nd of July 1863, and I see in the same memorandum an item, "By sale of Joint Stock Bank shares;" but that was not an allotment. That is all that I have any memorandum about.

5304. What did you pay for the shares of the Royal Bank of India?—I paid up a call of 2,500 rupees.

5305. What did you sell them for?—At 15½ per cent. premium; that was 3,100 rupees altogether. That was before I joined the Bank of Bombay, or knew anything about it.

5306. The Mofussil Press Company's shares you seem to have received on the 23rd of July 1863, before you took your seat at the board?—Yes.

5307. On the 4th of August 1863 you received ten Cotton Ginning Company's shares; you were a director then?—Yes; but the application was made long before that.

5308. When was the application made?—I do not know. It was apparently a good thing started, and I was asked whether I would take any shares.

5309. I believe that after you were a director you entered very largely into share speculations?—That is a question of opinion. I had my own money to invest as I liked. I never borrowed a sou from any one.

5310. We find your name repeatedly.—I am quite willing to tell you what I had.

5311. You were in the Back Bay Company?—I had four shares in the Back Bay Company.

5312. You were also in the Bombay Joint Stock Corporation?—Yes; I am sorry to say that I was. I had to pay 700*l.* call there, so that I did not gain anything by it.

5313. And you were in the Frere Land Reclamation Company?—I had five shares in that.

5314. And you were in the Port Canning Company?—The Port Canning shares I never asked for; they were sent to me; that was long afterwards.

5315. And you were in the Mazagon Land Reclamation Company, and the Bank of Surat?—I had three Mazagon Land Reclamation shares; and I was engaged in the Bank of Surat at the earnest solicitation of the late Mr. Howard. I refused at first, but he begged and prayed me to take shares, and I did so, in order to keep up my connexion with Bombay.

5316. Will you tell us all the speculations in shares, and the buying and trafficking in shares, which you entered into before, or during the time that you were a bank director?—That is rather a difficult question; but, however, I will give you the best information that I can from my book. You mean exclusive of allotments?

5317. Exclusive of allotments. We have your allotments.—I bought some Commercial Bank shares on the 2nd of April 1863, which I afterwards sold; that was not considered a speculation. I had some loose money, and I was told that it would be to my interest to buy them.

I had 150 Joint Stock Bank shares given to me by a friend of mine, separately from any purchase or allotment, or anything of that sort. He had more than he wanted, and he gave me 150 shares out of his lot. That was before I joined the Bank of Bombay or had anything to do with it. Then I bought some Kurrachee Press Company's shares on the 12th of August 1863. I bought them for 12,400 rupees, and I sold them for 12,667 rupees. Then I bought ten Bombay Bank shares for 33,200 rupees, and I sold them for 32,300 rupees; that was at the end of September, somewhere about the 20th. That was all, according to my recollection.

5318. That is to say, before or during the time that you were a director?—Yes, according to my book, and my book is very correct. Allow me to look over it once more, and I will correct myself. I see, "Paid W. H. Crawford, Esquire, 2,500 rupees." I do not know what that is. I think that it was for the purchase of horses. I do not think that that had anything to do with it. I do not know how many Kurrachee Press shares I had, but 12,000 rupees were paid for them; and I had ten Bombay Bank shares. That is all, to the best of my recollection; and I have my written memoranda before me.

5319. We have been informed that you did a great deal of business in buying Bombay Bank shares?—No; that is perfectly incorrect. I never bought any since these ten. I had six shares when I joined the bank as director, which afterwards became 12, and afterwards 24; but these were bought in 1857, long before I went to Bombay. If I bought and speculated in bank shares it must appear in the bank's books.

5320. Have you told us of all the shares which you bought in the names of other people?—Do you mean while I was a director?

5321. Yes, or before?—I did almost nothing before I was a director. I did most of it afterwards.

5322. You had shares entered in the books of Companies in the names of natives?—Once only.

5324. Was not his name Atmaram Balcrustna?—I know nothing about him.

5325. When you were a director, and before you were a director, did you ever receive any allotments in the name of any native or any other person?—Never; I am perfectly sure that I never did.

5326. You never bought and sold shares, and used the name of a native for them?—Never. The only ones were the Frere Land shares, and my broker told me that he had put them in his own name. He did it at his own suggestion; it was not my suggestion at all.

5327. When you were a director of the bank did you, or did you not, traffic in shares, or have any other speculation in the name of any native?—No; not unless the 10 Bombay Bank shares, which I have mentioned, were in the broker's name.

5328. For what purpose would you buy and sell Bombay Bank shares in the name of a native?—I would not do so, and I did not.

5329. You said not, unless those Bombay Bank shares were in the name of a native?—Those were the only shares which I had at that time, and therefore I say that, if they were in the name of the broker, they may have been in the name of a native.

5330. Did you before, or whilst you were a director, ever traffic in any shares, Bank of Bombay shares, or any other, in the name of a native, not disclosing your own name?—The only case possible is that Kursondass may have bought Bombay Bank shares on his and my own account; and if so, it must have been these 10 shares which I have mentioned.

5331. Then if Premchund Roychund told us that you were dealing and trafficking in Bombay Bank shares he was incorrect?—Yes; except as far as these 10 shares are concerned. I did not know that he did tell you so. I have not seen the evidence. I did not know Premchund in those days. I made his acquaintance long afterwards.

5332. Did you consider yourself justified as a Government civilian in entering into these speculations, holding such an office as you filled in Bombay?—I did not see any harm in it.

5333. Did you not read the order issued by Sir Bartle Frere?—That was long afterwards.

5334. But you were aware of the orders issued by the Government of India and Sir George Clerk afterwards?—The orders of the Government of India, if I recollect rightly, left it optional that officers should do as they thought best.

5335. Was not the spirit of those orders to discourage speculation on the part of officials?—I considered that it left the question a great deal to the discretion of the officials.

5336. Did it not say that it would influence their promotion for the future?—Yes.

5337. And did it not strike you that it was intended to discourage those speculations on the part of officials?—I had money to invest, and it did not strike me that there was anything wrong in it; it never occurred to me.

5338. It would no doubt have been better for all parties if those orders had given a less uncertain sound.—I was aware of the order. If Government wished to prohibit that sort of thing they ought to have said so positively. If the Government left it optional to the officer, and I did not borrow the money, why should I not do it with my own money? That was my idea.

5339. Do you think then that it was for the advantage of the service that a civilian holding such a position should enter into all these speculations in a Presidency town?—I do not see any disadvantage in it at all. It was his own money, and was not borrowed.

5340. Did you see no disadvantage or impropriety in a civilian who held the high position of a Government director of the Bank of Bombay receiving a present of allotments in these companies? — No; there was no quid pro quo asked for or given. They were given as a mark of personal friendship, and some were not even asked for.

5341. Was not getting shares in these Companies considered a matter of obligation at that time?—If so, I think that scarcely any Government director would have taken shares, and almost every Government director had shares, more or less. Even some members of the Government had shares, as we know by a late court-martial at Simla. It seems to me to have been quite a question left to the discretion of the officer.

5342. Then I understand that you considered it consistent with your position to enter into all these speculations?—I consider that no harm was done, it being with my own money. I never borrowed a sou from any one.

5343. We have nothing more to ask you.—I should be very glad to get my capital back. And I wish to say that I believe that very many severe things have been said about me by the shareholders, and I can only imagine that the reason of it is that in the Bombay Almanac I was put down as a director of the Bank of Bombay in 1864. I am extremely grateful to you for the opportunity which I have had of coming before you to state what I know.

GAVIN STEEL sworn, and examined.

Mr. G. Steel.

5343*a*. (President.) Of what firm in Bombay were you a member in 1863?—Messrs. Grey and Company.

5344. You were a director of the Bank of Bombay when Act No. 10 of 1863 passed. You first sat at the board on the 11th June 1863?—I was under the impression that I was a director in May.

5345. It appears from the minutes that the first time you sat was on the 11th of June?—I have no doubt that that is correct. It was only for a few weeks at that time that I was a director, during May and June. I ceased to be a director by the expiry of the time for which I was elected.

5346. When were you re-elected?—I was re-elected in January 1864.

5347. And your last sitting was on the 8th of December 1864?—November.

5348. Your last sitting, I find by the minutes, was on the 8th of December 1864? — I speak from memory; I have no doubt that what you state is correct.

5349. We have examined so many directors that I do not wish to take you minutely through all the points of the case, but only generally as to certain points. Had you anything to do with the preparation of the Draft Act?—Nothing whatever.

5350. It was just passing the Legislative Council when you were elected a director?—So I see from the date; but I knew nothing whatever about it.

5351. You had something to do with the increase of the capital of the Bank?—I was present at the meetings which resolved upon that measure.

5352. What were your reasons for supporting it? You were a director during the second and third increases.—That the trade of Bombay had so far increased that an increase of capital was necessary.

5353. Did you think that the third increase was necessary?—I concurred in it.

5354. Do you not think that it would have been wiser to have waited a little, and to have seen the effect of the second increase before you embarked on the third?—No; I did not think that the third increase was too great an increase.

5355. You are aware of the great number of rival banks which were established about that time, there being about sixteen banks in Bombay, old and new?—Yes.

5356. That did not affect your judgment?—No, I cannot say that it did.

5357. Did you think that there was room for the safe employment of so large a capital?—I really thought so.

5358. Did you not find, as the last witness said in one of his minutes, that you had really more money than you knew what to do with?—I heard him say so.

5359. Is it not your own experience that you had a great deal of money?—We had a great deal of money, but I think that it was quite possible to employ it profitably.

5360. And safely?—And judiciously.

5361. You were a party to the resolution of the 6th of August 1863, which has been read?—As a director?

5362. Yes.—I have no recollection of it.

5363. You were present on that day. This is the resolution. (Handing the minute book to the witness.) —It appears so. I had no recollection of being present.

5364. Do you not recollect an attempt being made to reverse that decision in the very next month?—No.

5365. Here is your opinion of it. (Handing Exhibit A 132 to the witness.)—Yes, that is my minute; it had quite passed out of my recollection.

5366. You seem to have doubted then whether you should, or should not support the proposition to advance on shares; your minute is rather vague. What part did you ultimately take when the matter came before the Board on the 17th September 1863? —I beg pardon. I think that my minute refers to the mode in which the shares should be taken as security.

5367. You did not discourage the application. You said, "I think there can be no objection to lending money to persons of undoubted respectability on the proposed system, but our security will be in the respectability, and not in the share papers." You were evidently wavering whether you should or should not support the proposition. What part did you ultimately take on the 17th of September when the proposition was rejected?—I do not recollect. Are there any other minutes of mine on the subject?

5368. Will you refer to the minutes of the 17th of September? You will find there a resolution actually passed, cutting it down to lending money on guaranteed railway shares, which an Act of the legislature had already given you power to do?—I do not recollect what part I took, but I have no doubt that I held the same opinion which I expressed in the previous minute, namely, that our security was more in the character of the borrower than in the security deposited in this way.

5369. Am I to understand that you thought it wise or prudent in a Government bank to lend money upon the mere signature, or the promissory note of a single individual?—No; I never said so.

5370. That was not your opinion?—Certainly not.

5371. Are you aware of the practical rescinding of that resolution of the 6th of August 1863, in the latter part of your time as a director, during the last half year of 1864?—By any formal resolution?

3 Dec. 1868.

5372. No; by no formal resolution, but by the acts of the secretary?—Will you repeat the question?

5373. Are you aware of the practical rescinding of that resolution by the acts of the secretary during the latter part of 1864; are you aware that he actually did lend on shares without consulting the board?—I have heard so since, but I was not aware of it at the time.

5374. You were not aware that he was in the habit of lending large sums, lacs of rupees, to a single individual, on his promissory note, taking shares as security?—I was not aware as to the shares.

5375. Were you aware of cash credits being granted on promissory notes on a single name, without any other security, during the latter half of 1863, and down to the second of June 1864?—I never was aware of its being done at all.

5376. Not before June 1864?—My impression was all along that two names were required.

5377. You never heard of such a system on one name before the 2nd of June 1864?—I do not recollect ever hearing of it.

5379. It did not strike you at the time that it was untrue; that it was necessary that cash credits should be granted on Government paper?—You remark that the resolution states, "At present no person, in however good credit, can have a credit account with the bank unless he can lodge Government paper as security, besides signing a bond which has to be renewed every three months." Did you suppose that to be the practice at the time?—I had no recollection of the meeting at all, until I read this just now. I had no recollection of the occasion.

5380. Do you recollect seeing this scroll minute? Does that revive your recollection? (Handing Exhibit A. 48 to the witness.) When we look back to the original scroll minute, we find that it was drawn up correctly as to the Scotch system. The alteration is proved to be in the handwriting of Mr. Blair. Do you recollect any discussion about that?—I do not.

5381. I mean as to how it was altered, and made untrue, with regard to the Scotch system?—I do not recollect anything about it; and I think that I should have checked that statement as to the Scotch system, if it had been brought prominently before me.

5382. You knew otherwise?—I knew otherwise, so far as my knowledge went.

5383. How were these things managed at the board? Was not the resolution read out?—It appears to have been so, and my name is there, but it is strange to me that I have no recollection of such an important discussion.

5384. I see that you were present on the next board day: "Thursday, 9th of June. Present, Gavin Steel, Esquire. Read minutes of last meeting, which were afterwards signed by the president;" so that it must have been read over on the next board day?—The reading-over of the previous minutes is generally done when the meeting assembles, so that I might possibly not have been there at the moment, and might not have heard that read.

5385. This is a most important resolution, because it is the first opening of the door by the directors, and it admits the principle of lending money on one name?—All I say is, that if I was present I have not the slightest recollection of taking part in that discussion.

5386. Were you aware, during any and what period of your being a director, in the year 1864, of fixed, or open loans, being made on one name on promissory notes, or on bonds?—No.

5387. You never heard of that being done without any other security?—I did not, to the best of my recollection.

5388. You never heard of such loans being granted in one name or firm, not only without other security, but for very long periods, such as seven months and eleven months?—I have no recollection of any such transaction.

5388*a*. No such transaction was ever brought to your notice?—Not prominently, certainly.

5390. These transactions only appear in the ledgers and cash books; they were not entered in the application book. The only books laid upon the table of the directors were the application book, the register of bills discounted, the register of bills presented, and the minute book. We will take one or two examples, just to test you as to this matter. I will take the case of the Eastern Financial Association. I might ask you as to a great many cases, for a great many large losses came between the 1st of June 1864 and the last day in December, during your time. On the 18th of October 1864, when you were a director, 10 lacs of rupees were passed across the counter, upon the mere promissory note of a Mr. Ryan, who was secretary to the Eastern Financial Association. Were you aware of that transaction?—I was not. I wish to ask you whether the circulars, which were sent round to the weekly committee, are before this Commission?

5391. They are, and we find that very few circulars were sent round to the weekly committee in 1864.—That is the object of my asking the question.

5393. And we have evidence before us that the practice was to a great extent discontinued as regards natives in 1864; and we have only about fifteen discount minutes which were sent round in the year 1864. Were you aware of this transaction?—I was not aware of it.

5394. I will take another case, namely, the Alliance Financial Corporation. On the 21st of October 1864 five lacs were lent on the names of the borrowers, who were the directors of the Alliance Financial Corporation, and on the 8th of November 1864 five lacs more as a cash credit were granted to them.—I have no knowledge of it. With the exception of those applications which were circulated to me as a member of the weekly committee, I know of comparatively no loans or discounts at the bank. It was very rarely indeed that these applications were brought forward at a board meeting.

5395. They were hardly ever brought forward in 1864.—The only means which I had of knowing of them were by these circulars which were sent round to the weekly committee.

5396. Did you hear of a cash credit of five lacs granted to Sorabjee Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy on the 14th of July 1864 without any security except his single name?—Never.

5397. There are a great many others.—I should have to give the same answer to every such question, except in the case where my minute is on record.

5398. With reference to the weekly committee, are you aware of the fact that it was seldom consulted in the year 1864; in the latter part of 1864 particularly?—I cannot say that I observed that.

that it was the custom always to consult native directors as to the standing of native applicants.

5400. Are you aware that after July 1864, when Cowasjee Jehangeer resigned, it was the custom of the secretary to consult Premchund Roychund alone as to native discounts?—I am not so aware.

5401. What was your idea of the duties of the president of the bank?—I thought that they were more than the duties of an ordinary director.

5402. Did you know, or had you any reason to believe, that he was in any way more consulted than other directors?—I always considered that he took a greater interest in the working of the bank, and devoted more time to it than any other director.

5403. Are you surprised to hear that we have had evidence before us in this country, that he only attended the board meetings, and went down to the bank once in the course of a week, just to ask how things were going on, or something to that effect?—Does that surprise you?—No, it does not. If he visited the bank twice in a week I think that he did his duty, besides being consulted by the secretary when occasion required.

5404. If the president's duties were confined to attending the board meetings and going down to the bank once a week, and if his duties were heavier than those of a director, what were the duties of the directors?—I considered that I performed the duty which I undertook in attending board meetings, and in giving my advice when asked.

5405. You did not think that it was your duty to go to the bank often, and to look into matters, and get to the bottom of things?—I did not. If I had thought so I would never have undertaken the post.

5406. Then am I to understand that you in fact thought that the management of the bank was left chiefly to the secretary?—Under orders and control.

5407. Such orders and control as he would get at board meetings?—Yes.

5408. I have asked you about the president during your time. I will ask you about the secretary. What was your opinion of Mr. Blair?—In what respect?

5409. As to his capacity, in the first place?—That is a difficult question to answer.

5410. Did you think that he was competent for such a situation?—I thought that he was competent. I found him there. He had been in the bank service in the same capacity for years before I joined it.

5411. What did you think his powers were as respected the granting of discounts, cash credits, or loans?—My impression was that he had power to grant moderate loans without consulting his directors; but that in the case of unknown persons, or large amounts, his duty was to consult his weekly committee, or the full board, if necessary.

5412. Can you show any byelaw or resolution of the board which limited the secretary's powers in any way, except two, to one of which I have called your attention, of the 6th of August 1863, which was habitually disregarded and eventually rescinded, and another resolution, to which I shall call your attention, of the 12th of April 1865?—I cannot.

5413. In your time there was one resolution, namely, that of the 6th of August 1863; was there any other in your time?—None that I am aware of.

5414. Then will you explain to us how it was that the powers of the secretary were limited to granting discounts and cash credits to a small amount?—I acquired the impression that that was the rule of the bank before I joined the direction. I cannot say how I did so. I may have been so informed when I joined.

5415. Then would you be surprised to hear that the secretary, Mr. Robertson, in March 1866, claimed almost unlimited powers, as the practice of several years past?—I should certainly be surprised.

5416. Would you be surprised if I were to tell you that in March 1866 the directors did not know what the powers of the secretary were, and asked the chairman to define them?—Yes.

5417. Would you be surprised if I asked you whether you were aware that the chairman did not know what the powers of the secretary were, and wrote to Mr. Robertson, the secretary, to tell him?—Yes.

5418. And that no byelaws were ever passed till the 31st of March 1866?—At any time?

5419. Yes.—I was not aware of that.

5420. Did you suppose that there were any byelaws when you were a director?—I did so suppose.

5421. There were none; at least we should be very happy if you could point out any to us?—I cannot say that I ever saw them in writing or in print, but I give you what my impression of the management was.

5422. I have only taken you generally through the facts, because we have examined so many directors minutely, but I just call your attention to one fact, because I think that it is fair to give you an opportunity of explaining it, if you have any explanation to offer. From the 1st of June 1864 till the 1st of May 1865 was the disastrous time of the bank. On the 1st of May 1865 the bank was ruined, though there may have been some capital left. You were a director from the 1st of June till the December of that period. Of course a very great responsibility rests upon you, and upon other directors with you, and I think that it is fair to ask you whether you have any explanation to offer as to the great losses during that time?—I have only to say that I think, from what I have read of the evidence given before this Commission, that the secretary vastly exceeded his powers.

5423. But was not it your duty to check the secretary in so exceeding his powers?—I say that I have gathered this knowledge from the evidence before this Commission, and that I did not know it at the time.

5424. Who did you suppose was checking the secretary during the time that you were a director?—I supposed that the chairman knew more about the affairs of the bank than any other member of the board; but I had no suspicion that such transactions were going on, or that there was any necessity for any director to exercise a strict supervision.

5425. Then the fact, I suppose, is that you put unlimited confidence in Mr. Blair?—In his following the byelaws and orders.

5426. There were no byelaws.—I meant the rules of the bank.

5427. Will you kindly show me what those rules were?—I cannot show them.

5428. To us it appears that, with the single exception during your time of the resolution of the 6th of August 1863, there was no guide whatever to the secretary, and that resolution was practically rescinded.—Were there no byelaws before that day?

5429. Some years before there were, I believe, some byelaws, but they were long since obsolete. Do you not think that if the directors, commercial and government, had really gone into these matters, and had really investigated them, and had gone into the bank, and made inquiry, and looked at the daily book, and seen what large sums were going out every day, and had made inquiry about them, they must have got at the truth of these things?—I do not see that that would have brought them nearer the truth than a weekly inspection did.

5430. What inspection was there weekly?—There was a weekly board meeting.

5430*a*. If any director had gone to the bank, and had taken the daily book of the 19th of October 1864, he would have seen that 10 lacs had gone out the day before on Bombay bills, that is to say, on the bill of the Eastern Financial Association, of which I have told you. If you had then gone to the secretary, and had said, "To whom did these 10 lacs go yesterday?" he would have replied, "The Eastern Financial Association." Then if you had said, "What security did you get for those 10 lacs?" the whole thing would have been exposed to you?—It would.

5431. Or if any person had gone to that bank at any moment and had just asked a few questions in that way, the whole thing must have been exposed?—Yes.

5432. I believe that you were also engaged largely in what has not been inaptly termed the share mania of 1864?—I was interested in some of the companies which were then brought out.

5433. I believe that you were a promoter of the Back Bay scheme?—I was.

5434. How many shares were allotted to you?—25 of the first issue and 22 of the second.

5435. Had you no more issued to you in the name of any other person?—For my benefit?

5436. I am first asking you as to the fact. Had you any other shares issued to you in the name of any other person?—I had ten more shares issued to me, which I placed in the name of another person.

5437. In the name of what person?—Mr. Donald Robertson, secretary to the Bank of Bombay.

5439. What were their names?—I would rather not disclose the names of perfectly private and obscure persons in a public assembly; but I shall be most happy to furnish you with them upon a slip of paper, and if you consider it necessary in the interests of justice, that they should be published, I have no objection; they are persons wholly unconnected with India. These are the principal names (handing a paper to the president); but I would rather that they should not be publicly disclosed. I have no reason for concealment, except that they are one and all members of my own family.

5440. Then if I have received private information that those ten shares were put aside for General Rivers, it is not correct?—It is perfectly untrue, and has no foundation whatever in fact.

5441. If I have received private information that on General Rivers' positively declining to receive those ten shares they were divided between yourself and Mr. Robertson, that is incorrect?—That is equally untrue.

5442. Who operated on these ten shares for their sale?—I did.

5443. Through Mr. Robertson?—I myself sold them, and after selling them I wrote a note to Mr. Robertson requesting him to sign a transfer paper.

5444. I find that they were all transferred into the names of natives?—That I know nothing about.

5445. We have traced them in the books. You caused them to be sold?—I sold them.

5446. And you sent the money to whom?—I disposed of the money amongst those individuals. Will you allow me to add my reason for putting those shares in the name of Mr. Robertson?

5447. Yes, if you please.—It was on account of the notice which was being taken of this scheme by the public press, that we, the promoters, had each large allotments; and I simply did not wish that in public I should get the credit of holding more shares than were really my own; that was the sole reason. It was no doubt an injudicious act to put those shares in the name of an official of the bank.

5448. It has led to a great deal of very untrue scandal.—I am only sorry that I was not in Bombay when the Commission sat there, to have been able to give this explanation there.

5449. You were a commercial director. I suppose that you bought and sold shares during the time that you were a director?—I did.

5450. And in fact you were engaged in the speculations of the day?—I was engaged in some of them, not all.

5451. You were concerned in the purchase of the Mazagon land?—I was.

5452. You bought that land from the Government for 40 lacs of rupees?—We did.

5453. And you sold it to Mr. Diver, Mr. Taylor, and the other parties for 60 lacs?—Yes.

5454. And you were in the other speculations of the day?—You have mentioned the two principal ones.

5455. You bought and sold shares?—I did.

5456. Did you know that Mr. Birch was receiving allotments of shares when you were a director?—I knew of the allotment which he got in the Bombay Reclamation Company, from the fact of my being a promoter; I know of no others.

5457. Do you remember through whom he got the Back Bay shares?—They would have been allotted at a meeting of the promoters, where all the other shares were allotted.

5458. Who was present at that meeting?—The late Mr. Scott, Cowasjee Jehangeer, Premchund, and myself.

5459. Do you know that Mr. Birch got any other shares besides those?—I do not.

5460. You never heard that he was receiving allotments?—I do not recollect ever hearing anything about it.

5461. Did you know that Mr. Blair was receiving allotments from the different companies at that time?—I knew that he also received an allotment from the Bombay Reclamation Company; beyond that I have no knowledge.

5462. You have no knowledge that he was receiving allotments from almost every company which was started?—I dare say that I have heard him speak of shares; but I have no direct knowledge as to the names of the companies, or the amounts, or anything else.

5463. Did you not think it at all worth while to consider, or to inquire, how far the officials of the bank were involving themselves at that time in speculation?—I did not imagine that there was any great danger in Mr. Blair's receiving a few allotments of shares.

5464. Were you aware that the system in those days was to send allotments to almost all the bank managers?—I believe that it was.

5465. Of all the companies which were started?—Yes, so far as I know them.

5466. Did you know that Mr. Blair was buying and selling shares?—I did not.

5467. Did you know that he was entering into speculations other than in shares or joint speculations with other persons?—I never heard of it.

5468. With Mr. Tracey or any other person?—I never heard of any such operation.

5469. Did you know that Mr. Robertson was receiving allotments?—He also received an allotment, I think, in the Bombay Reclamation Company.

5470. Besides the ten shares which you transferred into his name, he received two?—Quite so.

5471. Were you aware that he was buying and selling shares?—I was not.

5472. Were you aware that he was entering into speculations with Premchund or others?—No; I never heard of it.

5473. Was there ever any discussion at the board as to the propriety of keeping watch over the officials of the bank at that exciting time?—I do not recollect ever hearing any.

5474. Is there anything further which you wish to state?—I have an application to make on behalf of Mr. Robert Hannay. I believe that he has sent certificates of the state of his health, which is very bad. I have received a note from him, and from Dr. Arbuckle, this morning, stating that if you will be kind enough to fix a day for examining him in an hotel in London, his medical advisers think that he may be brought here.

President. We have heard that they think that that would be less exciting to him than not coming.

Witness. He is most anxious to be examined, although he is not in a fit state of health for it at all.

President. He must thoroughly understand that we cannot have a private meeting, and that we can only leave it to the courtesy of parties not to intrude into the room. We cannot shut the door against anybody; the Act of Parliament prescribes that the inquiry shall be a public one, and therefore we can only put it to the courtesy of parties not to come into Mr. Hannay's hotel, except a few persons who are really largely interested in the matter, but we cannot exclude anybody who chooses to come. Mr. Hannay must be aware of that. Of course we shall be very anxious to give him an opportunity of being examined, not that we expect to hear much now beyond what we know, but we wish to give everybody an opportunity of explaining the transactions. Mr. Hannay has had an important part to play in this melancholy drama.

Witness. He has been very much blamed, and he wishes for an opportunity of vindicating his own character, so far as he can. He says that he thinks that Dr. Anderson, his medical attendant, will give him permission to come. I should mention that he is not at all in a fit state to be examined; he is in a very delicate state of health, and on that account it may take longer to examine him that it otherwise would.

3 Dec. 1868.

President. Then we will fix next Friday for him to be examined, and we will ask only such shareholders as really do take a very serious interest in the matter to attend, so as to try to keep the examination as quiet as possible for him; but you will let him understand that we cannot have a private meeting; the Act of Parliament only allows us to have public meetings in England.

CLAUD ERSKINE sworn and examined.

Mr. C. Erskine.

5475. President. When were you sworn in a member of the Council of Bombay?—I cannot remember the exact date, but it was on one of the very last days of the month of October, or one of the very first days of the month of November in 1865.

5476. When did you resign?—In May 1867. I was a member of the Council just about 18 months.

5477. How long was it before the affairs of the Bank of Bombay were brought under your notice?—They were brought under my notice in the course of what is called a currency crisis, which occurred about a couple of months after I arrived.

5478. I do not think that I can usefully take you into that matter. Was there anything else besides that, which attracted your attention before the report of the Government directors of the 31st of March 1868?—The general position of the bank of course had done so, in connection with what occurred at the time which I speak of, and in connection with the call made by the Government of India for some information, which led to the report of the Government directors which you speak of.

5479. The Government directors' report of the 31st of March 1866 is the first thing to which I will call your attention.—As it appears that reference is to be made to dates and to the course of correspondence, I may perhaps save some time by pointing out that in regard to the course taken by correspondence I shall be able to give very imperfect information, for this reason, the Governments in India (and I believe all the Governments are now so constituted) are divided into departments, the departments being assigned to distinct members of the Government; and in respect of those departments which were not assigned to me (of which the financial department is one) I only know so much as was brought under my notice when the papers were actually sent to me. If the Commissioners desire further information, the secretary of that department will probably be able to afford it. Whatever information I can afford I shall be happy to give.

5481. Then you were no party whatever to the proceedings upon it?—The Commissioners will see that the minutes of some of the members of the Government were sent, but that none of mine are there. As I am obliged to make that statement, I should also notice that the last two minutes appear to have been dated on the 11th of June, and that on that date I had gone to Poona, whereas they are dated from elsewhere.

5482. Are you able to account for the fact that this report, though dated on the 31st of March 1866, was never sent to the Government of India till the 17th of June following?—I can make no statement upon the subject of my own knowledge.

5483. Have you read this report of the Government directors of the 31st of March 1866?—Yes.

5484. Are you able to give us any information with respect to it?—I am not sure that I can, but if there is any question upon which I can do so, I shall be happy to supply the information.

5485. You say that you never saw that report until after it was sent to the Government of India?—I do.

5486. I will next call your attention to the Governor-General's letter of the 13th of July 1866, and to the paragraph at the bottom of page 28 of the Blue book. You remember receiving this letter?—I remember it perfectly, but I cannot say on what day I first saw it, and I cannot say that I was ever called upon to express any opinion on it, unless in connection with subsequent letters.

5487. I will call your attention to the following paragraphs in that letter.

"The Governor-General in Council, though fully sharing in the desire of the Bombay Government to uphold the credit of the bank, cannot suffer the revenues of India to be indefinitely pledged to the support of an establishment of the affairs of which he is kept in ignorance. The information furnished by the report of the directors contains little more than is to be found in the general statements of assets and liabilities published in the newspapers. That there may be no further misapprehension on this subject, the statement which his Excellency the Governor-General in Council requires is comprised in the following particulars: "First, the banks, firms, and individuals to which the bank is under advances;" [You will remark that that is general.] "Second, the dates and amounts of such advances; third, the securities upon which they have been made, and the sums advanced upon each security. The bank should have no hesitation in furnishing these particulars, which, having regard to the peculiar circumstances at present affecting the relations of the Government of India and the bank, his Excellency the Governor-General in Council is bound to demand." I believe that the tabular statement at page 96 of the Blue book purports to be a compliance with that requisition?—I must beg to state that I do not think that it is so. The letter to which you have just referred is dated the 13th of July. If reference be made to the bottom of page 57 it will be seen that there is a letter dated the 19th of September, from the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay, forwarding to the Governor-General the report of a special committee which had been appointed to go carefully through the whole of the claims of the bank, and who had made the report which is printed at pages 58 and 59 of the Blue book. I am not aware that up to that time this letter of the 13th of July had been replied to.

5488. It was not replied to; but you will find that on the 23rd of August 1866 information was again demanded. The letter of that date contains the following passages: "The wide difference between these losses, combined with the very meagre particulars contained in the half-yearly report above noticed, justify the entertainment of grave doubts whether the position of the bank has ever yet been stated as faithfully as the Government, in common with other shareholders, have a right to require. Until the Government of India are in possession of the particulars required in the 15th paragraph of my letter of July 13th," (that is, the paragraph which I have read,) "the Governor-General in Council will not be in a position to form a sound opinion of the position of the bank, or to arrive at any conclusion as to the future maintenance of a connection between the Government and the bank. So that there again the Government of India calls attention to its demands of the 13th of July?—I should wish to state that that letter was also despatched by the Government of India, before the despatch was sent to them containing the information which had been obtained by the special committee.

5489. I will follow the whole correspondence out. Then comes the next letter, dated the 13th of September 1866, from the Government of India to the Government of Bombay. "With reference to my letters dated the 13th of July and 23rd August 1868, I am desired to inquire when Government may expect the information therein required relative to the position of the Bombay Bank. In view of the approaching termination of the contract with the bank, it is desirable that there should be no further delay in considering the arrangements which may be necessary for the future transaction of the treasury business at Bombay"?—That was also before the date of the information.

5491. Then when you had that letter you at last sent information to the Government of India. You say to the bank on the 24th of October, "I am directed by his Excellency the Governor in Council to request that the directors of the bank will be so good as to favour Government as early as possible with information in the accompanying form regarding the position of the bank? (vide extract from Exhibit marked C 5.)—Yes.

5492. I believe that that form is in your handwriting?—Yes, it is certainly in my handwriting; and the only remark which I have to make upon it is this, that although it is in my handwriting it is not in company with the papers which probably would have rendered it unnecessary for me to appear here to-day. The letter of the Governor-General of the 3rd of October, which has just been referred to, was written on the receipt of the report of the special committee. I must beg to observe that the detailed information I cannot give; but there is a break between the letter of the 13th of July and the transmission to the Government of India of the report of that special committee. The report of that special committee was simply sent on with a forwarding letter. Then it was answered in this letter of the 3rd of October. This letter of the 3rd of October, in spite of that report, requests the information which was asked for in July, and must have been received in Bombay about the middle of October.

5493. I do not understand your point. Do you mean to say that the report of the committee at page 58 of the Blue book is any compliance with the letter of the Government of India of the 13th of July 1866? I do not; it has nothing to do with it. I am wrong in saying that it has nothing to do with it, because every former letter from the Government of India must have been borne in mind in taking into consideration any action upon any subsequent letter. So long as this particular form is not brought into the matter, I am willing to put the matter aside.

5494. Am I to understand you that no reply was sent to this letter of the 13th of July 1866?—I am sorry to say, that until the course of correspondence connected with that letter becomes mixed with the correspondence which originated out of the answer of the Government of India to the report of the special committee, I am not able to give any information about that letter. To the best of my recollection, I do not know that that letter was before me, until it came up with the subsequent papers which followed on the report of the special committee.

5497. Where?—Once, at page 61, at the end of paragraph 3. I am sorry to say that that letter is not forthcoming. It is the reply to the letter from the Government of India of the 3rd of October, and I believe that if it had been here it would have explained itself, and also would have explained this statement, especially if it had been accompanied with the note with which this statement is recorded. At the bottom of page 94 reference is again made to the 9th paragraph of the letter of the 22nd of October, which was the reply to the letter of the 3rd of October.

5498. That letter has not been produced, and the Government have told us that they have produced all letters?—I may mention that it is not in this office. I have been particularly anxious that it should be produced, but it is not in the India Office. It would have been very much more satisfactory to me that it should be here, accompanied by anything which I put on record at the time, without which I cannot so well explain the matter, but I will try to explain it.

5499. Was the tabular statement on page 96 meant to be a compliance, to any extent, with the requisition of the 13th of July 1866?—The reply of the 22nd of October was, I believe, in the form of a protest against that call; that is to say, against the indiscriminate and promiscuous disclosure of the whole of the circumstances and the name of every person who had received accommodation from the bank at that date.

5500. Upon what ground did the Government of Bombay object to inform the Governor-General of the amount of all advances?—I am not aware that they ever objected to inform him of the amount of all advances.

5501. It is not included in the tabular statement at page 96?—Quite so; but he had called for the names.

5502. I understand your case to be this, that the tabular statement is drawn up in pursuance and in conformity with a letter which is not disclosed, which the Government of Bombay wrote to the Government of India on the 22nd of October; is that so?—No; that tabular statement accompanied that letter, and it had a very special and a very practical object, but its object was not to profess to be a compliance with the call made in July. The Government of India not only had a desire to get a full statement of the affairs of the bank (and I must remind the Commission that what the Government of India were then calling for was not information to criminate any one, or to re-open any controversy), but as to the commercial and financial position of the bank. One very particular object of their solicitude at that time was an Act for amending the new charter of the bank, which was passed at almost this very moment, and which had led to a discussion in the Council, as to the propriety of re-imposing some limitation upon the amount to which advances might be made to a particular bank or firm. That proposal was made by Mr. Hunter himself, who had been the chairman of the special committee. It was supported by myself, but we were overruled; and just at that moment, when this statement of the objections of the directors, who then felt that it would be disloyal to their constituents to give the names of all persons who had dealt with them, was sent back in reply to those reiterated calls, it appeared to me, and it appears to me now, that it would not only throw a strong reflective light upon the general management of the bank, but that it would come before the Governor-General at the time when he was considering the charter which had just been passed, and would enable him to decide upon the wisdom or unwisdom, of what had been done.

5503. If I understand you rightly, the letter of the 13th July was never answered by the Bombay Government?—I am not aware of any answer to it, and I am not aware of what became of it.

5504. Then I am to understand that the Government of Bombay declined to furnish the Government of India with the information which they wished for? I do not care in what terms they did so, whether in civil terms or in other terms; but in substance did not they decline to give the Government of India the information sought, namely, "The banks, firms, and individuals to which the bank is under advances; the dates and amounts of such advances; and the securities upon which they have been made, and the sums advanced upon each security"?—To the best of my belief what they did was this———

5505. Did they in substance decline to give to the Government of India that explanation?—Will you say yes, or no, in answer to that question?—If submitting to a superior authority a remonstrance, with an intimation that the requirement is believed to be unreasonable, constitutes a declining to do it, they did decline; in any other sense they did not.

5506. I ask you as a matter of fact whether they did state the banks, firms, and individuals to which the bank was under advances?—That was abandoned by the Government.

5507. But it was not abandoned until after this statement was sent in. They never abandoned the requirement for "the dates and amounts of such advances"?—No. They never answered that letter in which the remonstrance was sent by us until the beginning of January.

5508. Did not they say, in the beginning of January, "With regard to the statement of advances which has been so long and repeatedly called for by this Government, I am desired to observe, in the first place, that, as recorded in the heading, it is a statement of sums overdue above the amount of three lacs for which on the 30th of June 1866 the Bank of Bombay was in advance by way of discount, loan, or otherwise, exclusive of loans on deposit (to the full value) of Government paper;" and so on?—Yes.

5509. Did they not further say, "This statement cannot therefore be received as containing a full and complete account of the bank's position in regard to its advances, inasmuch as there may be many sums for which the bank is under advance below three lacs of rupees, on which the bank may stand to lose as much in proportion as on larger amounts, and the aggregate of which may amount to a large sum"?—Yes.

5510. Did you, after the receipt of that letter, send to the Government of India a full statement of the amounts of the advances?—If I am not mistaken that letter contains the authority of the Governor-General to enter into an agreement, which was the purpose for which he had made that communication.

5511. Did you answer this question; did you supply this information?—I certainly did not believe that they wanted it.

5512. Then you did not supply the information?—No.

5513. Did the Government of India ever receive from the Government of Bombay the dates of the advances for which the Bank of Bombay was liable?—Not so far as I know.

5514. Did they ever receive any advice further than with respect to sums above three lacs, the securities upon which the advances had been made, and the sums advanced upon each security?—Not so far as I know.

5515. After looking at that heading, I suppose I may consider you as the author and parent of this tabular statement?—Certainly. I have already stated the object in my mind of the Government of India asking for it.

5516. Was that heading prepared in consultation with any of the directors of the bank?—With nobody whatever. I have already stated the object of preparing it (and to the best of my recollection it is a statement which follows the words of the first charter of 1840) was to see what sums had been granted, to which there would have been a bar under the original Act.

5517. Then I am to understand that it was a happy coincidence that the heading is so framed as to give no information as to what the condition of the bank was on the 30th of July 1866; and that the effect of the statement consisting of sums overdue above the amount of three lacs is to exclude all mention of the large loan of 25 lacs to Premchund, because his promissory note had not become due on the 30th of June?—I know nothing about that.

5518. And to exclude the loan of 19,66,000 rupees to the Asiatic Bank, which had actually gone into liquidation before this date?—I have stated the reason of the insertion of that date, namely, that it was the date of the report which the special committee was directed to revise. The term was afterwards extended by them, but Mr. Hunter's committee (which no doubt was in my mind at that moment) was to revise a statement which went up to the 30th of June 1866.

5519. Was not it the object of the Governor-General to get information up to date?—I have already stated that the Government of Bombay recognized as reasonable the objections of the directors of the bank to the information asked for by the Governor-General, and I was one of those who concurred in that opinion.

5520. Do you mean to say that the Government of Bombay thought that it was not reasonable to get information of the position of the bank up to that time?—I have not said so. When the directors of the bank considered that it would be disloyal to the constituents of the bank to give that information, I considered that it was not reasonable.

5521. Was not the bank at that time in such a position that the fullest information should have been given upon the matter?—The best answer which I can give to that question is, to refer to the report of the committee of September, and to state how that committee was composed. The president of that committee was Mr. Hunter, of the firm of Messrs. Graham and Company, a gentleman who was believed to have stood entirely aloof from all speculative transactions in Bombay, and a man of great soundness and sobriety of judgment. He had been more than once president of the Chamber of Commerce, and he was at the time a member of the Council in Bombay. Another member of the committee was, I believe, one of the most influential advisers of the Government of India in its transactions, namely, Mr. Edward Harrison, who was round in Bombay at that time, and who had an opportunity of going through every one of those figures, which would have been sent to the other side of India if the request had been complied with. And immediately on the back of such a report as that from a committee of persons perfectly independent, and aware of the bank's affairs, to ask for a complete disclosure (at a time of great local pressure) of every person to whom the bank up to that date had granted accommodation, did not appear to us to be reasonable.

5522. The date to which you refer is the 22nd of October 1865?—Yes; that letter.

5523. If the bank was ruined at that time, surely there would be no great harm in exposure?—Surely, if the bank was ruined, the Government of India would not have renewed an agreement with it?

5524. If the bank was at that time ruined, was there any harm in exposing that fact?—I shall answer the question when I understand the sense of the words, and what is meant by "ruined."

5525. Three-fourths of the capital of the bank at least was gone?—As far as I, an unprofessional person, can judge, this statement, which was called for by the Government of India, seems to ask for everything against the bank, and for nothing in favour of it. Considerable difficulty was raised with regard to that matter. The statement asks for all the liabilities, but it says nothing about obtaining a sound judgment as to the probable recoveries. It would therefore show the very worst position possible, but it would not (especially if the names were left out, as was afterwards suggested), furnish any means of estimating the probable recoveries.

5526. That is not the question; would not the information which the Government sought for, have given them the whole amount of outstandings?—Certainly.

5527. Would not it have given them the securities by which those outstandings were covered?—It would have given them the nominal value of them.

5528. Would it not, if it had been proper and full, have mentioned the names of the securities?—If it meant to ask whether in the case of advances which had been made on personal security it would have given the names of the persons there would have been no objection.

5529. Would not such a statement have given the names, for instance, of those who had obtained money on promissory notes, and shown the United Victoria and Colaba shares, and all the other rubbish which was deposited at that time?—Certainly; and the nominal value of the securities for loans which were not on personal security.

5530. Could not the Government of India have formed a very good idea of the position of the bank with those particulars?—In my opinion, not so good an idea as was formed by Mr. Hunter and by the Indian Government's own financial officer, who was at Bombay at the time.

5531. After such a damaging report as Mr. Harrison's report was, what harm would there have been in giving that information?—It was never asked for after that remonstrance.

5532. Do you mean to say that you supposed that the Government of India had abandoned their desire to have an answer to the letter of the 13th of July?—That is a speculative opinion which I hardly venture to form.

5533. Either you thought that they had abandoned their wish to have it, or not; and, if not, you ought to have sent it?—To the best of my belief they were desirous of not going into an ex post facto inquiry for the purposes of public justice, but were demanding this information in respect to the renewal of their agreement and relations with the bank; and their own answer to the letter of the 22nd of October contained an authority to the Bombay Government to renew those relations. I did not think that their calls were still operative. I should like to direct attention to a statement in that very letter of the 13th of July 1866, at page 28 of the Blue book, paragraph 14:—"In the opinion of the Governor-General in Council, it would be very unprofitable to proceed further in a controversy in the recent history of the bank." I did not consider that the historical part of the matter was before us.

5534. Can you show me anywhere an abandonment by the Government of India of their call for this information at page 28?—I have stated that I think I can.

5535. Where?—In their authority to act in the very matter for the sake of which they had made those calls.

5536. That is the argumentative conclusion to which you came?—It may be a reasonable one or an unreasonable one, but it is mine.

5537. We are quite clear about one fact, namely, that that requisition never was answered by the Government of Bombay?—Never, further than in the letter of the 22nd of October; the information was never furnished.

5538. Did the Bombay Government ever send to the Government of India the dates and amounts of the advances made by the Bank of Bombay?—Not to the best of my knowledge.

5539. Or the securities upon which they had been made, and the sums advanced upon each security?—No.

5540. Was not there a great disinclination on the part of the Bombay Government to send that information?—I really do not know. I should be very sorry to answer for any one else, but on my own part there was certainly very far from any disinclination so long as I thought that it could be done without disloyalty to others.

5541. What possible disloyalty could there be on the part of the Government to anybody connected with the Bank of Bombay?—I want you just to answer my question, how the Government of Bombay could be disloyal to the customers of the bank by complying with these inquiries?—I should say that the disclosure of the private affairs of any customer of the bank was a disloyalty.

5542. Is it your opinion that the supervision of the Government was to be a real, or unreal thing?—It was to be a real thing, certainly.

5543. If it was to be a real thing, how could you possibly imagine that they could ever get to the truth, as to the state of the Bank of Bombay, except by making such inquiries as the Government of India suggested?—The Government of India could have done it at once by sending round persons of their own to make such an inquiry, which would not have involved a disclosure, and they were told so.

5544. They were not told so in reply to their letter of the 13th of July?—No answer, so far as I am aware, was sent to that letter. They had been told, in the report of the Government directors, that if further inquiry of that kind was wanted the proper thing was to send people round to make it.

5545. I ask you whether any real investigation could take place into the affairs of this bank except by obtaining such information as the Governor-General demanded?—I think that not only what the Governor-General demanded, but other information than what he demanded, was absolutely necessary to enable him to form an opinion.

5546. Then it was necessary, in order to get at the real position of the bank, to procure the information which he asked for?—I say that it was necessary to have that and more; but not that alone.

5547. Was not it the bounden duty of the Government of Bombay and the Government of India, considering their connection with the Bank of Bombay, to ascertain what the real state of things was?—The Government of Bombay thoroughly believed that they had done that by means of that committee.

5548. That is not an answer to my question?—It was certainly necessary to do so.

5549. It was necessary for the Government of Bombay and the Government of India to make a full and searching inquiry into the position of the Bank of Bombay?—Certainly.

5550. Then do you think that the Government of Bombay did its duty by declining to make that searching inquiry, and confining its inquiries to such a statement as that which is set out at page 96 of the Blue book?—I have already stated that that statement was not intended to be an answer to the requirement, and that the Government of Bombay believed that they had obtained the further information through the special committee.

5551. Did the special committee state the dates and amounts of all advances?—I am not aware what their statement was.

5552. There was none, excepting what is in the Blue book; and from that you will see that they did not do so. I ask you whether the special committee did state the dates and amounts of such advances?—I am not aware of what they stated further.

5553. Or the securities upon which they had been made, and the sums advanced upon each security?—They professed to have considered every individual instance.

5554. Did they set out in their report all the papers which came before them?—Not that I am aware of.

5555. Then how can you think that the report of the select committee was a compliance with the Governor-General's request?—I must repeat that in the sense of giving the name of every individual it did not purport to be so; but in every other sense I believe that it was so, that committee consisting of an officer in whom the Government of India had every confidence, and who was high in their service, together with mercantile men of great experience and sober judgment.

5556. Do you mean to say that the report of this committee did state the dates and amounts of such advances?—I did not say that they had stated it, but that they had made the inquiry.

5557. The Governor-General wanted that set forth so that he might exercise his judgment upon it?—How he could exercise a judgment upon anonymous accounts I do not know, and if the names were to be given there was a protest against it.

5558. Would it not have been a great assistance to the Government of India in forming their conclusion to have had all that information?—Certainly, including the names.

5559. Or even without the names?—I think that it might have been very apt to mislead.

5560. You think that they would not have been able to form any estimate as to the advances?—I do not see how they could form any estimate in the case of advances upon personal security, or in the case of persons who were insolvent.

5561. Or of advances upon shares?—They might have formed an estimate in the case of some of them, if they were informed that there was a probability of an out-turn.

5563. At any rate the Government of India applied for that information, and did not get it. To us it appears most valuable information; it would have enabled them to see what the position of the bank was at that time. I ask whether you can in any way explain the reason why, apparently persistently, the Bombay Government refused to give that information?—As I have already stated, I am not aware of any reason except this one, that when these papers were before me (and on that one occasion, speaking for my own self personally, to the best of my recollection) my proceedings were guided by the views which I have just stated. I am quite unable to answer for any one else, and I should be extremely sorry if the Commission supposed that I was attempting to answer for any one else.

5564. I am afraid that we must go back a little upon this matter. Will you kindly tell us what the Bombay Government did on receipt of the letter of the Governor-General of the 13th of July 1866?—I have already stated, and I must repeat, that with regard to any action taken upon any letter or correspondence in the Financial Department I can say nothing until the papers came before myself.

5565. That is not an answer to my question. I ask you what they did?—Until the papers came before myself I do not know; that is to say, I can only state what was reported to me.

5566. Do you know what was done by the Bombay Government on the receipt of that letter of the 13th of July?—My belief is that communication then took place between the Government and the directors of the Bank of Bombay; whether it was written or verbal I do not know, but communication took place as to whether this information could be furnished with safety or prudence, or not.

5567. Did the Government of Bombay suggest that to the directors, namely, whether the information could be furnished with prudence or safety?—I am not aware whether they suggested it, but I say that I believe that communications then took place between the Government or such members of it as were primarily interested in this matter, and the Government directors, and through them with the other directors of the bank; that is, to the best of my belief.

5568. You are not able to say whether it was in writing or verbally?—No. I know nothing of what took place then, unless it was put upon record.

5569. Who objected to produce that information?—My belief is (I speak under correction) that the Government directors, on consulting the other directors of the bank, stated that it was believed that they would not be doing their duty if they furnished that information; at least without stating their opinion that it would be unadvisable to do so.

5570. Did Mr. Lushington state that?—If Mr. Lushington was one of the directors.

5571. He was present about that time, was not he?—Then I should say that Mr. Lushington can give much better information than I can on that question. I was in Poona and he was in Bombay.

5572. Do you know whether the objection was made verbally or in writing?—I do not.

5573. Do you know what was the exact nature of the objection?—My belief is that it would be that the state of the bank being then critical, might be made desperate, by an entire disclosure of all transactions, with the names of the then customers of the bank.

5574. Was that reason satisfactory to the Governor?—As I believe that it is possible for the Commission to obtain his own statement on that subject, if there is no objection I should rather leave him to speak for himself.

5575. Was it satisfactory to you?—I certainly thought that it was a sufficient ground for making a representation to the Government of India.

5576. What were the grounds of that representation?—I believe that they were what I have just stated, namely, that in our opinion it would be disloyal and even dangerous. I hope that the Commission are quite aware that in all this matter I am speaking after three years, in the absence of the papers which would have made it quite clear, and to the best of my recollection.

5577. Were not the Government shareholders in the Bank of Bombay?—They were.

5578. Had they not a right to examine the books?—Of course. They could only do it through some one. They had a perfect right to do that.

5579. What evil consequences did the Government of Bombay suppose would arise from a confidential communication to the Government of India of the names, and dates, and amounts of the advances?—To the best of my recollection, the risk which they apprehended was, that papers communicated to the Government, might at any moment be called for by Parliament or otherwise.

5580. That would be a process of time, would it not?—Supposing that Parliament were sitting it would be a process of some months. I am not prepared to say that the Bombay Government did not apprehend danger from sending all that information by post to the other side of India, without knowing who would see it there.

5581. Do you mean to say that the Government of Bombay could not have sent a confidential communication to the Government of India? Are they not in the habit of doing so? Is there no means of protecting such information?—In ordinary circumstances they would probably find means of protecting it from such a risk, but there is no absolute protection that I know of, and no means of protection against a Parliamentary demand.

5582. Then I understand that the Government of Bombay objected to produce these documents because it was possible that the subject of a confidential communication might leak out, and that it might at some subsequent period, be called for by Parliament?—To the best of my recollection, one of the reasons why they were not given was that any communication, however nominally confidential, might be injurious to the constituents of the bank if sent through the post. If I am to state whether there was any other objection, I would refer to what I have already said. I cannot be perfectly certain that this was in the paper sent to me, but my impression is that there was also this reason, namely, that if the information asked for was sent alone, it would not contain complete information, but only partial information.

5583. Do you mean to convey to the Commissioners that there was so little ingenuity in the Government of Bombay or their advisers that they could not frame a return which should convey that information without disclosing the names, and without disclosing the solvency or insolvency of parties, and so on, so as to give the Government of India very accurate information as to how things stood?—That is to say, information not only as to the amount of liabilities, but as to recovery.

5584. Was there no person ingenious enough in the Government of Bombay to draw up a statement in accordance with these three requisitions, omitting the names, but supplying the defect of the want of names by statements as to the solvency or insolvency of the parties to whom advances were made?—It would have been possible, for instance, to frame a return in much the same shape as the partial return of sums over three lacs of rupees; but in that return the whole statement as to recoveries would have had to be taken on trust, in so far as they related to personal securities or dividends on insolvent estates. I am not aware that any information could have been given without giving names. I am not skilled in these matters, but I am not aware of any.

5585. Was not there some other reason why the Government of Bombay did not like to disclose these particulars?—If I am to speak of myself, I say most distinctly that I know of none. My whole desire was to tell the truth, and the whole truth, but not the partial truth.

5586. Why was there so great a delay between the 13th of July, when the application by the Government of India was made, and the 22nd of October, when what you call an answer was sent?—I have already stated that in referring at all to that point I should be referring to what I know nothing about, and what others are responsible for, and what can be obtained from others. I cannot answer the question.

5587. Was there a good understanding subsisting at that time between the Government of Bombay and the Government of India?—That is a very large question. There had been in some departments of the Government of India a certain amount of antagonism.

5588. Was there any wish on the part of the Government of Bombay to conceal the bad management of the bank?—Speaking for myself, I can only say that to the best of my belief I certainly do not think that there is any foundation for such a supposition; and I must say that, if I am not mistaken in my recollections, the Government of India have somewhere stated that as regards recent management, that is to say, of any one at that moment connected with the direction of the bank, they did not impute mismanagement. As to persons who had passed away I cannot say.

5589. The letter from the Government of India of the 9th of January 1867 states, "This statement cannot therefore be received as containing a full and complete account of the bank's position." You remember that statement?—Yes.

5590. Is it not clear, from that statement, that what the Government of India had wanted was a full and complete statement of the bank's position?—Unquestionably.

5591. And that they complained that they had not received that statement?—I am not aware that in that letter there is any such complaint.

5592. They say, "This statement cannot therefore be received as containing a full and complete account of the bank's position in regard to its advances, inasmuch as there may be many sums for which the bank is under advance below three lakhs of rupees on which the bank may stand to lose as much in proportion as on larger amounts, and the aggregate of which may amount to a large sum." Do you suppose that that was an acquiescence on the part of the Government in that statement as being a full and complete account?—I have already stated, and I beg again most respectfully but emphatically to declare, that it was not intended as a complete statement.

5593. Was it not quite clear from that letter that what the Government of India wanted was a full and complete statement?—Certainly.

5594. Did you at any subsequent time to that 9th of January send a full and complete statement?—My honest belief, though I may be mistaken, is that the purpose for which the Government of India had been making these repeated requisitions was to enable them to judge whether they should renew the agreement with the bank, and in the very next paragraph to that which you have read they agreed to the statement as proposed by the Bombay Bank.

5595. You refer to these words: "The Governor-General in Council, therefore, after giving his anxious consideration to the present circumstances of the bank, cannot consent to the renewal of any agreement with the bank for a longer period than one year from the date of the expiration of the present agreement."—As to one year I am not certain. I referred to the next statement.

5596. "And a renewal for this limited period even must be contingent on the conditions laid down in the second paragraph of your letter of the 22nd of November, viz., 'that provided a statement that will be called for at the end of December next does not disclose a more unfavourable estimate of the losses sustained by the bank than that recently arrived at by the special committee,'" and so on.—Exactly; that was what the Bombay Government themselves had made a condition of recommending a renewal, namely, that the statement at that period should not be more detrimental to the bank than what had gone before.

5598. I understand your case to be this, that the tabular statement was not intended to be a compliance with the letter of the 13th of July?—Yes.

5599. Was it not a compliance so far as you thought fit to comply?—I have already stated, with the utmost sincerity, the motive which prompted me to ask for it.

5600. I want an answer to my question ; that is no answer. I ask you whether that tabular statement was not a compliance with the requisition of the Governor-General of the 13th of July, so far as you thought proper to comply ?—I have already stated that it was not a compliance with it at all.

5601. I know it was not a compliance with it, and that is what I am complaining of ; but was not it a compliance in so far as you thought that you ought to comply ?—No, certainly not.

5602. Was it intended to be a compliance with no part of it ?—Of course it would illustrate one part of it.

5603. Was it intended to be a compliance with no part of it ?—I can only repeat what I have already said, that what it was intended to be I have already endeavoured to explain.

5604. Was it a compliance with the Governor-General's letter of the 13th of July, so far as you thought fit to comply ?—I am speaking for myself personally. In making that suggestion I do not think that I was considering simply how much I could get, and how much I could not get, as to the state of the bank. I have already stated what was in my mind, namely, that it was for a legislative rather than a financial or commercial object.

5605. Do you mean to say that that statement was prepared without the slightest reference to the Governor-General's letter of the 13th of July ?—No ; of course not.

5606. Then was it not intended to be a compliance, so far as you thought fit, with the Governor-General's letter ?—So far as we thought the information could and would be granted immediately.

5607. It was a compliance with the Governor-General's requisition, so far as you thought that it could immediately be granted ?—I should like to qualify that statement. What was in my mind was not simply how much would be granted, but what would be the effect of granting this information with reference to a particular subject.

5608. Was it not a compliance with the Governor-General's letter, so far as you thought that it could or should be granted ?—I do not know that it was as much as could have been got.

5609. Was it not intended to be a compliance with the Governor-General's letter, so far as you thought that it could and should be granted ?—So far as accompanying a protest——

5610. "Yes" or "no" is all that I want; you may qualify as much as you like afterwards ?—I can make no answer except in that form.

5611. Why not ?—Because the action taken was not in reference to that.

5613. I ask you whether it was not intended as a compliance with the Governor-General's letter of the 13th of July, so far as the Bombay Government thought that it could or should be granted ?—The Bombay Government in their own letter, I believe, pointed out——

5614. Will you say "yes" or "no" to that question ?—I am afraid that I cannot. The Bombay Government in their letter, to the best of my belief, had pointed out how much more information could be got on this point.

5615. I am not asking that question ; but I am asking you whether that particular tabular statement was not intended as a compliance with the Governor-General's letter of the 13th of July, so far as you thought that it could or should be granted ?—I have very great difficulty in answering that question.

5616. I want to know the bearing of the document upon that particular letter. I ask you, and I cannot get an answer ?—It was sent as furnishing valuable information.

5617. Valuable information with reference to the Governor-General's letter of the 13th of July ?—Yes, certainly, with reference to this letter; but that that valuable information was the most which ought to have been sent, is what I cannot undertake to say.

5618. We will now turn to the tabular statement. It is headed, "Statement of sums over due above the amount of three lacs of rupees." Upon what principle did you ask for a statement of sums over due merely ?—I will look at the statement, and see.

5619. There is not a word in the Governor-General's letter upon that subject.—No ; I am quite aware of that. I believe that my intention in using the word must have been to avoid interference with current transactions ; that, supposing any person who had received a large advance at a former time, was still receiving advances, he should not be included in this statement.

5620. Was not the effect of that to exclude loans which had been renewed, and renewed over and over again ?—It was certainly not intended to do so, as there is a column here for renewals.

5621. Yes, but that was only the renewals of sums over due ?—In that case it must have been my ignorance if it has that effect.

5622. There are many sums which have been renewed over and over again, and which have never been recovered to this hour, but they are excluded from this statement ?—If so I must accept the responsibility of that.

5623. Why did you fix above the amount of three lacs of rupees ?—Because it was the sum in the old charter.

5624. But why did you select the sum in the old charter ?—Because, as I have stated, there had been a discussion in the Legislative Council only a few days before this, in which the expediency of re-imposing, for a time at least, a limit of that sort, had been agitated at the instance of Mr. Hunter, with whom I had sided.

5625. Did it not occur to you that that would really give no information to the Governor-General, or to anybody, as to the position of the bank ?—I think that the letter of the Governor-General appears to represent that it had given him some information, although very incomplete.

5626. The whole argument is to the contrary. The letter states that advances of sums under three lacs may cause the bank to lose as much in proportion as on the larger amounts ?—The Government of India say that it does give them some information. I can only say that it startled me.

5627. It startled everybody ; but it would have done so much more if the real facts had been given. My colleague, Major Innes, points out that it was calculated to mislead the Government of India, for in their letter they say, "This statement cannot, therefore, be received as containing a full and complete account of the bank's position in regard to its advances." They therefore do not apply the full value to the word "over due." I can mention three sums, which amount to half a million within a fraction, which are excluded by that word "over due," namely, Premchund's loan, twenty-five lacs, the Asiatic Bank, nineteen lacs and odd, and another sum of between two and three lacs, and no doubt there are others.—I accept the responsibility of that statement, and the overlooking of that point by the Government of Bombay. It probably escaped their attention as well as my own. It was not so intended.

5628. The heading of the tabular statement goes on as follows: "for which on 30th June 1866 the Bank of Bombay was in advance" ?—Yes.

5629. At the very moment when this return was made, on the 23rd of November 1866, it excluded Premchund. He was insolvent in September 1866, but his 25 lacs are not down because his promissory note was not due; but it was known in the bank that the loss was incurred.—I can only say that I know nothing whatever about that.

5630. Why did you fix the 30th June 1866?—Because that was the date up to which the accounts were to be revised by Mr. Hunter's committee.

5631. Would it not have been just as easy for the bank to make, and much more useful for the Government of India, if they could have got the account made up to date?—That was the last of the bank's half-yearly reports.

5632. Why did you go back more than a quarter of a year while giving information to the Government of India?—The object was to give that return at once.

5633. But it was just as easy to have made up the return to the day?—I have already said that if the effect of inserting the word "over due" was as is now stated, it must have escaped my notice.

5634. Did it ever strike you that the exclusion of the names would enable parties to fraudulently manage this tabular statement?—No.

5635. Look at the fourth item, "Financial Corporation." We have ascertained by evidence that that is the Eastern Financial Association.—Yes.

5637. The fact is that those were both the same, namely, the Eastern Financial Association, and by that means the Bank concealed from the Governor-General the fact that they had lent sixteen lacs to one of those worthless Companies.—The persons who prepared the statement would be answerable for that. I am myself strongly of opinion that an anonymous paper is, comparatively speaking, of small importance. I have stated so throughout.

5638. Could not that have been remedied by stating, in an additional column, what the position of the party was, whether he was insolvent, or what his position was to a great extent?—If something like deceit may be practised in the manner just indicated, it would certainly be much more practised in such a column.

5639. But still would it not be a guide and a help to the Government of India if it came from a trustworthy source?—Yes, I think so, supposing that it came from a trustworthy source.

5640. Was there no person in the Government of Bombay, or among its officers, who could be trusted to draw up such a statement?—I am not at all prepared to say that. I do not think that an official person could have done it; but a person such as Mr. Hunter, and others, could possibly have done it.

5641. I understand it to be your bonâ fide impression that some real evil consequence was likely to ensue from the Government of Bombay sending to the Governor-General of India, in a confidential communication, the names and all the information which he wanted?—I have partly answered that question. What my own opinion upon the subject may have been is of very little importance, but, forming it upon the opinion of others who were much more experienced, I did believe that the state of the bank, which was then very critical, might under such circumstances have become desperate.

5642. Did not the very fact of the state of the bank being critical, render it a positive duty on the part of the Government to probe it to the bottom?—Not so as to make it desperate. My belief, founded on what impression I could gather from other people, was that it would do so.

5643. How could it have done so?—I suppose in the same way as in any commercial community.

5644. Take it to the bitter end. Suppose that it had been bruited about in Bombay on the next day that the bank had lost almost all its capital (there was not a lac left after that), how would the bank have been worse off than it is now?—As I had no detailed information of the bank then, and have now a very imperfect knowledge of its affairs, I can only state that the difference, as it appears to me, might have been between a critical state and a desperate state. People who were much more conversant with commercial affairs than I was, including Mr. Hunter's committee, had not reported that it was desperate.

5645. I cannot see that there could have been any danger in disclosing the full truth; nothing damages a bank, or any institution, so much as wild rumours about it?—It is impossible to lay down that there could not be such a thing as an imprudent disclosure.

5646. Yes; but it scarcely looked like that in this case. I suppose that the Government of Bombay considered itself subordinate to the Government of India in this question of the bank?—Certainly.

5647. And as always bound to respect the commands from the superior authority?—Certainly. It will be understood that in saying so I mean that the Government of Bombay claimed for themselves that reasonable discretion which all subordinates do occasionally claim, and, if they thought it necessary, submitting a respectful remonstrance.

5648. But more especially I believe the Governor-General of India in the Financial Department reigns supreme?—He does, to a very great extent; and, as I have already stated, one of the direct servants of the Government of India was in that position. If you are now passing away from that return, perhaps I may be allowed once more distinctly to accept for myself alone the responsibility of preparing that return.

5649. Was no minute of the Government recorded as to the preparation of this statement?—The regular form of course is, that when it is proposed to send an answer to a despatch of that sort the nature of the answer is indicated either by a draft letter or by a minute.

5650. You have no notion as to any letters passing with the Government directors at that time?—No.

5651. The time between the 13th of July and the 24th of October is a perfect blank?—I was in Poona, and whatever went on went on in Bombay where the Government was.

5652. You were a member of the Council at the time of Premchund's loan. Were you at all consulted, or referred to upon it at that time?—I never heard a word about it, except by the merest rumours, and I knew nothing about it. I was not in Bombay.

5653. Were you consulted at all as to the loan to the Asiatic Bank?—No.

5654. The Government directors never spoke to you about it?—No.

5655. (Major Innes.) What reason could there have been for such delay in giving this very important information, which the Government of India wanted at once? The very information which you drafted could have been given in less than a week. What was the cause of the great delay in a matter in which urgent and quick decision was wanted? There was the interval between the 13th of July and November.—I have already stated, with regard to that letter of the 13th of July, that I do not think that I was ever called upon for an opinion on it; and, if it was brought before me, it must have been in connexion with the correspondence of the 3rd of October.

5656. Some time after the 13th of July it must have come to your cognizance, as a member of the Government, (I cannot tell when,) that on the 13th of July the Government of India had asked for this information; they had sent repeated reminders about it. Can you give us any information as to why there was any delay at all in giving the best information which you could give, or would give?—To the best of my recollection, I did not hear then of the letter of the 13th of July.

5657. Till when?—To the best of my recollection, I did not see it, as I stated just now, until it came before me in connexion with the letter of the 3rd of October.

5658. Is it your impression, or in your recollection, that such information as you could or would give was given immediately?—It is very difficult for me to answer as to what I had no control over. The Secretary who managed the correspondence, or the head of the Government, would know much more about it. I can speak as to anything which came before myself, and as to that I have said that I do not remember the letter of the 13th of July coming before me.

Mr. C. Erskine.

5659. You have no recollection of its striking you that there was delay in getting this important information?—I have a recollection of being told that the letter was there.

5660. But you never saw any reminders on the subject?—Not that I am aware of. It is difficult, after three years, to speak positively. To the best of my recollection, I have no remembrance of seeing the letter. I am particularly anxious that it should be fully understood that I have been speaking for myself alone. I should be very sorry to have it supposed that I was speaking for anybody else.

DONALD MACLEAN sworn and examined.

Mr. D. Maclean.

5661. (President.) You were for some time employed in the Bank of Bombay, were you not?—Yes.

5662. In what capacity were you first employed?—I went out as assistant. I was first employed in the secretary's office; in the correspondence department.

5663. When was that?—In November 1863.

5664. When were you appointed to deputy accountant of the bank?—In September 1864.

5665. When were you appointed officiating chief accountant?—On the 1st of April 1865.

5666. When did you leave Bombay?—On the 20th of February 1867.

5667. We were going to ask you a great many questions with regard to the return at page 96 of the Blue Book, but we now find that you were not responsible for it?—I was present when it was completed, but the instructions for it were given when I was at Poona on sick leave.

5668. Have you looked at it?—I have seen the return.

5669. Did you, or not, take part in its preparation?—No; I had no part in its preparation, beyond examining it after it was completed.

5670. I should have thought that you would have examined it, because you put your name to it. Under whose instructions did you prepare this return?—It was drawn up under Mr. Robertson's instructions, which were given direct to Mr. Slight, by whom the return was prepared.

5671. Do you recollect any instructions being given to you to divide the debt of the Eastern Financial Corporation into two, and to call one the debt of a Financial Association and the other the debt of a Financial Corporation?—No. I noticed it in the papers; and I am convinced that it is a mistake on the part of the clerk who prepared the return.

5672. Yo do not believe that there was any design in it?—No design whatever; of that I am quite satisfied. It arose from the Corporation being so called. The Association, as they called themselves, was as often called the Association as the Corporation, at that time.

5673. Do you remember this passage in the return, "Over-draft will be paid in full;" that refers to Premchund?—Yes; I recollect seeing that.

5674. Were you a party to the insertion of those words?—No.

5675. By whose direction were they inserted?—It must have been Mr. Robertson's.

5676. What allotments of shares did you receive?—I got two during the time that I was in Bombay; I only got one when I was accountant.

5677. And the other you got when you were deputy accountant?—Yes.

5678. What were they?—Ten shares in the Mercantile Credit Financial Association, and ten in the Indo-Egyptian Bank; there is no such bank as the Indo-Egyptian now; it is now the National Bank of India.

5679. Did you not also have some shares in the Eastern Financial Association?—I had a small interest in five shares.

5680. They were purchased by you?—Mr. Watson purchased them.

5681. They were not allotted to you?—No.

5682. Does this letter refer to that transaction? (Handing Exhibit E. 6. to the witness.)—Yes. It says five shares, but it should have been ten.

5683. That letter is signed by you, and is addressed to Mr. William Watson. It is dated, "Bombay, 9th January 1864," and contains the following words: "I begin to suspect our speculation is not to be a very lucky one, but I shall hold on yet, and take my chance."—My explanation of it is, that about that time the Financial Association were issuing new shares, and Mr. H. D. Watson wished to take up the new shares; and being a personal friend of Mr. William Watson, of the Eastern Financial, I wrote, and asked him whether he would advance the money at Mr. H. D. Watson's request. He replied that he would, but I did not go into the transaction, as he wished me to sign a promissory note.

5684. Is that the only speculation in shares which you indulged in?—No; I had another in the Financial Association of India and China. Mr. Fraser, the inspector of the bank at that time, bought 11 shares, and I had an interest in the purchase to the extent of five.

5685. Had you anything else?—Not that I can recollect.

5686. Did you not buy any shares in the Asiatic Bank?—Never.

5687. Are all the shares for which you are made contributory shares which you held on behalf of the Bank of Bombay?—Yes; all, except those which I have mentioned. I had none of my own in the Asiatic Bank.

5688. The whole 345 old shares of the Asiatic Bank, as to which we find that you are a contributory, are shares of the Bank of Bombay put into your name?—Yes.

5689. You were accountant to the bank at the time of the advance to the Asiatic Bank, which is sometimes called a cash credit and sometimes an overdraft?—Yes.

5690. How do you explain those transactions? When a cash credit is opened for 20 lacs, and certain securities are deposited, and the account goes on, and the securities are realized, what ought you to do?—To see that the money is paid in.

5691. What do you mean by that?—In the case of the Asiatic Bank they frequently lodged bank bills as security, and they were handed over to the bank.

5692. They began by lodging some very good securities, promising to lodge a great many more very good ones, Government paper, for instance; then they began drawing, and against their drawings they realized some of these securities?—Yes.

5693. What ought you to have done when the securities were realized?—If the securities were realized by the Bank of Bombay, they ought to have been credited to the overdrawn account or the cash credit.

5694. Do you not immediately reduce the cash credit by so much as the securities have realized; is not that the right principle?—Yes.

5695. Was that done in the case of the Asiatic Bank?—I think so, to the best of my recollection.

5696. Just look at the list of securities. They were realized to an enormous amount, and yet at the end of the first cash credit the balance the evening before was 12,45,284 rupees. I want to know upon what principle of accounting that was? A man may go on for ever if his account is left in that state. This was really the practical working of the thing: they began by giving good securities; when the first cash credit came to an end you were left with a large balance, and with hardly any security, and then you were glad to get any security you could; then a new cash credit was opened without any fresh security, and they were allowed to run up to 20 lacs. (The account was handed to the witness.) I want to understand that. You will see that the first cash credit which was granted extended to the 13th of July, when a fresh cash credit was granted; on the 13th of July, when you gave the second cash credit, you had only 1,50,000 rupees of good securities, and all this rubbish of McIndoe and Rogers left; it is called 8,50,000 rupees, but it realized hardly anything. There is a balance of 12,45,000 rupees against the account the evening before, and there are only those securities left. The securities of Mc Indoe and Rogers only realized 63,000 rupees, after years of attempt to realize them. What ought to have been the proper system of accounting under those circumstances?—Certainly the bank ought to have seen that it had got the money for those securities.

5697. Ought not you, first of all, instead of carrying that cash credit to a current deposit account, to have carried it separately to a cash credit account; was not that the first error?—Yes.

5698. Then in the next place, after you had done that, when you had carried it in a separate ledger to a cash credit account, ought you not to have reduced the cash credit by all the securities as you realized them?—Yes.

5699. The effect of that would have been, notwithstanding your great disappointment in not getting the Government paper and something else, that you would have been in a very much better position. I want to know how it was that this cash credit was in fact mixed up with the current deposit account?—It was not under my orders.

5700. But you were the chief accountant at that time?—As a general rule, the ledger keeper had his instructions direct from Mr. Robertson, without passing through me at all. When Mr. Robertson sent a memorandum to him it very often went direct to him, and I never saw it.

5701. Look at the next cash credit. You there extended the cash credit up to the 1st of September 1866; the second credit ends on the 1st of September. Just see what was the balance on the evening before. It was 16,52,000 rupees. How is it that you allowed them to go on drawing; they ran the debt up to 20 lacs after that?—It must have been under the secretary's orders, and of course in my position I had no right to dispute them.

5702. I understand that you disclaim any responsibility for that system of accounting?—Certainly.

5703. You admit that it was wrong?—I do.

5704. The real vice was that you mixed up the cash credit with the current deposit account; when you once did that there was no keeping the thing right. If you had stopped, and had held your hand, you would have saved three lacs; but I suppose that you were not responsible for that?—I was not; I simply acted under orders.

5705. Did you receive orders to go on cashing cheques afterwards?—Certainly. I never cashed a cheque in the Bank of Bombay without an order.

5706. There were three lacs actually lost by allowing that cash credit to be drawn upon after it was over. What is the proper practice when a cash credit account is opened?—Do not you always head the cash credit account with the amount of the intended advance?—Yes.

5707. What is the object of that?—To show the limit.

5709. We find that on several occasions that was not done in the books of the Bank of Bombay. Was not that a very loose system of accounting?—It must have been an omission of the ledger keeper.

5710. But still the ledger keeper was under you, and you ought to have looked after him upon such a point as that. Did you deal with any speculations as distinguished from shares?—No, none whatever.

5711. You were never engaged in any speculation?—No.

5712. Did you know that any of the authorities of the bank were so engaged?—I knew that many of them had got allotments in shares, but I cannot say that I knew that they were speculating.

5713. Did you know that the president had allotments in shares?—No.

5714. Or Mr. Blair?—I knew that he had allotments, but he never told me that he was speculating.

5715. Or Mr. Robertson?—No. I knew that he had some shares; Back Bays and others.

5716. (Major Innes.) What was really your position in the bank as accountant?—Subordinate to the secretary and deputy secretary.

5717. Had you not responsibilities as well as subordination?—My duties were never defined.

5718. Did you take any steps to protect yourself in case of your being censured for anything which was wrong with regard to your books or anything of that sort while you were there as accountant? Any one holding a responsible position generally takes care to have his duties defined, and a set of rules to act upon.—I took care to have authority from the manager or the deputy manager for anything which I did.

5719. Verbally or in writing?—Generally in writing; almost always in writing.

5720. Were the subordinate accountants and clerks subordinate to you or to the secretary?—They were to a certain extent subordinate to me, and they could appeal to the secretary.

5721. I fancy that you consider yourself responsible for the accuracy of the books, and for the way in which the books were kept altogether?—Yes.

5722. Do you not consider yourself responsible for the way in which distinct accounts, cash credits, current accounts, and so on, were kept?—Yes, if it can be shown that it was not done under the secretary's orders.

5723. On the contrary, does it not lie with you to show that in the case of any divergence from what was customary, or what was considered proper, you had authority for departing from it?—Yes; but so far as I could, I kept the books in the same way as they were kept before I was made accountant; I made no change, and had no authority to make any.

5724. Then in any departure from the usual rule of the bank, would you not consider it necessary to have a very careful record made of any orders of the secretary which directed such a departure?—Yes; I believe that such orders were kept.

5725–6. What was your rule in keeping a cash credit in which securities were given, with reference to the mode of showing the existence and the reduction of those securities? It is a point of form. I think that you are responsible for knowing and showing how that was done?—The rule was, if the securities were given up, to see that the account was reduced by their value.

5728. Would it not be done by desiring the ledger keeper to put at the top of the book the diminution of the amount of the cash credit?—Yes. If it was an open cash credit a man might perhaps draw up again to the full extent.

5729. Would you not see that the cash credit was to be reduced by the amount of the securities realized?—Yes.

5730. Did you do so in the case of the Asiatic Bank?—I should fancy not; but so far as I recollect orders had never been got from the secretary to reduce the amount. I could not do it of my own accord.

5731. You would consider yourself bound to know what was going on in these matters, and to see that any orders should be brought to your notice?—I did not know the arrangement between the Bank of Bombay and the Asiatic Bank.

5732. Do you wish us to understand that when the securities were realized the money obtained on those securities, when paid into the credit of that account, was not known to you or to the ledger keeper as being the result of the realization of securities?—Yes, it was known.

5733. Then if it was known why did not you take steps to get that transaction recorded in a proper way in the cash credit account, that is to say, that the maximum of the cash credit should be reduced by that amount? I should say that the onus rests with you, unless you can show that it ought not to have rested with you.—It is a good while now since the thing occurred, and I wrote to Bombay for some information both about this and some other matters, but I have not got it.

5736. That is one of the two or three large transactions in which the Bank of Bombay was concerned; it is a very serious one. So far as I can understand, if the form of that account had been properly kept, that is to say, if the ledger keeper had been told to reduce the maximum of the cash credit by the amount then paid in there would have been no loss in connexion with the Asiatic Bank; and therefore it is either defective and wrong book-keeping or it is an abnormal order of some authority; and I ask you, as accountant, whether you can give any explanation of that?—I am sorry that I cannot give you more information about it.

5737. You became accountant in April 1865?—Yes.

5738. Do you remember any new books being started then?—Yes. There was one which we called the general loan ledger, which included all sums advanced; it was commenced in 1865.

5739. Do you remember when?—It was just about the time that Mr. Blair left; and, so far as I recollect, it was continued up to the time of my leaving Bombay.

5740. What use was made of it?—It was submitted to the directors, I believe. It was always kept in the directors' room.

5741. What use was made of it?—It was a book of reference.

5742. Was it ever referred to?—Yes.

5743. What did it contain?—It showed at once what each man had had from the bank.

5744. Did it contain every item for which the man was liable?—Yes, in one general account.

5745. For instance, take the case of the loan to the Alliance Financial Association, in which Dr. Diver and Atmaram Madhowjee and others put down their names, would that be put down against Atmaram Madhowjee?—It was put against the directors' names.

5746. You say that it was a ledger in which the whole liability of each man was shown?—Yes.

5747. Was such a liability as that shown against Atmaram Madhowjee under his name in that book?—Yes.

5748. Have you any recollection of a great number of lacs being shown against Atmaram Madhowjee in that book, or anywhere?—In that book it would certainly appear.

5749. How do you know that it would?—If the book was properly kept it would.

5750. How do you know that it would?—The purpose for which the book was opened was to show the amount which each man had had from the bank.

5751. That was the object?—Yes.

5752. How do you know that that object was carried out? We know that the distinct ledgers must be rightly kept; there may be a wrong position of an item, but they must be otherwise rightly kept, because the totals must balance. This book is outside that, and it is a book which we never saw, and of which we never heard. I want to know what arrangement there was by which you would know that the items in this book were correct?—We have frequently had occasion to check it. Mr. Robertson always sent down a memorandum to me asking how much So-and-so had had from the bank. I made it up from the bank books, and then had it checked by this book.

5753. Have you any recollection of what sums this man, Atmaram Madhowjee, a comparatively insignificant man, had, and who was responsible to an enormous amount?—I cannot say that I specially recollect him; but I recollect such cases as you describe; Cama, for example.

5754. Can you account for the reason why that book should not have been shown to us?—I cannot account for it at all.

5755. It must have been a very large one?—It was a very large book.

5756. Do you think that it could possibly have been found to be of no use?—No; it was very valuable.

5757. (President.) Was it either of those books? (The books before the Commissioners being shown to the witness.)—No.

5758. (Major Innes.) Mr. Rodgie, I suppose, must have known of it?—The clerk in the directors' room had charge of it.

5759. Who was that?—Mr. Duncan; and Mr. Rodgie was constantly referring to it.

5760. For outstandings against individuals?—Yes.

5761-2. No director whom we have examined ever saw the book or heard of it.—They must have seen it. It was always lying in the directors' room.

5763. But was it prominently brought to their notice? One of the complaints which we heard from the directors was that they were misled as to the sums outstanding against any man, because, for instance, when they asked, "What other bills has this man got?" when an advance was wanted, the answer would come back stating what bills were out, but not what cash credits or loans there were; and thus, as a rule, they were misled as to what was outstanding against a man (I do not say intentionally so), because all the outstandings against him were not shown, but only those under the particular head which was mentioned. That would not have occurred if that book had been there?—Nevertheless the book was in the directors' room. I cannot say whether they referred to it.

5764. Were you ever present at a meeting of the directors?—No.

5765. Have you any notion how the accuracy of that book was checked?—By referring to the other books.

5766. How?—By taking the discount ledger, and so on.

5767. Periodically you made up lists of the sums outstanding against any person?—Yes.

5768. Every six months, I think?—Yes.

5769. A list of bills outstanding was made up?—Yes.

5770. A list of loans outstanding was made up?—Yes.

5771. And of cash credits outstanding, and so on?—Yes.

5772. Were these ever added together, so as to show the amounts advanced to one man, and so as to make up a total abstracted from that book?—It was checked with the general ledger. We took the total bills discounted, we took the total cash credits, and the loans, and soon, and put them all together; and of course it agreed with this book.

5773. How was it done; because it was not an easy thing to do?—The book could not be checked in one way; of course you could not make a balance; but this list was compiled from the bank books every six months, and then it was checked by this book.

5774. I want to know how it was checked from that book. We have prepared these lists. We had no book of that kind to use. If we had had it it would have saved us an immensity of trouble. We had eventually to make out a list, which would have been compared with the book, if we could have found it. Was any list like that ever made out before during your time in the bank? We wanted such a list, and asked for it, and it did not seem to have been prepared, and no one seemed to know how to prepare it.—There must have been a list like that, because it was shown to the directors. Of course the list would contain all the information in the large book.

5775. The large book would, as I understand, contain what no other book would contain; it would contain every liability against one man; that is what I understand you to say that the large book contained?—Yes.

5776. No other book could contain the same information?—No.

5777. Therefore I want to know whether you checked that big book; and if it was not checked, I want to know whether it might not be all wrong; and if it was all wrong, what was the good of it; and if it was checked, was not it positively found so incorrect that it could not be used?—It was checked every day, and I referred to it. I always made up my information from the bank entries, and in order to check myself I compared it with this large book. Of course if I found the total agree it was correct. I so constantly wished to ascertain how much any one man had had from the bank, my information on this point being so frequently asked for, that I believe all the accounts were very often checked in that way.

5778. You cannot tell us more about that book; it was never checked in a formal way?—No.

5779. Nor periodically?—No.

5780. Have you any recollection of the form of the book?—Yes; it was kept somewhat in the same style as the current account ledger, showing the current balance. We had a space showing what the matter was, whether a matter of cash credit or not, and then a column for the date, and a column showing the total.

5781. Did you put the interest in?—No.

5782. Then how did the totals come right? I suppose that the other accounts had the interest?—There was a progressive balance.

5783. And the interest was to be added?—Yes.

5784. Do you think that we shall find that book on going back?—Yes. You will find two volumes; one volume I believe was finished in 1865, and another was going on when I left.

5785. Do you think that any one used that book except the secretary?—I think that I have seen the directors look at it; but I cannot say positively. I think that Mr. Hannay has looked at it.

5786. Then, from April 1865, if any question was asked as to what amount was outstanding against any man, it would be incorrect for it to be confined to any one description of advance?—Yes, I should say so. In addition to this book there was a printed form, with the headings "bills discounted," "cash credit," or whatever a man had, and the description of the securities.

5787. When the periodical returns were prepared half-yearly or annually, you of course showed on one side of the accounts the sums due to the bank?—Yes.

5788. How were the over-drafts shown?—They were omitted; they were not put in at all.

5790. Did the auditors notice that?—No.

5791. Was it their business to notice it?—I do not see how they could have noticed it. There ought to have been another account opened for over-drafts.

5792. Was that a useful audit?—Perhaps not.

5793. (President.) Have you been in communication with Mr. Blair and Mr. Robertson with regard to the evidence before this Commission?—No; I have not seen Mr. Blair at all.

5794. Have you written to him at all, or has he written to you?—Yes; I got a note from Mr. Blair last night.

5795. Have you had correspondence or communication of any sort with either of those gentlemen as to this book of which you have spoken?—None whatever.

5796. You are quite sure as to that?—Perfectly sure.

5797. It is an extraordinary thing that Mr. Stewart should not have given up that book to us. I have heard Mr. Stewart himself complain of the system, and state that his inquiries often failed to elicit how much was outstanding against a man; whereas if such a book as you have mentioned was in existence that would have been almost impossible?—I am almost sure that Mr. Hannay saw the book.

Adjourned to the 4th December at 11 o'clock.

PRESENT :

President.

SIR CHARLES JACKSON.

Member.

MAJOR MCLEOD INNES.

Secretary.

F. D. CHAUNTRELL, ESQ.

SYLVESTER DOUGLAS BIRCH recalled and further examined.

Mr. S. D. Birch.

4 Dec. 1868.

5798. (President.) This is Mr. Blair's handwriting; it is a note addressed to you (handing Exhibit Z 1. to the witness) ?—Yes.

5799. He states in this letter that power was granted to the secretary to pass loans recommended by one director, but that that was not recorded?—Yes.

5800. He further says that Mr. Robertson recollects that Mr. Blair mentioned this circumstance to him, on the breaking up of one of the board meetings, and told him that you had put a note in your memorandum book. Was there any such order made, that loans recommended by one director should be passed?—Certainly not loans, as far as I can remember.

5801. Did you ever keep a note book of this description?—Never.

5802. Then you never stated that you would put it in your note book?—Never. All that I kept was a Letts's Diary, which was torn up at the end of the year, and I was not likely to put into it a thing of that sort.

5803. You never kept notes of the bank's transactions in those Letts's Diaries?—No.

5804. Are those Letts's Diaries in existence?—No; they are all torn up. I never kept them after the end of the year.

5805. Did you ever say that Mr. Blair, as secretary, had more power than might be given to another secretary?—I do not remember saying anything of the sort.

5806. Did you return any answer to that letter?—I did not. I never went near Mr. Blair again. There seemed to be a serious misunderstanding between us. I stated when I saw the Blue Book what I thought of the proceedings, and he wrote me that note. I never went near Mr. Blair or near Mr. Robertson afterwards.

May I call attention to the minute of mine which you had the other day as to the powers of the secretary. It was on the 27th of April 1864. This is in Cowasjee's minute. I did not turn over the page the other day, and I stated my impression that it had nothing to do with the power of the secretary in granting loans or discounts. I say here, "Whilst retaining the sole responsibility, the board has not exercised a petty interference with the details of business, but laying down general rules for the guidance of the secretary, has given him a discretionary power to act in matters affecting the current business. I believe this to be the rule of all head offices, and that where there is a board, the secretary is the ministerial officer, not, as Mr. Cowasjee would have him, the colleague of the directors." Then I say, "I feel some difficulty in dealing with the other portion of Mr. Cowasjee's letter, and think it will be expedient that we should discuss with him what he includes in the term 'any matter secret' before passing an opinion. For my own part I have not the slightest objection to allow any proceedings in which I have taken a part being laid before the shareholders in the fullest detail." Mr. Scott states, "I entirely agree with Mr. Birch;" so that every one of these gentlemen knew what the powers conferred upon the secretary were. The whole of this goes to show what the voice of the secretary at the board was, and nothing further.

5807. Your observation applies to the fact that he had a voice at the board?—So he had.

5808. Is that your explanation of that transaction?—Yes. He talks about a voice at the board, and a veto. Mr. Cowasjee wanted him to veto our proceedings at the board. I say that he sits as our ministerial officer, and not as our colleague.

5809. There was more than that: Cowasjee says in his original letter of the 21st April, "I must express my opinion as to the defect of trusting the whole management to directors without manager has a voice in it, and to explain all to my co-proprietors of my reason for doing so. I must explain in detail, and to prevent misunderstanding I must here express that I am not bound to the Institution to keep any matter secret, except people's credit and advances, as such I consider most vicious to maintain in a public institution as Bank of Bombay."—He talks of financial arrangements at the end of that note.

5810. He adds: "But yet if my colleagues think contrary and to what extent I should keep secret, they should decide. Please put this paper in circulation amongst my colleagues and oblige. Cowasjee Jehangeer." I will read your minute over again. "I confess that I do not understand the exact purport of Mr. Cowasjee's letter. He has given notice of two motions, neither of which he has brought forward, feeling that the sense of the whole board was against him. In the course of discussion which has arisen out of Mr. Cowasjee's notices it has been shown that the power which he wishes to confer on the secretary and treasurer of the bank is practically conceded to that officer." You say that it is not a veto which is meant?—No, it means a voice at the board.

5811. You go on to say, "And I am of opinion to as full an extent as is consistent with the proper and effective management of the Institution. Whilst retaining the sole responsibility the board has not exercised a petty interference with the details of business." "But laying down general rules"——— Will you kindly tell me where those general rules are?—I think that they were in force in the old charter.

5812. Will you point out those general rules?—I cannot find them.

5813. You continue in your minute: "But laying down general rules for the guidance of the secretary has given him a discretionary power to act in matters affecting the current business. I believe this to be the rule of all head offices, and that where there is a board the secretary is the ministerial officer, not as Mr. Cowasjee would have him, the colleague of the directors." Then the rest is as to the other point. I think that it is probable that it is open to that explanation that it only applied to his being a colleague of the board.

Then will you allow me to draw attention to the evidence of Mr. Jacomb, one of the Government directors; he took his seat on the 9th of June 1864.

He says that I was consulted in everything, and that he sat with me only at three boards, the 22d of September being the last time that he sat. My last sitting at the board was I think in the last week of June, before I went up to Poona, so that in July, August, and September I was not at the board with him. How he should have got the impression that I was being consulted when I was at Poona I cannot understand. He says that I was being consulted. Now I was at Poona the whole of July, August, and September, and my first sitting afterwards was on the 6th of October.

5814. He might have got the impression that you were consulted during the first month that you were with him at the board?—I think that there was no large loan before I left.

5815. There were a few loans in 1864.—Cowasjee was at the board when I left, and I did not sit with Premchund at all until he was re-elected on the 12th of December 1864.

Mr. J. L. Lushington.

JAMES LAW LUSHINGTON sworn and examined.

5816. (President.) Which Civil Service do you belong to?—The Madras establishment.

5817. Are you in the financial department of the Government of India?—Yes; I am Accountant General to the Government of Bombay.

5818. When did you receive that appointment?—I think at the end of February 1865.

5819. When were you appointed a Government director of the Bank of Bombay?—I took my seat for the first time, I think, on the 16th of March 1865. I do not recollect the date of the appointment.

5820. I find that you became president when Mr. Lidderdale left?—Yes.

5822. And you remained president until the bank went into liquidation?—Yes.

5823. You were absent for a long time. You were absent when Premchund's loan of 25 lacs was made?—I was absent from the 1st of February 1866 to the 4th of May; but I think that it was two or three days later than that I took my seat at the board, I think about the 7th of May.

5824. You sat on the 8th of May?—That was the time.

5825. Did you receive any instructions when you were first appointed a Government director?—None whatever.

5826. Did you receive any orders as to how, and to what extent, you should communicate with the Government?—None whatever.

5827. You were left entirely to your own judgment as to what you should do?—Entirely.

5828. I think that the first resolution of the board after you took your seat was that of the 12th of April 1865?—Yes.

5829. Had the panic set in then?—It was commencing. I do not mean to say that there was a panic then.

5830. But a tightness in the market?—Yes.

5831. You were present at the meeting of the 12th of April 1865?—Yes.

5832. Who was the author of that resolution?—I cannot say for certain. I imagine that it must have been the president for the time being.

5833. Mr. Hannay?—Mr. Hannay.

5834. Did you approve of that resolution?—I imagine that I must have done so from there being no opposition to it.

5835. There might have been opposition?—But it is not recorded.

5836. No amendment was moved or seconded, but you did not disapprove of the resolution?—I disapproved of the rates at which the shares of some of the companies were to be taken.

5837. Did you think them too high or too low?—Too high. I objected especially to the rate for Bombay Reclamation Company's shares.

5838. Was that put to the vote?—When the rate was mentioned, I said that I thought that it was too high, and I think that the chairman replied, "I believe that there is no gentleman in this room who would not be glad to buy any number of those shares at 25,000 rupees instead of 20,000." I was new to the place and to everything, and naturally felt that as my colleagues gave it their acquiescence they were better informed than I was.

5839. Then you did not press the matter to an amendment?—I did not. I was perfectly new to Bombay at the time. I had only lately arrived, and I think that it would have been presumption on my part if I had pressed my views too persistently against the views of my colleagues, who had so much greater experience than I had.

5840. Did they call your attention to the old resolution in which it had been resolved by the board, that every advance on shares should be brought to the notice of the board itself?—I do not recollect its being mentioned at all.

5841. Was the resolution read out?—It must have been read out at the subsequent meeting.

5842. But you do not recollect its being read out at the time?—Very likely it was not put in form at the time when this resolution was passed. It very often so happened, that the scroll minutes were not in the same form as that in which they afterwards appeared, but were worked out subsequently.

5843. Did they mention to you, or did the secretary mention, the previous discussions upon this question, which are recorded in the scroll minutes of September 1863?—I have no recollection of the matter being brought forward in any way.

5845. You perfectly well knew that you were advancing on shares the calls of which were not all then made, and that you were advancing on the premia of shares?—I was aware that we were advancing on the premia of shares, but I cannot say that I knew whether the calls had all been made or not; I had at that time a great deal to learn regarding the Financial Associations and Corporations.

5846. You remark that it is said there that the advances were to be made at the discretion of the secretary?—Yes.

5847. Did that attract your attention at the time?—I cannot say that it did.

5848. Do you think that that was a prudent thing to do?—I do not think that it was at all a prudent thing to do, but my impression at the time was, that he had only the same powers as the secretaries of the banks of Bengal and Madras had.

5849. Who was to be the judge of who were first-class applicants under that resolution?—I imagine the person passing the loan.

5850. The secretary?—The secretary.

5851. When you adopted that resolution did you think that you were sanctioning for the first time advances on shares?—Certainly; so far as I can recollect it had not been brought to our notice that advances had been made on shares previously to that time, but undoubtedly on looking over the books it appears that they had.

5852. You did not know that at the time?—No; there was nothing at all upon this resolution to show us that advances had been made on shares before.

5853. You did, I suppose, think at the time when you passed that resolution that this was the first sanction to your advancing on shares?—I thought that they were then obtaining a sanction to advance on shares.

5854. What did you understand to be the policy of the measure; what was its object and policy?—I understood that there were numerous persons in Bombay who were anxious to take up loans, but that their capital was locked up in shares, and that there was a temporary tightness, and that this would be a relief to that temporary tightness.

5855. By allowing them to raise money on the shares ?—By allowing them to take up advances, and taking these shares as what was considered collateral security for the repayment of the loan.

5856. It did not occur to you at the time that that was calculated to assist speculation ?—I knew nothing about the speculation at the time.

5857. You had just arrived from Madras, had you ?—From Calcutta.

5858. Shortly after your arrival you became alarmed; will you state what it was that alarmed you ?—When I first joined the board, the book of applications for loans and advances was not on the table; and after I had sat, I think once or twice, I asked where the books were ; either the secretary or the president said "downstairs." On being told that they were downstairs, I mentioned that in the banks of Bengal and Madras the books were put upon the table, so that the directors might look into the loans and see who had received advances. It was agreed that that should be done ; and at a subsequent meeting, on looking through the books, I found an entry of a loan to Pestonjee Cursetjee Shroff of five lacs. I asked upon whose authority it had been passed, and I was told the secretary's. That opened my eyes to the enormous power of the secretary, and I then asked whether he had that power, and was told that he had.

5859. Who said so ?—As far as I can recollect it was the president.

5860–1. Mr. Hannay ?—Yes, Mr. Hannay. I said that it was extraordinary that the secretary should have such powers, and I brought forward a proposition that his powers should be restricted, and limited to the powers exercised by the secretaries of the banks of Bengal and Madras, and I quite expected to have found some notice of it in the minutes. I was surprised, on reading over the evidence given in Bombay, that such was not the fact.

5862. That is the resolution which was passed, is it not ? (handing the minute of the 4th of May 1865 to the witness)—Yes.

5863. Is that the resolution which you proposed ?—It is not at all the resolution which I proposed. What I proposed was that the powers of the secretary should be limited to the powers exercised by the other secretaries.

5864. Did you regularly move it, and was it seconded ?—I do not know that it was seconded. I thought that it had been carried without any dissent.

5865. I find that you were present at the next meeting on the 11th of May, when the minutes of the 4th May were read and confirmed ?—I was.

5866. Did you remonstrate ?—I did not remonstrate, because no one dissented from limiting the powers of the secretary, so far as I can recollect.

5867. You limited them in a very imperfect manner ?—Yes ; but I do not know how far that resolution was with reference to mine.

5868. Then your proposition was not recorded ?—There was nothing recorded of it.

5870. This is the resolution which was passed : "Resolved, that no new constituent of the bank be allowed credit beyond rupees three lacs without the special sanction of three directors" ?—Yes, but that is not my resolution. I brought my resolution forward, and it seemed to meet with approval, and I thought that it would be acted upon at once, and I have reason for so thinking from these loans being brought before the board subsequently.

5871. Another reason will explain that, namely, that the great panic came on, and then all these loans were forced to be brought before the board ?—I think that it was very much in consequence of that proposition of mine.

5873. Was not there a great discussion ? Did not Mr. Hannay say that if they did not leave great powers with the secretary it would be impossible to manage the bank ?—I think that Mr. Hannay, or one of the native directors, said that it was necessary to leave large powers in the hands of the secretary. I think that one director went so far as to say that unless he had very extensive powers some of the native constituents would remove from the bank, to which my reply was, that the sooner they did so the better if they were ashamed of their loans, or were ashamed that their loans should appear.

5874. This was a very unbusiness-like proceeding. If that was your opinion on a very important matter you ought to have moved it, and have had it seconded, and entered upon the minutes ?—Undoubtedly.

5875. I do not doubt that you had some conversation of this sort, and that you are telling us your impression truly, but it is impossible for us to suppose that any resolution was passed to that effect ?—It was not brought forward in the form of a resolution, but more in the shape of a discussion, to which there was no dissent. I never moved it as a resolution at all; it merely came up in discussion of the matter.

5876. Then it was merely talk ?—It was merely talk, but as it was assented to, and as Mr. Robertson went so far as to say that he was glad to be relieved from responsibility, it did not strike me as a necessary thing to enter it upon the minutes at all.

5877. It was merely talk, and the matter was left there ?—To be acted upon, as I hoped.

5878. To a certain extent, but it was never acted upon when the secretary did not choose to act upon it afterwards ?—We could hardly tell that at the time.

5879. There was a great want of business-like precision in that matter ?—That I cannot deny. I think that those minutes show how little business was brought before the board at the time.

5880. Just look at this minute, and what it seems to admit. It admits that you knew that the secretary was advancing to constituents of the bank more than three lacs ?—I discovered it by seeing this done.

5881. That resolution, which you allowed to pass possibly from some want of experience, allowed the secretary to continue that practice in all cases up to three lacs ?—That has never struck me. It does not say that the secretary was to have that power ; it simply says :—"Resolved, that no new constituent of the bank be allowed credit beyond rupees three lacs without the special sanction of three directors."

5882. There was no check beyond that, and, if that was the case, there was no check at all upon the power of the secretary to advance to anyone up to three lacs ?—I was quite under the impression that his powers were limited by that discussion.

5883. That shows the danger of leaving things to impressions ?—Exactly ; it is the result of not having these things recorded.

5884. The effect of that resolution is to allow the secretary to continue the practice up to three lacs, and he was only restricted when new constituents applied for more than three lacs. Under that resolution he might grant to old constituents more than three lacs ?—That is not the way in which I read it. I do not understand that this empowers the secretary at all.

5885. It was an instruction, as I understand, to the secretary ; nobody disputes that ?—The secretary is not mentioned.

5886. Then to whom was it an instruction, if not to the secretary ?—It was just a resolution of the board to limit the advances, so far as I can see.

4 Dec. 1868.

5887. Then according to your present evidence there was no restriction upon the secretary?—I thought that there was, from the discussion which took place, which was assented to by all persons, including the secretary himself.

5888. Then you say that this resolution was not an instruction to the secretary?—I do not read it so, the secretary is not named.

5889. What did you deem the powers of the secretary to be?—Similar to those of the secretaries of the other banks, that he could not advance beyond Rs. 50,000 without authority.

5890. That was before May 1865?—Throughout I thought that those were his powers.

5891. You do not mean to say to the end of 1866?—I do not recollect that we gave him any authority at all.

5892. Is it not the fact that in March 1866 you did not know what the powers of the secretary were?—I was not present at that time.

5893. Are you not aware of the correspondence which has passed?—I have seen it since the Commission sat, I never saw it before.

5894. Is it not clear that in March 1866 the directors wrote to the chairman, and asked him what the powers of the secretary were?—I should have been surprised, if I had been on the board at that time, to have seen that correspondence.

5895. But it is a fact that they did so?—It is a fact which I see on the evidence.

5896. And that the chairman, Mr. Hannay, did not know what the powers of the secretary were?—Nobody seems to have known.

5897. And he wrote to the secretary to ask him what his powers were?—Yes.

5899. Does not that correspondence show very clearly that, although you may have had that impression from the talk which took place at the board that day, there really was no resolution come to?—I quite admit that no resolution was come to. There is another thing which has just struck me with regard to this resolution. I do not think that it was at this meeting that we had the discussion regarding the powers of the secretary. If I recollect rightly the loan of five lacs to Pestonjee Cursetjee was made on the 21st of April. The 27th of April was a board day, and I think that it must have been at the meeting subsequent to my seeing the entry of this loan that the discussion took place; but there is nothing whatever in the minutes on the subject.

5900. Why did not you object at the next meeting to its not being entered on the minutes?—Because it was not brought forward as a formal resolution at all, it was not seconded, but the matter was discussed, and as I understood assented to by all.

5901. If it was not thought of sufficient importance to be brought forward as a formal resolution, what was it but mere talk?—It seems to have been mere talk.

5902. You remark that Mr. Hannay, who was the chairman acting with Mr. Robertson, when he got Mr. Robertson's letter of the 7th of March 1866 did not dispute its accuracy?—He did not; I have read that correspondence and I cannot understand it. I had no doubt in my own mind that what I have stated was to be the rule after we had that discussion.

5903. I believe that in consequence of that correspondence certain byelaws were passed on the 31st of March 1866?—I was not present at that time and I never saw them.

5904–5. We have evidence that you made an attempt to stop the malpractices which were existing; and I will now show you another attempt of yours when you first came upon the board, which if it had been persevered in, I think might have been productive of good effects. (The President here read the various minutes recorded in Exhibit A 70, and the following minute by witness on Exhibit A 71: "Loans on personal security are strongly advocated by our president and the late president, but I would ask whether it is not upon such loans that our greatest losses are likely to occur?") You took a right view I think at that time; you were overruled on that occasion?—Yes.

5906–7. Did you persevere in your opposition to granting loans on personal security?—I do not know that I can recall any loan granted simply on personal security.

5908. There were some afterwards?—I do not recollect them.

5909. Do you mean to say that they gave way to you on that occasion?—They overruled me on that particular occasion; but I think that for the most part they took security where they could.

5910. But they constantly renewed after that without security?—I cannot recall renewals; in fact I cannot say that the renewals came before us.

5911. The renewals were left to the secretary and the president, were they not?—I cannot say that they were left to the president more than to the other directors. After a time I think that all these cases were brought before the board. I do not know that the president had any special powers.

5912. I think that you afterwards advanced to Hormusjee Cursetjee Chinoy without further security. There were securities deposited on the 20th of March 1866, but on the second loan upon the 5th of April there was no security?—I was not present then.

5913. The panic set in about this time?—Yes.

5914. And there was a run on the bank, was there not?—Yes; the Agra and the Mercantile banks withdrew their deposits at that time. I think that they withdrew about 50 lacs between them, so far as I recollect.

5915. Shortly afterwards inquiries came from the Governor General, and the Bombay Government?—Yes.

5916. And you were directed to inquire, and report as to the state of the bank, were you not?—Yes.

5917. What sort of an investigation did you make into its affairs?—We had some knowledge of what was going on at the time; we got some information from the bank itself, which will be found in the report to Government.

5918. I want to understand what investigation you made; for instance, did you go all through the securities?—No.

5919. Did you examine the documents upon which the advances were made as to their form; the bonds, and so on?—We did not.

5920. Did you in fact go to the secretary and ask him for information, and rely upon him?—We got information from the secretary, I think, at the time, but I cannot quite recollect at this moment.

5921. Was not it the fact that you got your information a good deal from the secretary?—Of course we did.

5922. And not from personal examination of these things yourself?—No, we got the information from the bank officials. Unfortunately I tore up almost all my papers concerning the bank before I left Bombay, thinking that there was to be no inquiry, or I could have put in the returns which we received from the bank.

5923. We will turn to your report of the 30th of June 1865; you there say, "In reply to your endorsement No. 583 of this day's date, forwarding for our information, and for any observations we may wish to offer, a copy of a despatch from Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State regarding the advances made by the Bank of Bombay on shares of certain joint stock companies, we have the honour to submit the following explanations." You do not seem to dispute there that you did advance on the shares of certain joint stock companies?—My understanding of the thing was this, that we took from the parties a promissory note, and that we took the shares as collateral security.

5924. That was of course advancing on shares as much as anything could be?—I do not know that. That is a system which I believe is admitted in the Bengal Bank. Mr. Dickson, I think, admits in his letter to the Bank of Bombay that that system was pursued there.

5925. According to the correspondence no doubt they have done so. I cannot enter into that. I am not finding fault with the system, but I want to understand what you meant by collateral security, and by stating in the letter of the 9th of November 1865 that you never lent "directly on shares." Were you present on that day?—Yes, I think so.

5926. There is a tacit admission in the letter of the 30th of June 1865 that you had advanced on shares, but on the 9th of November 1865 you write a letter saying, "The Bank of Bombay has never advanced money directly on shares; but during the trying crisis that occurred in the early part of this year, the times were so exceptional, that the directors considered it prudent, seeing so much money was lent on personal security only, to obtain as much collateral security as possible, when granting loans. This was done, and it enabled the bank to assist many of their constituents." Then again you say in the same letter, "With reference to the alteration of the charter, this is a matter over which the directors have no control, but seeing that the clause referred to has never been taken advantage of ——."—What was meant by that?

5927. The clause as to other public companies in India. You were answering a letter of Sir Charles Wood, asking you whether you would have any objection to that clause being rescinded, and you said, "With reference to the alteration of the charter, this is a matter over which the directors have no control, but seeing that the clause referred to has never been taken advantage of, the directors do not see that any change is either necessary or desirable."—I imagine that that letter was written upon the supposition that we did not advance directly, as there stated, but that we took the promissory notes of the parties, and then took the shares as collateral security.

5928. If you lent the money on a promissory note originally, you might afterwards take the shares as another security, but if you lent the money upon a promissory note and the deposit of shares, did you not lend it upon shares as much as upon the promissory note?—Perhaps the more correct term would have been "additional" security instead of "collateral."

5929. Collateral security means security side by side, it does not mean additional security; you used the term as if it were some sort of secondary security, whereas you lent as much upon the shares as upon the promissory note?—I do not know whether it was secondary security or not. I daresay that the loans would not have been granted without the shares being deposited.

5930. How can you possibly say that you "never advanced directly on shares;" you sometimes took shares after you had advanced money; in such cases you may be said not to have advanced upon shares, but in the great majority of cases a man obtained a loan upon signing a promissory note, and depositing shares, and here you admit it?—Yes, but I state it as collateral security.

5931. Collateral to what?—Collateral I suppose to the promissory note.

5932. Would it not have been better to have stated that?—I do not know that there was any intention to conceal the matter.

5933. I shall ask Sir Bartle Frere whether he was deceived; but it might have been collateral to some very good security. There is no explanation in this letter of a most important thing, namely, that you were lending money on promissory notes, that is to say, on personal security?—No; we did not entirely lend upon personal security.

5934. Sometimes you did to very large amounts?—Not I think after a certain date; I do not think that at that time we did so.

5935. You were giving a report as to the bank, and were not stating what you were doing at that actual moment?—I think that it was with reference to the resolution of April 1865, in which we consented to take these securities. We were reporting upon that period.

5936. You were reporting upon the whole state of the bank, as I understand it, and the most extraordinary thing is, that there is not the slightest disclosure in this report of a practice which prevailed continually, of lending money upon a mere promissory note; did you, or did you not, know that that was done?—I do not think that I was aware of it at the time; the only time that I recollect its coming to my notice I opposed it, that was in May 1865; that was two months after I joined the bank.

5937. But did you not know that it had been continually done previously?—I cannot state so at this moment.

5938. Mr. Brown said, "We cannot change our practice just on a sudden at this moment."—If it had been a safe practice before, I do not think that it would have been a safe practice at that time.

5939. That is getting away from the point; my point is, why you did not state this practice in this report, of lending money upon personal security only; you did not even disclose what the security was collateral to; you said in your letter of the 30th of June 1865, "The above shares were taken as collateral security;" collateral to what; did the Governor, or anybody connected with the Government, ever ask you to what they were collateral?—No.

5940. It is kept perfectly dark, and the whole system which had prevailed for a year before, of lending money on personal security only, when they thought the man was good, is not mentioned in this report.—But you will find very few cases in which that was done.

5941. I will show you a great number, and in which shares were taken afterwards when the bank officials found that they were getting into a scrape; in the case of the Eastern Financial Corporation there were ten lacs lent on personal security.—That was before my time.

5942. But I am talking of your report, which is a report of the proceedings of the bank.—Have you the letter before you?

Then there was another letter (it is at page 4 of the Blue Book) from the Government of Bombay: "I am directed by his Excellency the Governor in Council to request that you will draw up, for submission to the Government of India and Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State, a confidential report on the present state of the Bank of Bombay, with special reference to the causes which have induced the present difficulties of the bank, and which are said to leave little hope of a dividend to the shareholders for some time to come." One of the causes which had led to the difficulties of the bank was lending money on promissory notes.—Was this letter a reply to the other?

5944. Mr. Chapman wrote this letter to you the day before your report of the 30th of June 1865.—Our letter is dated the 30th of June, and we did not know at that time that there was to be no dividend.

5945. You were asked generally to report upon the position of the bank?—Yes.

5946. Then I say how is it that you did not disclose the fact that large amounts of money had been lent upon mere promissory notes; money which has never been recovered to this hour; not one loan, but many?—I see that we begin our report by bringing forward the resolution.

5947. You may rely upon it that there is nothing about it here. It is in reply to a letter of Her Majesty's Secretary of State, "In reply to your endorsement, No. 583 of this day's date, forwarding for our information, and for any observations we may wish to offer, a copy of a despatch from Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State."—You were reading a letter from the Governor-General, were you not?

5948. I was reading a letter from the Governor-General, and from your own Government, written by your own colleague, Mr. F. S. Chapman, to you, as instructions; that is No. 572?—Then this is not a reply to that letter; this is our report upon the affairs of the bank, and it commences, "In reply to your endorsement No. 583 of this day's date;" that is of the 30th of June.

5949. This report has always been understood to be an answer to the application of the Governor-General?—Unfortunately I have not the letter to which this is a reply.

5950. Here is the letter by your own colleague, Mr. Chapman, calling upon you to make a report, and that was the only report which you ever made. If that is not the answer to that letter, where is the answer to it?—Mr. Chapman never disputed that. He said also that the Governor-General's letter was sent to you before you wrote that letter. I cannot think that this letter before me could have been a reply to that letter. The letter of the 29th of June says, "With special reference to the causes which have induced the present difficulties of the bank, and which are said to leave little hope of a dividend to the shareholders for some time to come."

5951. That is only an observation of his; but he wants the causes which led to the difficulties of the bank?—That letter is No. 572, but our letter of the 30th of June is "in reply to your endorsement No. 583."

5952. There has never been a dispute to this hour that that was a reply to the requisition of the Governor-General?—This is referring to a copy of a despatch from Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State; there is not a word about the Governor-General's letter in it.

5953. But is it not a report of the state of the bank?—I imagine that it is intended as a report of the state of the bank.

5954. And had not you, when that report was made, this letter and a letter of the Governor-General before you. Are you prepared to contradict Mr. Chapman's evidence upon that point?—I am not prepared to contradict Mr. Chapman's evidence, but I can only say that in our reply we refer to another endorsement without referring to the letter from the Bombay Government, or the letter from the Governor-General in Council.

5955. I have no doubt that No. 583, whatever it was, just forwarded the Secretary of State's letter, but it is impossible for you to have been answering anything else than the inquiries made of you by the Government of India and the Government of Bombay. Then I must take your answer to be this, that that letter was only intended as an answer to the Secretary of State?—It would appear to be such.

5956. Am I to understand from you that the Government of Bombay never answered at all the letter of the Governor-General of the 22d of June?—This certainly does not appear to be an answer to the Governor-General's inquiries.

5957. Nor to the letter written by your own colleague the day before?—I do not see that it is any answer to it, because it says, "You are requested especially to note the changes in the direction and secretary's office," and there appears to be no reply at all to that.

5958. Then I am to understand from you that these letters, namely, the Governor-General's letter of the 22d of June 1865, and this letter from the Government of Bombay to the Government directors, were never answered?—I do not see the answer among the papers, nor can I state whether they were answered or not, but to my mind, that letter of the 30th of June, written by myself and Mr. Chapman, is an answer to the endorsement forwarding the Secretary of State's letter.

5959. Am I to understand that the Government directors never answered at all this letter of the 22d of June from the Governor-General, or this letter of the Government of Bombay of the 29th of June 1865?—I cannot say that it was never replied to.

5960. Where was the reply?—I fancy a reply was written, I do not know where it is; it certainly does not appear there.

5961. Did you not intend this letter of the 30th June to be a sufficient answer to those other letters also?—That I cannot say at this time. I cannot say whether there was a second letter or not.

5962. If not, why did not you answer this letter of the Government of Bombay?—I cannot answer that question for I do not know, and I do not even know whether we did or did not answer it. That letter is evidently not a reply to the Governor-General's letter, neither is it a reply to Mr. Chapman's letter.

5963. Did not you intend it to be a report on the whole subject of the Bank of Bombay?—I think that if we had been replying to the Governor-General's letter we should certainly have noticed the points which he had taken up, and therefore I do not think that it could have been intended as a reply to that letter.

5964. And you did not intend to reply to the letter of your colleague written the day before?—So far as I can judge from that letter, it was a reply with reference to a dispatch of the Secretary of State.

5965. You did not intend it as a reply to the letter of your colleague written the day before?—I imagine not.

5966. Although your colleague was the writer of that letter?—I do not think that it is likely that this letter would have been answered on the very following day, in fact it is very likely that we did not receive that letter until after the other was written.

5967. Mr. Chapman must have known of it?—I cannot account for it.

5968. (Major Innes.) The letter of the 30th of June commences, "In reply to your endorsement of this day's date," namely the 30th of June?—I cannot account for it.

5969. (President.) Then I am to understand that those inquiries were never answered?—I cannot say; I do not know.

5970. How was it that in stating the resolution of the 12th of April you omitted all reference to the first portion of it, rescinding the previous prudent resolution of the 6th of August 1863?—I cannot account for that at all.

5971. Where did you get that copy of the resolution which you inserted in the letter?—I cannot say, but I think that that letter was written by Mr. Chapman, and sent over for my signature, but I cannot recollect.

5972. Did you refer to the resolution in the book?—No, I imagine not.

5973. You see that there was a most important omission, because it entirely concealed (I hope unintentionally) from the Government the fact that your predecessors had been much more prudent?—I was not aware myself of the preamble to that resolution at all.

5974. You were not by that time aware of it?—No.

5975. Nor of the previous discussions upon that subject recorded in the scroll minutes of September 1863?—Never. I do not recollect ever to have heard of that before.

5976. Where did you get this information from, "All advances of this description have for some time past been discontinued"?—I imagine that it was taken from the bank; that we got the chief points of our information from the bank.

5977. Did you look into the matter yourself, or did you take it from the secretary?—The way that we used to do was to send over to the bank for information on certain points; we put questions, and we got replies to them.

5978. If you have been attending here during the recent examinations you are aware that there were seven advances on shares in the months of May and June 1865?—Up to what date?

5979. There were advances on shares not ending in loss; there was one on the 27th of May 1865 of 3,50,000 rupees; on the 30th of May 50,000 rupees; on the 1st of June 10,000 rupees, and on the 10th of June 22,000 rupees; none of those four advances ended in loss. Then there came, on the 27th of May, Dossabhoy Dhunjeebhoy one lac; there is a loss upon that; on the 29th of May three lacs to the Bombay Joint Stock Corporation, and to Manockjee Limjee on the 5th of June four lacs on shares.—There was an interval of about 20 days in which no loans had been granted.

5980. Do you really mean to say that what you meant to convey by this letter of the 30th of June, which stated that all advances of this description had been for some time past discontinued, was, that they had been discontinued for 20 days?—We had only been advancing, so far as we knew, from April.

5981. But you stated in this letter, "All advances of this description have for some time past been discontinued;" at least we might have thought that that meant a couple of months?—The whole thing had only been in operation under three months, and for the last 20 days no loan had been granted.

5982. Then you meant by that expression, that no loans had been granted for 20 days?—I imagine that that was intended. Were those loans which were granted in June brought to our notice? Were they brought before the directors?

5983. I suppose that they were. Manockjee Limjee's loan of four lacs was decided upon at a full board; there was a discussion about it and he was asked to retire. Was all this large amount, which you mentioned, lying idle in the bank?—That would rest upon the return which was given to us; there would be no reason for misstating it.

5984. How would it happen that there should be so large an amount?—If I recollect rightly we had very large deposits at that time.

5985. And also a large increase of the capital?—We had had an increase of the capital.

5986. Here is one of these very loans: "Application for rupees four lacs on open credit from Messrs. Manockjee Limjee and Company on the security of rupees 60,000 of Government paper, and 100 shares of the United Victoria and Colaba Land Company."—What is the date of that?

5987. The 1st of June 1865; it was granted to them on the 5th. "They state that if the loan is granted they will take up at once Messrs. Leckie's bill for rupees 90,000," and so on. There is no doubt therefore about the fact; you explain it by saying that you meant the words to apply to the last 20 days?—There had been apparently no transactions for the last 20 days.

5989. Had you not in fact more capital than you knew exactly how to invest?—Our deposits were very large at that time, and we naturally had very large funds in our hands.

5990. But still it would not have been safe to invest for three months at a time, those large deposits, would it?—It was necessary to do something with the money.

5991. They were liable to be withdrawn at call, were they not?—I think that many of them were.

5992. You say in your letter of the 30th June 1865, that "there was much demand for what then appeared to be only temporary accommodation." Who stated that?—It was, I think, generally thought by our colleagues that it was merely a temporary difficulty at that time, and that there was a hope of tiding over it.

5993. Was it stated that they would return to their old practice as soon as that temporary difficulty was removed?—It was merely thought that this was a temporary difficulty. It turned out to be more serious.

5994. Was it the intention to revert to the old practice as soon as that temporary difficulty was over; was that considered?—I cannot state.

5995. Was it a subject of discussion then?—I do not know that the point, as to what should be done in the event of our returning to our usual state, was discussed. It was always supposed that it was only for a time, and that it was a temporary measure. I think that that appears throughout.

5996. How did you ascertain that "a total sum of 41,70,800 rupees was advanced on the security of shares?"—We must have got the information from the bank.

5997. You did not go into the accounts yourselves to ascertain that fact?—We did not; we had no reason to doubt that we should get correct information from the bank by sending there for it.

5998. Were not you informed of a preceding practice of lending money on shares before that resolution of the 12th of April?—I was not aware of it when the resolution was brought forward.

5999. Were not you aware, when you were preparing that report, that 80 Back Bay shares had been deposited by Kursondass Madhowdass in the bank?—I cannot say that I was aware of it.

6000. And that 10 Back Bay shares had been lodged by Cursetjee Furdonjee? I mean when you wrote this letter?—I cannot say that I was aware of it.

6001. Did not your colleague, Mr. Chapman, tell you of it?—I do not know that he knew of it. I may mention that I have got much more information since this Commission was opened than I had at the time.

6002. We find from Exhibit A 155, which was produced by Mr. Chapman, that Mr. Robertson wrote to him as follows: "Besides the above, we hold a considerable number of Back Bay shares, which we took into safe custody from those names who have large loans from the bank on personal security. Men such as Byramjee Hormusjee Cama, Cursetjee Furdoonjee, and Kursondass Madhowdass. These loans were not nominally granted on shares, but it was thought well to have some security collaterally, independent of their personal standing. Several of these large loans Prem chund tells me will be paid up very soon." I am sorry to say that these loans are most of them outstanding still; were you aware of that fact?—I cannot say that I was.

6003. Did not Mr. Chapman tell you that fact?—I do not know that he did. I do not recollect it.

6004. Do you not think that, if it was known to either of you, it ought to have been known to both, and ought to have been inserted in this letter ?—I do not think I was aware of it myself.

6005. But if you had been aware of it, you would have inserted it in this letter, would you not?—I imagine that I should. The letter, so far as I recollect, was founded upon information received from the bank, and I had no reason to doubt that that information was perfectly correct, and that it was the whole truth.

6006. The statement in the letter is, "39 Back Bay shares ;" it was more like 139.—That must have been information which Mr. Chapman got from the bank.

6007. But in order for it to have been a full statement of the position of the bank, ought it not to have disclosed the fact of those other shares having been lodged?—Yes, if we were aware of it ; but I am not quite sure how far that would have been necessary, because those shares were taken afterwards, and not at the time.

6008. It was arranged at the time that they should be lodged for safe custody. I will make it quite clear to you by a letter from Mr. Robertson himself (Exhibit A 122) explaining the practice, but explaining it of course in the most favourable way : "My dear Cowasjee, we do not, as a rule, advance upon any shares, but in some instsnces we have granted loans on personal security" (this was before the resolution of the 12th of April) "and have received Back Bay and Elphinstone shares from the parties for deposit in the bank for safe custody. Of course the parties consider that these shares are lodged as collateral security."—I was not aware of that. I cannot recollect that I was. That resolution of the 12th of April 1865 was to us comparatively quite a new system.

6009. But still this report is dated later, namely, the 30th of June ; had you then found out that practice?—I think not. I had no knowledge of it before seeing it in evidence.

6010. Do you remember this resolution on the 6th of July 1865, when you were present? "Read letters from Mesrs. Dallas, Lynch, and Langdale, requesting the consent of the directors to the execution by the secretary of the trust deeds of Nowrojee Ardaseer Daver, and Bhawoo Dajee. Sanctioned; and the secretary authorized to attend meetings of creditors of parties indebted to the bank, and at his discretion to agree to any resolutions proposed and agreed to by the representatives of other banks ; and he is further authorized to sign all agreements, deeds, or other necessary documents in connexion with such estates, reporting the same to the board at their first meeting thereafter." Did you approve of that resolution ?—I suppose that I did, from there being no dissent. I do not rcollect any dissent.

6011. Do you think that it was wise to give such large powers to the secretary ?—I had no idea that it was in such general terms. My recollection is, that that resolution was passed in consequence of a discussion relative to his attending as to some particular estate, and I thought that the resolution had reference more to that particular estate than to giving him such general powers.

6012. I find that you were present at the next meeting when those minutes were read.—Yes. I must be held responsible for it undoubtedly. My impression was that it was simply a power to enable the secretary to attend that particular meeting which we were then discussing.

6013. It was to attend them all, and it gave him full power to agree to anything which the other managers agreed to.—I see now that it was so.

6015. This is his statement in his evidence,—"I moved the following resolution : 'To add to resolution passed on the 6th instant, with reference to power to the secretary to attend meetings of creditors, with discretion to agree, &c., the words 'in cases where there are no special circumstances which should be known to the directors.'"—I do not understand exactly what this means.

6016. It is just as vague as almost everything else which we meet with. He wished to put some restriction I suppose upon the previous resolution.—I do not recollect his bringing this particular resolution forward. My recollection is, that he wanted to put some restriction upon the particnlar case before us, and that, as we had fully discussed the whole case, and had given the power to the secretary by a majority, we did not think that it was necessary to fetter him again.

6017. I do not understand that. You seem not to have rightly understood the original proposition. If I have understood your evidence aright, this would have given you an opportunity of correcting that, would it not. You say that you did not know that the secretary had such large discretion, and that you thought that it was only given him for the purpose of that particular meeting ?—Mr. Lidderdale only proposed to add, "with reference to power to the secretary to attend meetings of creditors with discretion to agree." I do not quite understand that.

6018. The discussion arose again, and the whole question of this resolution was brought before you, and you must then have approved of it?—I still think that it was brought forward with reference to a particular case, and if I recollect rightly, Mr. Chapman said, "Bring forward something definite, and we shall perhaps be able to agree with you." Is not that in evidence?

6019. He said that he objected to the indefinite nature of the amendment.—Exactly.

6020. If you had not really agreed, and understood this resolution to be what it turned out to be, surely this was an opportunity for you to have moved an amendment, and to have made it something more consistent with what your intention was?—I do not think that I could have sufficiently recollected the general terms of that proposition. Have you the scroll minutes with reference to those proceedings?—The scroll minutes came round in a totally different form from what sometimes appears in the minute book.

6021. This was at a board meeting ?—Yes.

6022. There was no reference by circular in the matter. No minute was sent round. Mr. Lidderdale's motion was not seconded, but you have just said that that original resolution was not what you understood it to be ?—Yes.

6023. And you said that you must accept the responsibility of it because you consented to it at the subsequent meeting, but when it is brought before you again an attempt is made to modify it ?—I do not wish at all to modify what I have before said.

6024. Why did not you yourself attempt to remodel that resolution, and make it more prudent ?—Because it is very likely that even at the second discussion I was not aware of its general terms ; it may have escaped my notice at the time.

6025. Did you not read the resolution ?—The resolution was read over, but it does not follow that I was paying attention at the time when it was read out.

6026. On the 20th of July there was another board meeting, and the question then was whether Mr. Robertson should sign a release; do you remember Mr. Lidderdale moving upon that occasion ?—Yes, I remember that he brought forward a proposition.

6027. Was not it to this effect, "That in the case of Mr. F. L. Brown, the secretary do not sign a deed on behalf of the bank ?"—I cannot say that I recollect the exact terms of his proposition, but I recollect the matter being fully discussed at the board, and that it had arrived at that stage that they thought it was useless to restrict the powers of the secretary.

6028. That was not the question which had arisen then; the question then was, whether the secretary should sign the deed of release of Mr. F. L. Brown?—Yes, and that whole subject had come before the board, and had been fully discussed.

6029. Then did you think it wise and prudent for the secretary to sign, in about a fortnight, the release of a man who had failed for forty-three lacs?—It was understood that he had no property whatever, or that whatever he might have was to be given over to certain trustees, and that nothing further could be obtained from him.

6030. Did you not think that this was a case which might be very beneficially inquired into, namely, the case of a man failing for forty-three lacs and having no property whatever?—We did make inquiry into it as far as we could. It was only a question whether we would agree to the release or not; at the time I think all the other creditors had agreed to release him, and the bank was the last to give its consent.

6031. Who took part in that discussion?—I imagine that it was a general discussion, and that whoever had any opinion to give gave it.

6032. Was not a general hesitation expressed on the part of the directors as to allowing Mr. Brown to go through the insolvent court?—I do not recollect it.

6033. Did not some of the directors say that they thought it undesirable to allow the transactions in which natives had been engaged with the bank to be made a matter of public discussion?—I cannot say that I recollect it, but I think that it must be so from seeing it in evidence, though I cannot recollect the fact.

6034. You do not recollect such observations having been made?—I do not recollect it.

6035. Was not it said by some of the members of the board, that they did not think that they were the censors of public morals, and that they should grant Mr. Brown a release, as they thought that he had had trouble enough?—It is possible; I have some recollection of those terms.

6036. Did you agree with it?—I cannot say that I did.

6037. Did you think it wise or prudent to allow a man to obtain a deed of release after about fourteen days, under those circumstances?—The thing was thoroughly discussed, and I understood that he really had no property beyond what he was quite willing to give up, and that no good could be gained by preventing his getting a release.

6038. I do not mean to say that there was the slightest foundation for it, but did not Mr. Lidderdale state at the time that he thought there were very good reasons why that estate should be investigated?—I do not recollect his saying so.

6039. Then you think that the bank's interest was properly protected by your hurriedly granting the release?—I do not think that we should have got anything more if he had not been released.

6040. Do you not think that it would have been advisable to try and get a little more?—I understood that the directors were perfectly aware that he had no property beyond what he was willing to give to his trustees; it was not as if he was a stranger; I believe they all knew that he had no property beyond what he had said he would give up.

6041. Did Mr. Robertson say that he knew that Mr. Brown had no property?—I cannot say; I do not know that Mr. Robertson would give an opinion of that sort.

6042. Was he asked?—I cannot say.

6043. It is very important, because Mr. Robertson lent him two lacs and a half upon a promissory note?—When was that; it was long before this transaction?

6044. It was some time, but not very long before it; it was in February?—That is four months before, that is just the time when all the disaster came.

6045. You are not aware that Mr. Robertson said that Mr. Brown had got no property?—I am not, but I know that it was the opinion of the board generally that Mr. Brown had no property, and the reason urged for granting his release was that he had given up all that he had, or was willing to give up all that he had.

6046. Do you know anything about the preparation of this tabular statement with reference to Mr. Brown's release, at page 114 of the Blue Book? We have ascertained from Mr. Chapman that it was prepared from a letter of Mr. Robertson's.—I am not aware that I know anything about it.

6047. Do not you recollect an application from the Governor-General of India for such information? Do you remember seeing that letter of Mr. Robertson's of the 5th of March 1866? (handing Exhibit C. 4 to the witness.) What is in the Blue Book is a verbatim copy of that letter, except that it is put in a tabular form.—This letter was written by Mr. Robertson to the Chief Secretary of the Government.

6048. Were you any party to the preparation of that tabular statement?—I do not think that it is at all likely that I should be. Those statements were prepared in the bank office.

6049. You were no party to it?—I do not think that it is at all likely that I was. I do not recollect it.

6050. In January 1866 the Government of India made another application for information about the affairs of the Bombay Bank; have you seen that letter?—I think I have heard it spoken of before the Commission.

6051. I was two hours in finding out yesterday whether that letter was ever answered; just look at that letter, it is at page 8 of the Blue Book?—I think I have seen this letter before.

6052. Was not it sent on to you by the Government, with a view to the preparation of your report, which was afterwards made on the 31st of March of that year?—I was absent from the 1st of February 1866 till the 4th of May.

6053. And Mr. Norman was acting for you?—I do not know who was acting for me.

6054. It was, I think, Colonel Marriott?—I think so.

6055. Were you any party to the preparation of the report at page 30, dated 31st of March 1866?—No.

6056. No portion of it was prepared before you left?—I do not think so. I see that it has been interlined here in ink, "F. S. Chapman" and "G. Norman."

6057. You had nothing to do with it?—I do not recollect it; it was two months after I left Bombay.

6058. Did not the Governor-General afterwards apply for further and more detailed information, in a letter of the 13th of July 1866?—I do not recollect it.

6060. I want you to be very particular about the answers to these questions, because it is material. Did you ever, as a director of the bank, communicate to the Government of India your objections to furnishing those details?—I do not recollect that we ever did so.

6061. Do you recollect any person objecting to furnish those details?—I do not know that we were ever called upon to give them.

6062. Do you recollect any person in the bank objecting to give those details?—To whom?

6063. To the Government.—I do not think that the bank were called upon to give them, but I cannot be sure upon the subject.

6064. I should suppose that it was hardly possible for the Government to have asked you to furnish that information, and for you and the other Government directors of the bank to have objected, without your knowing it?—I do not think that it came before the directors, but I cannot say for certain, not officially.

6065. You did not know at the time of any such application by the Government, and refusal by the bank, officially or unofficially?—I cannot say that I had not heard that such a demand had been made, but, so far as I recollect, we had never been called upon to give the information.

6066. Then as far as you can recollect, I suppose, you never refused to give the information?—I do not think that we were ever called upon, and therefore I do not think that we ever refused.

6067. Were you ever asked, or were the directors of the bank, to your knowledge, ever asked, whether the particulars called for by the Governor-General would be fairly and fully given?—I think that it was discussed, but I cannot say whether it was discussed officially.

6068. Discussed when and by whom?—I think I recollect hearing of this information being called for.

6069. By whom?—I think that I have heard that this information had been required by the Government of India.

6070. When did you hear that—lately, or at the time when you were acting as a Government director?—That I cannot say, but I think that it must have been somewhere about the time that this came out.

6071. You heard that such an application had been made by the Government of India?—Yes; but I cannot say from whom I heard it.

6072. The communication was not made officially?—I do not think that it was made officially.

6073. Did you do anything when you heard it?—I do not recollect that any action at all was taken upon it.

6074. You never raised any objection?—I do not recollect that we raised any objection.

6075. Did anybody else, to your knowledge, raise any objection?—I think that the whole bank would have done so.

6076. That is not the question which I ask you; I ask you what they did; did they raise any objection?—I do not think that it came before us, so as to give us an opportunity of raising an objection, so far as I recollect, it may have come before us, and it may have escaped my memory.

6077. Do you recollect that letter coming, and the accompanying heading (handing Exhibit C. 5. to the witness)?—I think that it is very likely that I may have seen that.

6078. You must have done so?—I imagine so.

6079. When this letter was sent, it does not appear whether that letter of the Governor-General of the 13th of July was before you?—I do not know that it was before us.

6080. Had you ever had that letter before you at the time when you prepared the tabular statement at page 96 of the Blue Book?—That tabular statement I imagine would be prepared in the bank, and I do not know that I ever saw it.

6081. Surely a Government director would look after a tabular statement sent up to the Governor-General, would he not?—It would be looked after by a bank official. If the communication was directed and addressed to the secretary, we should be content to see that the secretary answered that letter.

6082. Am I to understand from you that you never yourself took any pains to see as to the preparation of that tabular statement?—No; I think this must have been taken from the books, and I certainly do not recollect ever verifying it in any way.

6083. Do you mean to say that although you were a Government director you had nothing to do with the preparation of this tabular statement?—I should think not. I think that most likely it was prepared in the office of the bank.

6084. Without any communication with you at all?—It may have been brought before us, but I cannot recollect at this moment; I certainly should accept it as a correct statement bearing the signatures of the officers of the bank.

6085. Were you aware of that application coming to the bank?—You see that there is Mr. Claude Erskine's handwriting in the form. I think I must have been aware of it from its coming officially.

6086. At the time when you got that document did you receive any instructions whatever from the Government?—No, I do not remember any.

6087. Did you receive any information from anyone as to the way in which this statement was to be prepared, and the object with which it was to be prepared?—It is not set forth.

6088. Did you receive any information at that time?—Not that I am aware of.

6089. You have no ihformation to give us as to the circumstances under which this statement was prepared?—I have none to volunteer. Until you showed me that letter, I did not recollect the fact that it had ever come before us officially.

6090. I asked you whether you had any further information to give us, with respect to that tabular statement?—No.

6091. Did you ever see it after it was prepared?—I may have done so, but I am not certain.

6092. Did the Government, or any member of the Government, ever call your attention to it?—I think not.

6093. They never asked you to verify it in any way?—What was the date of this?

6094. The letter was written on the 24th of October 1866. You were president at that time?—Yes, but though president I was not always present; I do not mean to say that I was not present on that occasion.

6095. Your attention was never afterwards called to it by anybody?—Not that I recollect.

6096. I understand you to say that you had no official communication as to what passed with respect to the letter of the 13th of July 1866, but that you did hear something about it?—It was on receipt of the letter from the Chief Secretary or the Under Secretary of Government to the bank, calling for that statement, that I may have heard something about it; but I do not recollect having received any official communication.

6097. But were not you in correspondence with Mr. Edward Lushington?—I had correspondence with him.

6098. Did you not correspond with him with respect to that application of the Governor-General?—It is possible, but I do not recollect it; it is quite possible, because I used occasionally to correspond with him upon different matters.

6099. Do you see the letter which was written by Mr. Edward Lushington to you on the 15th of November 1866, and which is at page 95 of the Blue Book?—Yes.

6100. It commences as follows: "In reply to your demi-official communication, dated the 3rd instant." Have you a copy of that demi-official communication?—I have not.

6101. Have you not a copy of the letter which you wrote to the Government?—I think that it will be in the bank correspondence; as far as I recollect it was a mere official communication, asking us to give an early answer as to whether the charter would be renewed or not. As far as my recollection goes, it was simply asking us to hurry on the reply to the Government as to whether the charter was to be renewed or not; but whatever my letter was, the draft of it I think was given to the bank.

6102. The letter from Mr. Edward Lushington of the 15th of November 1866 states,—"In reply to your demi-official communication, dated the 3d instant, I am directed to inform you that the Governor-General in Council will be prepared to take into consideration the expediency of renewing the agreement with the Bank of Bombay on receipt of the information called for in July of the liabilities of the bank, and of the proposed byelaws of the bank for the conduct of business. The liabilities above referred to need not embrace details relating to the names, &c. of the persons concerned."—Yes; that letter was not addressed to us, was it?

6103. It was addressed to you.—I mean the letter of the 13th of July.

6104. No; and you say that to the best of your belief it was not sent on to you?—I do not recollect it.

6105. Having had your attention called to the fact that the Governor General in Council would "be prepared to take into consideration the expediency of renewing the agreement with the Bank of Bombay on receipt of the information called for in July of the liabilities of the bank, and of the proposed byelaws of the bank, for the conduct of business," did you not make inquiry about the letter of July?—My recollection is that that letter of July was addressed to the Government of Bombay, and that it was from them that the answer was expected, and not from me.

6106. You were a Government director of the bank at this time, and actually president of the bank; did it not strike you that you had never been called upon to furnish particulars of the liabilities of the bank, and the proposed byelaws? did you not make any inquiry of the Government of Bombay?—I cannot say that I recollect making any.

6107. I suppose that these words in the letter of the 15th of November 1866, "The liabilities above referred to need not embrace details relating to the names, &c. of the persons concerned," must have been Greek to you?—I do not think that it was altogether Greek, because I have some recollection that we came to hear (though in what way I cannot recollect) that this information had been required by the Government of India. I have a recollection that it did come to our knowledge in some way.

6108. Did it not occur to you that this tabular statement would not give any notion of the liabilities of the bank?—I do not know that I looked into it; I cannot say that I did so. The information was given by the bank officials, and I imagine that I accepted it as correct.

6109. Then as far as you are concerned, I am to understand that you are no party, or, as far as you know, the bank are no party to withholding that information sought for by the Governor General in July?—I do not recollect that we were actually asked officially for that information. We heard of it in some way, but I do not recollect in what way.

6110. You have told us that you do not recollect any objection being made by you to it?—I do not recollect that we were asked for the information.

6111. We will now go to another subject, namely, the loan to Dossabhoy Merwanjee. That was one of the loans to which you were a party. On the 24th of February 1865 there was one lac; on the 23d of May 1865 there were two lacs; and on the 9th of June 1865 there was one lac?—I was a party to the last two.

6112. It appears from the board minutes on the 17th of May 1865 that you were present, and that you granted three lacs if the solicitors were satisfied with the security, and if the current loans were paid off. The current loans were not paid off so far as I can see. Do you remember any discussion with regard to the security which was offered? Do you remember that it was landed property?—I do not recollect what the property was at all, but I gather from this resolution that the matter was submitted to the bank solicitor.

6113. Was not the propriety of taking the security of land for a loan discussed at all?—Was it a first loan?

6114. It was a second loan, but the money was advanced upon this security. They wanted all current loans to be paid off, but it was not done.—It was the intention that this money should be taken up to pay off the old loan.

6115. Probably that might have been so, but it was not paid off?—That was the intention.

6116. Whether it was so or not is immaterial; some money was advanced upon the security of this land?—Yes.

6117. Did you think it necessary to take any opinion with regard to that? Was your attention called to the clause of the Act?—I imagine so from this resolution.

6118. Did anybody raise any doubt with regard to your power?—I imagine that a doubt must have been suggested from this resolution.

6119. Did anybody call your attention to clause 34 of the Act?—I imagine that we must have asked our solicitors whether we could do that, and probably this was merely taken like the other things as collateral security.

6120. Whether it was collateral or not the money was lent upon it?—The money was lent upon a promissory note, taking this collateral security.

6121. A collateral security means a security side by side with another security; money was lent upon one as much as upon the other?—I believe that that is a system which prevails even at the other banks.

6122. They may call it a collateral security, but the money is lent upon one security as much as upon the other. I am not sure that there was a promissory note in this case; there probably was, as it was the usual system; but, however, that is utterly immaterial.—My belief is that this money was granted upon a promissory note, and that the land was looked upon as a collateral security.

6123. Was not it a part of the agreement that the money should be lent upon the land and upon the promissory note?—I did not see the agreement, but this question, as you observe, was sent to our solicitor, and I imagine that he must advised have us that it was legal.

6124. I want to see that opinion. I imagine that he must have drawn the deed?—I imagine that he must not only have drawn the deed but that he must have given an opinion.

6125. In that case the loss has been 2,10,685 rupees. The security therefore was not only illegal but very insufficient. Did you make any inquiry as to the sufficiency of the security?—I can only imagine from this resolution that we were guided by the opinion of our solicitor.

6127. I cannot understand how there could have been any doubt if anybody looked at that clause of the Act?—I think that it was because it was not understood that what we called a collateral security was a joint security.

6128. There seems to have been a great delusion in that respect?—It is not confined to our board. I think that that is very much the opinion of Mr. Dickson.

6129. The extraordinary thing is that you fancy that you are not lending money as much upon one security as upon the other. There is another loan to which I wish to call your attention, namely, that to Khuttow Khemjee. On the 26th of April 1865 he had 40,000 rupees; you were present, and security was lodged of 65 Asiatic Bank shares. That loan was recommended by Premchund, and it was passed by you by a discount minute (Exhibit A 46. being handed to the witness).—Yes.

6131. Are not you aware that your colleagues wrote to the Government upon the 30th of June 1865, saying that this practice of lending on shares had been for some time past discontinued?—This discount minute is dated the 12th of September 1865.

6132. That is another one. There were two lacs then granted?—Yes.

6133. Eight hundred Asiatic Bank and other shares were lodged in September and October 1865 as security for that loan?—Yes, but it is stated here,

4 Dec. 1868.

"The applicant is a very good man, and I think that we should accept the security offered."

6134. That is very true, but the question is whether you were not advancing on shares at that time?—We had been labouring under the impression (whatever you like to call it, whether a hallucination or any other name) that we were not advancing on shares at that time, but that we were taking them as collateral security.

6135. The difficulty is to know how to deal with persons labouring under that delusion, because whenever the shares were bad it was said "there is the man," and whenever the man was bad it was said "there are the shares." Premchund was a director at that time; did he tell you that Khuttow Khemjee was merely a joint speculator with himself?—I know nothing whatever about Khuttow Khemjee.

6136. He did not tell you that fact?—No, I think that the first time that I ever recollect hearing anything about it was at one of the meetings of shareholders, when one of the shareholders mentioned it, but I do not recollect at which meeting it was; I think that it was in June, but I am not quite sure.

6137. Do you not recollect that afterwards, on the 7th of August 1866, Premchund acknowledged to the bank directors that he considered the debt his own, and would pay the bank as soon as he possibly could? (Exhibit A 72. was handed to the witness.) Were you present on the 7th of August 1866?—Yes.

6138. I find the following entry in the minutes of that day: "The president also read a note he had received from Premchund Roychund regarding Khuttow Khemjee's past due bill of rupees one and a half lacs, in which he acknowledges that the money was used in a joint speculation in Asiatic Bank shares, and states that Khuttow Khemjee is perfectly ruined by losses in cotton and shares, and that nothing can be gained by suing him. In the note Premchund promises to consider the debt as his own, and to pay the bank in full as soon as he possibly can."—Yes.

6139. Do you recollect the circumstances under which you were induced to sign that discount minute?—This discount minute was in 1865.

6140. I am now going back to the original transaction. I have called your attention to all the surrounding facts, showing that Premchund was really a party engaged in that transaction in Asiatic Bank shares?—I knew nothing whatever about it at the time.

6141. Did Premchund Roychund come to you, and ask you to grant that loan?—Never; I saw that one of the commercial directors recommended Khuttow Khemjee as a good man, and there was security as well.

6142. There was the security of Asiatic Bank shares. Were you aware that Mr. Tracey and Premchund were connected in speculations?—No, I had not the least idea of it.

6143. I see that you only initialed the discount minute. Khuttow Khemjee knew so little about the transaction, that he said that he believed that the money was not obtained upon that security at all. He said that Premchund had managed the whole thing.—There were many transactions of which the directors knew nothing whatever.

6144. Were you in the habit of communicating often with the Government, either the Government of India or the Government of Bombay?—No; very seldom.

6145. When you did communicate it was in writing I suppose?—I think that it was always in writing to the Chief Secretary.

6146. Have you any copies of those letters?—I have none. I have torn up almost all my bank papers, and I have only here a scrap of a letter which is not even signed, and I do not know that it was even sent (handing exhibit A 170. to the President). That is the only scrap which I have got. I tore up all my bank papers, understanding that there was to be no inquiry, unfortunately so as regards some of them. I do not know whether I ever sent that letter.

6147. It contains an important fact which I think ought to have appeared in the letter of the 30th of June. The letter which you have just produced, and which is addressed by you to Mr. Chapman, states, "From this statement you will observe that fourteen and a half lacs of bills are set down as dishonoured at the branches; of this Hannay tells me that they hope to realize at least one third."—Yes.

6148. There is no reference to that in your letter of the 30th of June 1865 to the Government. I do not know why it was excluded, but it was very important as giving an idea of the position of the bank at that time?—I think that that letter of 30th June was with reference to the head office, and not the branches.

6149. I do not know why it should have been confined to the head office. This letter is dated June the 16th.—That I believe was information with regard to some of the losses which were known at that time.

6150. As I now understand, when you wrote that letter of June the 30th three letters must have been before you, according to Mr. Chapman's evidence. First, the letter of the Governor General of the 22d of June, then that of your colleague Mr. Chapman of the 29th of June, and also the letter from the Secretary of State; and with those three letters before you you wrote a reply only to the letter of the Secretary of State, which was the easiest to answer, and left the others wholly unanswered. That is the position as I understand your evidence?—I do not know whether they were answered or not.

6151. I thought that the letter purported to be an answer to your preceding correspondence?—I do not think that it could be.

6152. But surely it was a very inaccurate statement of the whole fact if it did not state that that fourteen and a half lacs were set down as dishonoured at the branches?—Is not that included in the statement of the 30th of June?

6153. No; you mentioned nothing about the branches at all in that letter.—We sent in a statement, did we not?

6154. Yes, but you said nothing of what had been done at the branches; there was no reference at all in that letter to that fact, or to the position of the branches generally. I ask you again whether it is not a correct view of the matter, that you had three letters before you, that the easiest of those three letters to answer was the letter of the Secretary of State, and that you answered it, and left the other two unanswered. Is not that the exact position of the correspondence?—I cannot tell. I have no copies of the correspondence, and it does not appear in what you have; whether that is the right state of the case, or not, I cannot say.

6155. Do you remember any other answer being sent to the other letters?—I do not remember.

6156. I believe that you were absent at the time when Premchund Roychund's great loan was granted?—I was.

6157. But you came back in time for the Asiatic Bank transaction?—Yes.

6158. When did you return?—On, I think, the 7th or 8th of May.

6160. A list of securities, so far as I can make out, was not sent in until afterwards?—A list was sent in at the time, the letter refers to a list appended.

6161. Do you remember this minute? "Read letter from Mr. Morrison, agent of the Asiatic Bank, requesting a loan of 15 lacs for that corporation. Read also a list of securities he is prepared to deposit: Resolved that the credit be granted upon his giving up all the securities stated in the list."—Yes.

6162. This is the list (handing the same to the witness). The minute goes on to say, "and a written guarantee to deposit immediately on receipt the bills and Government paper now on the way from Calcutta and China."—Yes.

6163. Do you remember the amount of those "bills and Government paper now on the way from Calcutta and China"?—I cannot recollect the amounts now.

6164. We have been unable to get anybody to speak to that. Are you aware of the fact that they were never deposited?—I have only seen it in evidence, but I concluded that they were. Instructions were issued to the secretary to obtain them, and I presumed that it was done.

6165. Everybody admits that they never were deposited; were you aware of that at the time?—I was not.

6166. You were not aware of that fact when the cash credit to the Asiatic Bank was renewed on the 13th of July?—No.

6167. It would have been taken into consideration, would it not, if you had known that you had been so deceived?—It would have made a very material difference if we had found that what Mr. Morrison had promised had not been fulfilled.

6168. You have no idea what the amount was?—I do not know at all.

6169. The minutes were drawn up in the most loose way.—I think that we had occasion to find fault with the manner in which the minutes were drawn up.

6170. On the 25th of May 1866 that credit was extended to 20 lacs?—Yes.

6172. That 10 lacs was realized on the 12th of June following?—That would reduce the amount then to 10 lacs.

6173. Were you aware that this cash credit was never entered in the general cash credit ledger, but was entered in the general deposit account ledger?—No, we left matters of that kind to the secretary.

6174. That I believe to be the fundamental error of the whole thing, namely, the cash credit having been entered in the general deposit account ledger?—I thought that this loan to the Asiatic Bank was so fully secured, that it was impossible that there could be any loss upon it.

6175. Did you not inspect the accounts yourself at all? Did you never inspect the accounts of this loan?—No, I do not recollect doing so; even when I thought that we should realize the full amount.

6176. I think that the loss is about 3,50,000 rupees?—I cannot understand how it could be so much.

6177-8. A good many of the securities were never delivered.—But there were the 10 lacs in hard cash.

6179. Directly any of those securities were realized, what is your view of the right way of treating that account?—That those securities should be taken in reduction of the cash credit.

6180. Instead of which the whole thing went into a general deposit account, and the drawing went on as before.—As the security was realized I supposed that it would be taken in reduction of the cash credit.

6181. Were not Mr. Robertson and Mr. Morrison very great friends?—I believe they were. I knew they were on very good terms, but nothing beyond that.

6182. Then on the 12th of June 1866, the day afterwards, they got four lacs more of cash credit, and on the 3d of July 1866 they got three lacs more?—Yes.

6183. Which was to be paid back on the arrival of the China mail at Calcutta, as the agent would get five and a half lacs by it. Did you know that only 26,000 rupees of that item was ever realized?—I was not aware of it.

6184. You were never told by Mr. Robertson?—No.

6185. You supposed that all these securities which were given really came into the possession of the bank?—I supposed that as they came in they would be gradually taken in reduction of the loans.

6186. Then on the 13th of July a new cash credit was opened, and new securities were taken. Do you remember the exact position of the account of the Asiatic Bank at that time?—It was simply that that cash credit was extended till the 1st of September.

6187. Do you recollect what was the exact state of the account of the Asiatic Bank on that day?—No; I never saw the account.

6188. Did not the secretary come and tell you?—No.

6189. Did he not tell you that the securities were all exhausted except two bills?—Some additional securities were taken then, but I of course thought that the loans were being gradually paid off by these securities which we had received; in fact I thought that we had got nearly full payment by bills and hard cash.

6190. Then you extended the cash credit of the 13th of July up to the 1st of September?—Yes.

6191. Do you remember the terms on which that was done?—I have seen the terms in the minute book.

6192. You waived taking a dividend of three lacs and upwards to which you were entitled?—Yes, until the remittance from China should be received.

6193. At this time there was a draft on the Chartered Mercantile Bank for one lac still remaining of those good securities. Then M'Indoe and Rogers' bills secured for 8,50,000 rupees, and now, after years of trouble, they have realized 63,000 rupees.—I believe that we never got M'Indoe and Rogers' property.

6194. That is another thing, but I now refer to the bills. Then the security of the Bombay Coast and River Steam Navigation Company was very good; it realized very well?—Yes.

6195. The next two items are, "Lien on bills now on their way from Calcutta, two lacs," and "Lien on Java guilders to be remitted to Bombay, three lacs."—If I recollect rightly there was some mistake in the telegram with regard to those Java guilders.

6196. How did you satisfy your mind that there was a mistake in that telegram?—Mr. Morrison came personally to us, and explained the way in which the mistake arose, so far as I recollect, namely, that they had no cipher for the word "dollar," and that they had used the word "pound" instead.

6197. Did he show you the translation of the telegram?—So far as I recollect he brought the original.

6198. Was the whole translated to you?—So far as I recollect he translated it to us.

6199. Did he tell you that other telegrams had been sent to him before using the word "pound" for "dollar," and that it had never been misunderstood before?—I do not recollect that.

6200. Did he tell you that the telegram ended with a distinct intimation that he was only to draw for a lac and a half?—I do not recollect that.

6201. Mr. Steel, who was the agent in Calcutta, was examined in Bombay, and he gave us that evidence.—I do not recollect anything further than these guilders being on their way.

6202. Mr. Steel, who sent the telegram, said that it was quite true that the word "pound" was used for the word "dollar," in consequence of there being nothing in the cipher for the latter word, and that he had often done it, but that, to prevent mistakes, it was stated in the latter part of the telegram that they were only to draw for a lac and a half?—I do not think that that was mentioned; I do not recollect it.

6203. The balance on the evening of that day was 11,78,838 rupees. You were not aware of that when you granted that new cash credit?—I was not. I supposed that as these securities were realized they would be taken in reduction of the cash credit.

6204. Then on the 23d of August, in consequence of this mistake, about five lacs of solid gold, Mr. Morrison lodged a number of other securities which have proved worthless, except the promissory notes of Sapoorjee Dhunjeebhoy and Jevajee Manackjee, which realized very well. Was not the practical working of the matter this, that Mr. Morrison came to you, and tempted you to support the Asiatic Bank with some very good securities, a portion of which he never deposited, and that when he had got you into a debt from the Asiatic Bank of about twelve lacs, you were anxious to cover yourselves, and took inferior securities, and when some of the best of the securities, namely, five lacs of gold, were not forthcoming, you took inferior securities, always, however, with a large balance against you ?—We knew nothing of that large balance being against us.

6205. Did you ever inquire what the state of the balance was on the 1st of September, at the end of that second cash credit ?—No, I cannot say that I did ; I thought that all these subsequent sums were on account of those guilders, and that the whole thing was going against the 20 lacs, which would have been the proper way of treating that account.

6206. If you look at these balances you will see that on the 1st of September there was a balance of 16,82,000 rupees against the Asiatic Bank.—Is this the current deposit account ?

6207. Yes ; there was no cash credit opened, which I believe to have been the fundamental cause of the whole mistake ?—Yes.

6208. Why did not you close the account then ?—Because we had this account opened in this way.

6209. You see that it goes on, and that they drew after that up to 20 lacs ?—So far as I can understand it the whole of this account was an improper one, and it was a mixture of a variety of accounts.

6210. Was there no check upon the secretary's handing out the money after the 1st of September ?—I do not think that it occurred to anybody to see that these amounts were rightly accounted for.

6211. If you had stopped the advances on the 1st September you would have saved about 3,80,000 or 3,90,000 rupees ?—I thought that the whole thing was perfectly secure, and I think that that actual cash credit was secure.

6212. The first cash credit was amply secure, particularly if they had delivered their Government paper ?—I do not consider that anything more than that first cash credit was granted ; the time for repayment was extended.

6213. But you took no fresh securities ; the greater portion of the old securities had been exhausted ?—I did not understand that Mr. Morrison was to have a cash credit continuing to the extent of 20 lacs. I supposed that he was simply drawing against the first cash credit. I thought that it was in the cash credit account, and that as the securities were realized they would be put on the other side in reduction of that account.

6214. The fact is, that the bank was tempted to renew with inferior securities in order to protect its balance. I have no doubt that that was the motive of the secretary, if he had any motive ?—I thought that this cash credit was amply secured, and that we had got such good security in the first instance, backed up by good security afterwards, that there was no fear.

6215. Were you not aware that those securities had been realized ?—I thought that they had been realized, and that the cash credit was being proportionately decreased.

6216. What do you suppose to be the duty of a Government director, especially the accountant general, in looking into the books of the bank ?—I did not consider it the duty of the directors to interfere at all with the way in which the books were kept. I supposed that we had officers capable of performing those duties, and that they were left to them.

6217. Did you not suppose that it was the duty of a Government director to do so, in lending large sums like 20 lacs (especially in May 1866), in order to support another bank ?—We had the money actually in hand, and it was considered desirable to support the banks, because as each bank failed the disaster would have been the greater.

6218. Considering how large a sum was given, some director might have looked into the accounts, and have seen how the thing was going on ?—We thought that this was a plain transaction, and that there never could be an admixture of another account with this one.

6219. Mr. Robertson said that you were very nervous about this account, and that you asked occasionally about it ?—I inquired whether the securities were realized.

6220. Why did you not look into it properly, and ask to look at the cash credit ledger ? If you had asked for that ledger, the first thing which you would have found would have been that there was no account in the ledger, and that fact would have opened your eyes a little.—It never struck me as being my duty to see how these accounts were kept.

6221. In this case, considering the position of the bank, the magnitude of the sum, and the evidence which we have had that you were nervous about it, and were always coming down and asking the secretary about it, it appears strange that you never took any step which would have satisfied your mind ?—We heard from time to time that these securities were realized, and it appeared to me that the thing was going on smoothly enough. I was perfectly astonished when I heard about it.

6222. When the Asiatic Bank went into liquidation the balance was 19,66,000 rupees ; they had constantly reduced the debt, and had one day reduced it to 5,88,000 rupees, but afterwards they drew it up to 20 lacs ?—It was an extraordinary way of conducting a cash credit ; it was an abuse of a cash credit.

6226. You remained president of the bank until the time when it went into liquidation ?—I did.

6227. But after 1866 it was in fact in liquidation ? —We looked upon ourselves more as liquidators than as anything else.

6228. After 1866 you were in fact just doing your best to realize your securities, and not granting any fresh loans ?—We did the best that we could.

6229. You were then cautious and regular. It is quite clear from the books that there was a great improvement at that time. I do not think that there is any use in taking you further into those transactions ; the loss was already achieved before you became president.

6230. (Major Innes.) You to a certain extent justified the phrase which was used in the letter of the Government directors, in which it was said that the clause with respect to advancing on shares had never been taken advantage of. How do you believe that you would have carried out the process of taking advantage of that clause ? What difference would there have been between the process of taking advantage of that clause and the process which was employed when you did not take advantage of it ?—The only difference which I can conceive would be that you would not take a promissory note ; and I do not know that without a promissory note you would have anything to bind the parties.

6231. Have you ever heard of such a proceeding ?—I have not.

6235. Did that lead you to take any steps as to inquiry into the way in which the work was conducted ?—It led me to bring forward a proposition that the power of the secretary should be the same in the Bank of Bombay as it was in the other two banks; and I had not the slightest idea that there was any real opposition to it. A discussion took place as to what had passed, and some of the directors (the native directors, I think) wished to give the secretary very unlimited powers.

6236. I refer more to the way in which the secretary did not supply information to the directors ?—I do not know that I was aware of that until afterwards.

6237. Did it ever strike you that there was a happy-go-lucky way of carrying on the work in the bank ?—I was not satisfied with the way in which it was done, and I had occasion to find fault with it.

6238. Did you see at all what the discipline in the bank was, whether the secretary controlled it ?—I took it more for granted than anything else that it was a well-regulated bank, and that the secretary would control it.

6239. Are you aware of any rules to guide the secretary ?—No, I have never seen any.

6241. You were not aware of the various sections of the bank being pretty well left to themselves ?—I of course thought that the secretary of that bank was under the same control as the other secretaries, and that he had the same power in the bank as the other secretaries; and I think that the secretaries are allowed almost paramount power, so far as the transactions of the bank are concerned.

6242. I refer to responsibilities ?—I think that after that discussion which we had, the power of the secretary could not be considered to be unlimited, and I think that after that discussion took place, very many things which would not otherwise have come before the board were subsequently brought before the board.

6243. You did not scrutinize the routine of the bank management ?—No.

6244. Or the books which were kept ?—No. I thought that it was a well-regulated bank, and that it had been well conducted. I never had any reason to suppose otherwise.

6245. Did not you say that you got more information latterly laid before the directors than used to be laid before them formerly ?—When I first joined the bank the application book was not on the table, and the loan book was not on the table.

6246. What was the loan book ?—The applications for loans, and the loans which had been granted.

6247. Was there any loan ledger ?—I do not think that it was on the table.

6248. Was there any book containing all the advances ?—I heard Mr. Maclean say yesterday that there was, and I have a recollection of seeing a great thick book with a white cover, but I do not think that that book contained the information. I do not know that it was ever opened, because if so the secretary would have had no difficulty in getting the information which we wished. I saw the book on the table, but I did not open it.

6249. In the other banks at Calcutta and Madras had you been in the habit of seeing what the arrangements were with respect to the orders to the secretary. I mean quite irrespective of the orders contained in the minute book. I refer, for instance, to byelaws ?—I do not know that I had. I thought that things were working smoothly.

6250. For instance, what would have been the routine in Calcutta and Madras if you had come to a decision at a meeting altering or limiting the powers of the secretary; what would have been done ?—It would have been recorded at once in the minutes.

6251. As a matter of course ?—Yes. There is only one thing to be said, namely, that what I referred to was not brought forward in the formal shape of a resolution, for which I take great blame to myself; but it never struck me that there was any necessity for it, because, so far as I understood, it was agreed to by all.

6252. Would you consider it the duty of the secretary, or of the directors, to make a case of that sort shipshape ?—I thought that it was the duty of the secretary to do it, and I was much to blame for not having it mentioned upon the minutes, but as I have said before, the thing did not come formally forward, and it was as I thought assented to; and I thought that the question would never be raised again, because I thought that in practice it was being done, and that the bills were being brought before us.

6253. You were a Government director; what was your relation to Government as a director ?—I do not know that I can tell you exactly. We never had any instructions.

6254. You seem occasionally to have got letters from Government as a Government director ?—Yes, to which we ought to have replied, if we did not do so.

6255. What do you consider to be the difference between the cases in which reference was made to you, and the cases in which reference was made to the secretary of the bank ?—In the one instance we replied to the communication, obtaining the information from the bank officials, and in the other case the secretary replied to it.

6256. What did you consider to be the nature of that reply; was it a record of the bank or a private record ? What was its position in the bank correspondence ?—I do not believe that it was filed in the bank correspondence.

6257. I find an important letter written by a Government director of the bank and sent to you to sign, and we hear nothing more about it; can you tell us anything about it ?—I do not think that it was placed in the bank records. I drafted some letters which I tore up.

6259. As an experienced officer, and of business habits, would you not have considered it right and proper that your official and important correspondence should be filed at some place where it could be got at ?—It was very seldom that we ever had any correspondence with the Government. We have had three or four letters I think in the course of my being in that bank. I possibly may have a record of them, but I cannot say at this moment. The data upon which my letters were founded were obtained from the bank. I used to send questions to the bank secretary, requesting him to fill up the information.

6260. What do you think was done with these important data upon which you rested your own statements ?—Was there any other important letter ?

4 Dec. 1868.

6261. Yes, there is the one with regard to Mr. Brown's loan. There are other statements contained in your letters, and there must have been data for them, but the one to which I refer is the most important.—Those were data obtained from the bank officials.

6262. Where were they kept? If the information is not correct, who is to be held responsible?—I suppose that we must.

6263. As far as I can judge, not only is the information incorrect, but we cannot find out what it means. Can you state what was the meaning of the money said to be advanced on shares mentioned in the letter of the 30th of June?—I can only explain that that information, so far as I can recollect, was obtained from the bank; that we asked them what advances had been made.

6264. Cannot you recollect whether they said that it included all the advances merely, or the advances at the head office?—I cannot recollect how that information was obtained, but my impression is that it was obtained from the bank officials. I think that Mr. Chapman has stated in evidence that the letter was written by himself, and I cannot say for certain how the information was obtained, but my impression is that it was obtained from the bank. There is another paper which I have; it is on the bank liabilities and assets, dated the 1st of July (producing the same). What it has reference to I do not know; it may be the half-yearly account.

6265. Did you look at all into the estimates which were from time to time sent into the bank as to their position?—Yes.

6266. You were at the bank I think when Mr. Harrison's committee, which reported on the 8th of September 1866, sat?—Yes; I took very great pains with those estimates, and I am very sorry that I have not those papers now with me, but I tore them up before I left Bombay; they would have given you some idea of the labour which I bestowed upon those estimates.

6267. Can you give me the information upon which you based the estimate, say of February 1867; that was the one after Mr. Harrison's committee, and in which the capital was reduced one half?—We took the book of debtors and went through each account separately, each director giving such information as he had with reference to each man or each association, and then we put down the amount of the debt in one column, and the amount which we thought would be likely to be realized in another, and in a third we put what was likely to be lost.

6268. Where did you get the information as to the returns from insolvent estates?—We got them, so far as they could be gathered, from the trustees of those estates.

6269. Do you remember whether you got them officially?—I think that we got all either officially or demi-officially, so far as they could or would give them to us.

6270. Did you get from them the valuation of the securities?—No, we got the information that they thought that the return would be so much.

6271. The securities would belong to the bank only?—Those we took ourselves from the best information which we had at the bank.

6272. There is no doubt that in your investigation you got your information by a very detailed and laborious process; did you give that information to the Government?—Not that I am aware of in detail, but we gave them the results.

6273. You neither officially nor demi-officially gave them the details?—Not that I am aware of.

6274. Neither directly nor indirectly?—Neither directly nor indirectly.

6275. Did you give them to any member of the financial department, for instance Mr. Edward Lushington?—No.

6276. Not in any way?—There was always a good deal of caution as to whether those estimates were reliable.

6277. Would it not have been a very simple thing to have said, "In the estimate which we have framed we have taken the returns from insolvent estates at the rates furnished to us by the liquidators or by the trustees; and as respects the securities which we hold, which are mainly so and so, we have valued them at such and such rates"? Did you ever give information of this kind, for instance, "We hold so many Back Bay shares," and we value them in the estimate at such and such rates?—I do not think that we ever gave the number of shares which we held; but if I recollect rightly, in the statement to the shareholders we stated how we arrived at the probable losses.

6278. Did you ever give the information in that way as to the mode in which you estimated the losses?—To whom?

6279. To anyone.—To our shareholders I think that we did.

6280. Did you mention the rates?—I think that we took the market rates. I think that it is mentioned in the half-yearly reports. I think that we mentioned in those reports how we had arrived at the estimate.

6281. My point is with regard to giving information to the Government?—We took the market rate at the time, so far as I recollect.

6282. Was that done in previous estimates?—It was done in each estimate which we gave.

6283. You never gave information of that sort to the Government?—They got it indirectly in the reports.

6284. Those commenced in February 1867?—I think that before February 1867 we informed the shareholders how we had arrived at such results.

6285. Were you ever asked by the Government before for that information?—I cannot say that we were asked for it.

6286. (President.) Did you receive any allotments of shares during the time that you were a director of the Bank of Bombay?—None whatever at any time.

6287. I have been through the books of 40 or 50 companies, and I never saw your name.—The only shares which I ever had were shares in the Bank of Bombay; those were obtained after the Secretary of State granted us permission to hold shares.

E. D. CHAUNTRELL, ESQ.

Sir HENRY BARTLE E. FRERE, K.C.B., G.C.S.I., sworn and examined.

Sir H. B. E. Frere.

8 Dec. 1868.

6288. (President.) When did you take your seat as Governor of Bombay ?—On the 24th of April 1862.

6289. I think that the draft Act 10 of 1863 had then been approved by the Government of Bombay, and sent to the Government of India?—Yes.

6290. It was with the Government of India when you arrived ?—I think so.

6291. It was returned approved by the Government of India, with some slight modifications, which are immaterial now ?—I believe so.

6292. It was returned with the intimation that it should be passed by the Bombay Council?—I believe so.

6293. Do you not think that it would have been better if the Government of India had passed it ?—It was a question for them to decide.

6294. But still we should be glad to have your opinion upon that point ?—In what respect ?

6295. Would not recent legislation for the Bank of Bengal have caused the Legislative Council of India to have at once seen the great differences between that Act and the Act for the Bank of Bengal ?—No doubt the means at the disposal of the Legislature of India, on a subject of this sort, are much greater than those of the Government of Bombay, but the interests concerned are in a great many respects very local, and my impression was, and is, that legislation of this sort, affecting the charter of a local bank, is likely to be better watched by the public of the place to which the Act refers.

6296. If it had been passed by the Government of India, would it not have been published in the gazettes of Madras and Calcutta, and have attracted the attention of the officials of the banks there ?—It certainly would not have attracted the same amount of attention as the local legislation.

6297. Do not you think that, if it had been so published, it would most probably have prevented the very relaxations in that Act which were afterwards found there ?—I do not think that it would.

6299. Was there much discussion upon this Act in the Legislative Council of Bombay ?—There was less discussion than I expected in the council ; but there was discussion, and useful discussion, in the public prints, which I think could hardly have been expected if the Act had been passed in Calcutta. The difference would have been, that instead of useful discussion brought to bear upon the Act before it was passed, there would have been unavailing complaint and recrimination at any supposed neglect of local wants or wishes.

6300. Before the 12th of May 1862 the Act was returned to the Government of Bombay, was it not ?—I can tell you by referring.

6301. Do you not recollect that on the 12th of May 1862 you sent the draft Act to the Secretary of State, with the intimation that it was intended to be brought forward again in the next July session ?—I have no doubt that you are right as to the date ; I am speaking now from the dates which I find in the memorandum at page 76 of the Blue Book.

6302. You will see by paragraph 46 that you sent the proposed Act to the Secretary of State ?—Yes.

6303. With what object did you send it to the Secretary of State?—We had received instructions that no legislation was to take place regarding the Bank of Bombay without the previous sanction and approval of both the Government of India and of the Secretary of State.

6304. Have you a copy of that letter?—I am not sure whether I could lay my hands on a copy of the letter, or whether it was an intimation conveyed to me demi-officially.

6305. Have you any demi-official letter ?—I will refer and see. If it were from the Secretary of State it would be a confidential letter.

6306. We must have all letters before us ?—If I can find any letter I will see in what form it is, and I will inform the Commission. I may state that with regard to communications from the Secretary of State, I have always considered them confidential, and that it is not my duty to make use of them in evidence, without the previous sanction of the Secretary of State by whom they have been written.

6307. That would not be any justification in a court of law for your withholding them, and we have just the same powers as a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench has. We have the power of enforcing the production of any document, and there is no limitation upon that power, except such limitation as the law imposes in courts of law. You must bring yourself within the exception allowed by a court of law, if you wish to exclude any document from our consideration.—It will be for the Commission to consider, should I have occasion to lay the matter before them, whether any communication from the Secretary of State comes within the category of a privileged communication which they would not insist upon being produced.

6308. It could not be privileged. The only document which you could refuse to produce, according to law, would be a document which it would affect the interests of the State to produce. If you could bring a document within that category, namely, that the interests of the State will be affected at this period of time by the production of a letter dated three or four years ago, that perhaps would bring it within the exception.—Should I be required by the Commission to produce any letter from the Secretary of State, that would be a point for the Commissioners to consider.

6309. I should certainly wish to see that letter. Did not that letter contain an express direction that the Act was to be passed in accordance with the draft Act for the Bank of Bengal ?—I am not aware of that, and without referring to the letter I cannot speak positively.

6310. You have no recollection as to that fact, that it contained a positive injunction that the Act was to be in accordance with the Bengal Act ?—I have this recollection, that at the time when the Act was sent back to us, and in fact from the beginning of these proceedings, I had a distinct understanding that no legislation was permitted to us in Bombay, without the previous approval both of the Government of

Sir H. B. E. Frere.

India and of the Secretary of State. My impression was, that that proviso was stated in some of the official documents on the subject. I have not been able to trace any official document which expressly says so, and, therefore, I speak on a probability that I might find it in a confidential letter from the Secretary of State. I can only speak to my own distinct understanding, that I was not at liberty to deal with this subject as I should have dealt with it had it been an ordinary matter before us.

6311. According to your recollection, did not that letter contain an express direction, that you were to proceed in legislating for the Bank of Bombay according to the draft Act then passing, or about to pass, for Bengal?—Without referring to the letter I cannot say.

6312. It is most important for us to have that letter. —I beg the Commissioners' pardon, but I am not positive that the letter does exist. I speak positively on the point that I had a distinct understanding, which I communicated to all my colleagues, to everybody connected with the Government, that we were not to legislate without a previous reference to the Secretary of State, and the Government of India. I find in the official documents upon the subject a great many references to that understanding, but I have not been able to trace any distinct official prohibition, and therefore I conclude that I may have got my impression from a confidential letter. It may have been from the Secretary of State, it may have been from the Governor General, or it may have been communicated to me in other ways. I can only speak distinctly as to the disability under which I felt that I was placed, and to the necessity under which I felt that we were to refer to the Secretary of State, and to the Government of India, before legislating.

6313. If that is so, have you any doubt that you had a confidential communication?—I cannot speak positively upon that subject.

6314. You could not have conversed with either the Secretary of State or the Government of India? —Certainly not. It may be in an official communication which I am not able to trace.

6315. Then perhaps we had better adjourn the production of that document until the first thing on Thursday morning. Can you attend us then?— Certainly.

6316. Will you search for that document, and then we will consider the question. I must express my opinion, of course subject to further consideration, that you cannot withhold any document from the Commission, unless you are able to swear that considerations of State render it unadvisable to produce that document?—I should be glad if the Commission would reserve their decision upon that point, because it appears to me to be a matter of extremely grave consideration, whether any official in the position of the governor of a presidency, or of a colony, is at liberty to produce in his own defence, or in the defence of his government, communications which he has received from one of the Secretaries of State. I merely state my difficulty, and it will be for the Commission to consider it. My only motive for withholding that document would be one which must tell against my own government.

6317. Do you, or do you not, recollect an express direction proceeding from anybody to follow the Bengal Act?—Decidedly. We were to follow the Bengal Act as far as possible, with certain exceptions and limitations, a great many of which are set out in this summary in the Blue Book.

6318. From whom did you receive that direction? —My principal information on this subject is derived from the summary, and if you will indicate any particular point on which you would wish for further elucidation, I will endeavour to supply you with it.

6319. I know the summary almost by heart, and I want to get further information than the summary gives. I wish to know whether you received any instructions, and from whom, not mentioned in that summary, as to the preparation of the draft Act?— With the exception of such confidential communications as I have mentioned, I am not aware of any. There may be others which I may find on searching. If there is any particular point on which the Commission will have the goodness to say, "We wish for further elucidation on this question," I will make search.

6320. Let us perfectly understand one another. I consider it material that this Commission should have all the correspondence, whether official, demi-official, or confidential, with respect to the passing of Act 10 of 1863, and I hope that you will attend on Thursday morning and produce all such documents, or give some legal reason why they should not be produced, and we will then deal with that legal reason.—I trust that the Commission will believe that I have the most earnest wish to place at their disposal every sort of information which I possess on this subject. There is one class of communications to which I have referred, namely, those from the Secretary of State, or from the Governor General, as to which, for reasons of public policy, and in opposition to my own interests, I should be glad if the Commissioners took the same views as I take, namely, that they are not to be produced solely for reasons of public policy, and with no view to defend myself or my government. With that single exception I have the utmost wish to produce every paper which I can produce.

6321. If that be the case there will be no difficulty in your applying for and getting the leave of the Secretary of State to produce those documents; do you not think so?—My impression is that the Secretaries of State generally would take the view which I take in this matter; but it will be for the Commission to judge upon the point when I put in their hands a letter and say, "This is a letter which, for reasons of public policy, I deem ought not to be made public."

6322. At present we will adjourn that question. You will take a note that we want all confidential and demi-official communications received either from the Secretary of State or from the Governor General, containing instructions, or otherwise relating to Act 10 of 1863; and that we shall expect their production, or a valid legal excuse for their non-production, the first thing on Thursday morning?—I trust that the Commission in the meantime will weigh the general objection which I have suggested on grounds of public policy.

6323. On the 16th of September 1862 there was a letter addressed by the Secretary of State to the Governor General, which was also forwarded to you for your instructions. It was not an answer to the letter of the 12th of May at all, or intended to be, was it? It chiefly related to the currency, and only had a few incidental observations as to banking matters?— Are you referring to the document mentioned in paragraph 49 of the summary?

6324. Yes, it is all mentioned in the summary. Do you remember referring that despatch of the Secretary of State to the solicitor of the Government for his opinion? You will find the material part of it set out in the summary at page 77.—I find in the abstract of the proceedings of the Government of Bombay for November 1862 a despatch from Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for India, No. 64, dated 16th September 1862.

6325. That is the one to which I allude; did not you refer that with the draft Act to the solicitor of the Government?—Yes.

6326. Did you carefully read Mr. Bickersteth's reply or opinion upon it?—I cannot say whether I read that particular paper carefully. I read every part of this correspondence as it came before me with great care.

6327. Then you remember the particularly cautious terms in which that opinion was expressed?—If you will have the kindness to let me see the letter I will state.

6328. It is set out in page 77 of the summary. In the sixth paragraph it is said, "In other respects I have not altered the provisions of the bill, and do not express any opinion as to its propriety, or otherwise. (7.) The enclosure marked (A.) shows in red ink the amendments which I think should be made in the 32d section of the bill, and, if they are approved, I will submit them to the solicitors of the Bank of Bombay. (8.) Upon a comparison of the powers intended to be conferred upon the bank, with its existing powers and those of the Bank of Bengal as heretofore constituted, it will be observed that they are considerably extended, and in some respects exceed those now conferred upon the Bank of Bengal by Act IV. of 1862. (9.) The Secretary of State in the 53d paragraph of the despatch desires that the business of the bank be restricted to legitimate banking operations, such as those transacted by the Bank of England or by the Bank of Bengal, as heretofore constituted. (10.) So far as I am aware, the powers intended to be conferred by the bill, though more extended in some respects than those of the Bank of Bengal as heretofore, or at present constituted, do not exceed those of the Bank of England; but my knowledge on this subject is very limited." Did that strike you at all?—It did not strike me more than any other part of the letter. I paid every attention to it, as was due to an opinion coming from the solicitor.

6329. You see that he called the attention of the Government very forcibly to the fact that this Act was much more extensive in its operation than that of the Bank of Bengal?—Yes.

6330. You were otherwise, perhaps, aware of that fact?—Certainly.

6331. Then it appears that afterwards you adopted Mr. Archibald Robertson's suggestions as to the verbosity of this Act, and referred it to Mr. Advocate General Lewis. You will see at paragraph 56 on page 79 that he made very little alteration in it, and then you referred it to the legislative department. Did you ever read this Act, and compare its provisions with those of the Act for the Bank of Bengal?—I looked over the Act with all the papers relating to it with as much care as I could give to a subject with which I was practically comparatively unacquainted. My view of our duty was, that it was desirable in the first instance to know from the Bank of Bombay what form they wished the charter to take, with reference to any alterations which might be proposed, and having done that, to criticise it with such means as we had at our disposal; and then to lay the best draft which we could procure of a legislative measure before the Government of India and the Secretary of State, to await their criticism upon it; and then to pass the measure, with any modifications which might seem desirable.

6332. The Act was read a first time on the 4th of February 1863, was it not?—Yes, it appears so from this summary.

6333. It was then referred to a committee of the Council. That does not appear there, but I know it. —That would be the usual course.

6334. Did that committee make any and what report?—I can inform you probably by referring to my papers.

6335. When you were referred to by Mr. Robertson about the verbosity of the Act, I find that you did in one of the very few minutes which I find of yours say, "I would as a rule adopt the briefer language of the Bengal Act where the meaning is identical." From that I suppose you did not mean that you intended to adopt the principles of the Bengal Act, but merely that you would adopt its language as preferable language to the other, where the meaning was identical?—I have not seen this minute probably since it was written.

6336. You merely meant by that, that where the Bengal Act and the Bombay Act appeared to convey the same thing, you would prefer the language of the Bengal Act?—That is apparently my meaning.

6338. Was there any real discussion in the Legislative Council about this Act?—I find in the proceedings which are printed that two speeches were made by Mr. Tristram, but I find nothing else, and they were upon other points. The printed proceedings no doubt give a very fair account of what passed. My own impression, and I believe the impression of the members of the Government at the time generally, was, that the measure had been sifted as far as it was possible for us to sift it, and that it then rested with the confirming authority to say whether we had made such a measure as they considered expedient.

6339. What do you consider to have been the policy of the Act? What did you understand by it? —I understood that, in consideration of the withdrawal of the right to issue notes, the action of the bank was to be less restricted than it had been.

6340. It was your intention to remove many of the restrictions which were to be found in the Acts of the Bank of Bengal and the Bank of Madras; that was your positive intention?—I considered that the bank was allowed by the Government of India, and by the Secretary of State, to have a less restrictive action, in consequence of the withdrawal of the right to issue notes.

6341. Did you ascertain what the old restrictions were, and what further liberty was intended to be given by the new Act?—In a general way I did. I went through every part of the papers, from time to time, as they were submitted to me, and made myself, as far as I could, acquainted with their general bearing.

6342. Were you aware that the old Act did not allow the bank to discount negotiable securities, unless two persons, or firms, unconnected in partnership, were bound?—I cannot speak to particular points of that sort, at this distance of time. I have explained to the Commissioners the mode in which the measure was dealt with. It was repeatedly before us at intervals extending over many months, and every time that it came before us I did my best to look into the particular point which arose. Whether this or that particular point attracted my especial notice, I should be unwilling to state at this distance of time, beyond this general result, that I considered that when we had taken all this trouble to send the drafts backwards and forwards, and to let everybody concerned know what was intended, we had, as nearly as possible, produced such a measure as the Secretary of State and the Government of India would approve.

6343. You will excuse me, but that was not your usual way of doing business. You generally looked into things yourselves, and did not rely upon other people? —I do not mean to say that I relied upon anyone else. I formed my judgment upon what I then saw and heard for myself.

6344. I understand from you that you thought that this measure was to remove restrictions?—Certainly.

6345. Did you not apply your mind to consider what restrictions were to be removed, and what relaxation was to take place?—In a general way I did.

6346. I suppose that if you had any difficulty about it, you would inform yourself from inquiry of those persons who were competent to give you a good opinion?—Certainly.

6347. Did not you know that the old Act restricted discounts for instance, and that it was necessary that they should represent a real transaction; that there should be a bill drawn by one party upon another unconnected in business. The new Act simply says, "negotiable securities," which may mean a promissory note in a single name. Do you remember that great relaxation being brought to your notice?—That certainly did not attract my notice.

6348. Then again there were many other restrictions; there was one as to time; advances were originally to run for three months, which was a very prudent restriction in the old Act, but in the new Act there is no restriction as to time. Were you aware of that?—I recollect inquiring, but I forget from whom, with regard to one of the restrictions which was removed, respecting time; and I was informed that it was found practically that restrictions regarding time were inoperative, when there was any particular motive or desire to get over them, and that restrictions of that sort were rather a snare and a delusion than a real safeguard.

6349. With a dishonest secretary certainly it might be so, but it is not a usual principle of banking to allow of discounts for more than three months at a time.—I am not sure whether the restriction related particularly to discounts, or to any particular form of note. I recollect inquiring of somebody, but of whom I do not remember, with a view to inform myself as to the wisdom of removing a restriction regarding time, and that was the general substance of the opinion which was given to me.

6350. Did it not strike you at all at that time, that the old Act prohibited any advance on bank shares, or on any certificate of shares, whereas the new Act allowed an advance upon the shares of public companies in India?—That did not particularly strike me at the time.

6351. We have discovered how that alteration was made, and it was made before the draft came before the Government, so that I need not ask you about it. Did it not strike you that the old Act prohibited an advance to one person of more than three lacs, and that the new Act contained no such restriction?—That did not strike me.

6352. The old Act forbade any overdrawing of accounts; the new Act in its original form had a prohibition against the overdrawing of accounts in Schedule B., but that was struck out in the Legislative Council, so that in fact the new Act contained no such restriction; was your attention called to that point in any way?—Not specially that I recollect. With regard to the removal of that schedule of byelaws, since I have seen some of the proceedings of the Commission, there has been recalled to my recollection the reason why that schedule was left out. It was considered that it might very likely require modification, and that it would be extremely difficult to modify it in the manner which might be necessary if it were requisite to come every time to the Legislature to alter a single byelaw, and that it was the better plan to leave it to the board of directors.

6354. Did it strike you that whilst the capital under the old Act was half a crore, the new Act authorized two crores and nine lacs?—I was aware of that fact.

6355. Of course it is only a matter of opinion. We are not a court of law, and we should like to have the opinion of a person of your position. What is your opinion now of that Act 10 of 1863?—In what respect?

6356. Do you think that this was a wise or prudent measure?—Judged by my present lights, I certainly do not consider that it was a wise or prudent measure. At the time I considered that we had taken every possible pains to make it what was considered a wise and prudent measure by those who had a larger view of such subjects than we had.

6358. Does not that opinion rather tend to show the boldness (to use the mildest term) of making any very great departure from the old Acts which had worked so well?—I am speaking now of matters of opinion. My opinion, expressed before I went to Bombay at all, had always been against partial and local legislation, and against the constitution of local banks with the large powers required for an imperial bank in India. I had held, and I hold now, a very strong personal opinion, that in order to execute the functions which were expected of us in the Bombay Bank, you require a national bank, formed with at least as much deliberation and with the aid of as much experience and banking knowledge as the Bank of England. I might say even more so, because, as the Commission is aware, the mercantile peculiarities of India are in many respects very different from those of England, and in addition to everything which relates to the difficulties of framing a good bank charter in England, you have the difficulties of dealing with a very old, and experienced, and widely extended, and rich native mercantile community, who have been for many ages dealing with this very matter of banking, on different principles and in a different manner from the bankers of Europe.

6359. Still does not the question remain, that if there was such a great difficulty in getting sufficient experience to frame an Act, it would have been better for the larger council of the Governor General to have reframed it, or better for you not to have departed so very much from the old line?—It is quite possible, as a matter of speculation, that the Bombay Bank Charter Act might have been passed in a better form if it had been sent to Calcutta, but as a matter of opinion I am not at all satisfied that you would have had a better measure if it had been passed in Calcutta. I will mention one reason why. Whenever the Bombay directors, or shareholders, wished for a relaxation of restrictions, which the Governor General might have wished to have imposed, the probability is, that the question would have been discussed and pressed very earnestly in the Bombay view upon the Calcutta Legislature, and it is quite possible that the Act regarded as a local Act might have been passed with even less consideration of suggested alterations than we gave to it in Bombay.

6360. Before we pass for the present from this question of Act 10, I wish to ask you whether you can give me a list of the non-official members of the Legislative Council at the time of the passing of that Act?—I will take a note of that and ascertain.

6361. I find by the bank minutes of the 2d of February 1862, that the directors asked Rustomjee, Mr. Tristram, and Mr. Scott to look after the bill in the Legislative Council; then shortly after the Act was brought in they asked Mr. Scott to do so. Had Rustomjee and Mr. Tristram retired in the meantime?—I will obtain that information.

6362. How many commercial members were there when the council was full?—That I cannot speak to now.

6363. I should like to have those particulars.—Before leaving this question of the Act, I would beg to mention that my opinion on this subject, with regard to the difficulty of passing bank charters in Legislative Councils in India, was repeatedly stated to the Government of India, both before and since the passing of this Act. It is no recent opinion which I have taken up from what has passed.

6364. Have you any copy of a letter which you can show us pointing out those difficulties?—I had held on this point very much the opinions which Mr. Wilson held with regard to the necessity of having a national bank for India.

6365. A general bank for all India?—Yes.

6366. I have seen some of your opinions on that subject. The next question to which I will turn is that of the increases of capital; were you consulted at all in respect to those increases?—I cannot tell in what particular form I was consulted, but, with the permission of the Commission, I will refer them to what was one of the original reasons for increasing the capital, which, as far as I can judge from the evidence which I have read, has escaped the attention of the Commission.

6367. As to the first increase, I think there can be no doubt that it was a very wise and prudent measure. The note circulation had been withdrawn, and the bank had to supply that vacuum.—I am not sure whether these letters have been before the Commission. They relate to a crisis which took place in November 1863.

6368. No, we have not seen those letters.—In November 1863 the Government were addressed in these terms, first of all by the manager of the Commercial Bank of India (Exhibit A. 171.) "To A. D. Robertson, Esq., Financial Secretary to the Government: Sir, I beg to bring to your notice the extremely critical state of financial matters in Bombay at the present moment, and to express my conviction that, unless Government interferes in some manner, so as to grant relief, something approaching to a general bankruptcy must take place within the next few days. The mint is working in a more dilatory manner than it ever was known to do before, when such an amount of bullion had been tendered to it for coinage; and it is reported that the orders at the mint are that the assay department shall not work in excess of the coinage department. At present I believe the out-turn is only about 2 lacs a day. Last year, when the pressure was not half so severe as now, the mint worked night and day, and the out-turn was double what it is at present." Then he goes on to suggest a measure which I will not read, unless the Commission wish me to do so.

Then the agent for the Oriental Bank Corporation, Mr. Macneil, addressed Mr. Robertson on the 16th of November in the same manner: (Exhibit A. 172)—"I have the honour to bring to your notice the present unexampled state of commercial affairs in Bombay. You are doubtless aware of the critical state of the money market, and the great difficulty the public have in procuring money on any security whatever; should no relief be afforded, and any alarm arise in the bazaar, it is difficult to predict what the consequences might be."

6370. That was after the first increase of capital?—Then it tells even more strongly on the point. There are then various suggestions as to the increase of the power of the mint, and so on.

6371. As I understand you, your object in reading those letters is to show that there was really a want of more capital in Bombay at that time?—Then here is a letter from the Government of Bombay to the Government of India, dated the 20th of November 1863. "I am directed to bring to the notice of the Government of India the critical position in which the money market of Bombay is at present placed. The Bank of Bombay raised its rates on the 29th ultimo to 11 per cent. on government bills and 13 per cent. on private bills, and has during the last three weeks been obliged to refuse all accommodation to the public, for want of available funds at its command, and so low had the bank's balance fallen, that on the 14th instant it stood only as follows:—

	Rupees.
Cash - -	4,13,753
Notes - -	5,77,580
Total Rs.	9,91,333

The other banks, it is believed, are also in a similar position, and the managers of two of them (the Commercial Bank and the Oriental Corporation), copies of whose letters are annexed, have addressed Government on the subject, requesting that the mint master be authorized to issue mint certificates for amounts approximating to the value of the silver bullion tendered to the mint for coinage.

"This state of matters, which it was believed would have been relieved after the Dewallee (at which time there is always a temporary pressure, owing to the practice of the native merchants of accumulating all their available money in their houses for luck's sake) is, I am to observe, prevailing, while there is no want of bullion in the hands of the banks and European firms, and if this bullion could be converted into coin, the immense pressure on the market would at once be removed."

6372. Then I understand you to say that you thought that the second increase of capital would be a wise and prudent measure?—This was one of the facts which came to our notice, which was reported to the Government of India, and also to the Secretary of State, in a despatch of the 28th of November 1863, and which seemed to show that, even as it then stood, the Bank of Bombay had not sufficient means to do what it was necessary for a bank in that position to do for the commercial interests of the place.

6373. I asked you whether you were consulted upon the increase of the capital; I did not quite catch your answer?—I do not recollect being specifically consulted as governor. I knew that an increase was talked about, and that the subject would come on for discussion, but I do not recollect being consulted as to whether it was necessary.

6374. You were not consulted as to the third increase of the capital?—I have no recollection of being previously consulted. My view was that we might leave the bank to judge of this matter for themselves. The evil which the proceedings which you are now investigating have brought to light, of a large unemployed capital leading to an improvident use of it, had not then occurred to me. There was a great complaint against the bank keeping its money unemployed, and being very slow in making use of it, and giving very small dividends to the shareholders, and my impression was that the bank was prudently and wisely disposed to take proper care of the funds at its disposal, and that there were two special reasons why we should leave it to them, the chief bankers of the place, to consider what capital was necessary to them. Those reasons were, first, a pressure of the kind to which I have just referred; and, secondly, the just ground of complaint which the bank had with regard to the government balances at different places. That point has a great bearing upon this question.

It was held by everybody connected with the Government, and I believe the opinion was shared by the Government of India and by the Secretary of State, that it was not a provident measure to have given over to the Bank of Bengal the government balances, without the bank possessing a larger capital than it did possess; that the temptation which the bank was under would be to use, for ordinary commercial purposes, the government balances, which might be called for to any amount at any time, and which were a precarious resource of the bank, and that it was necessary, before the government balances were entrusted to the bank, that the bank should be in a stronger position as regarded its own capital. I am not certain how I got the impression, but my impression was that the Government of India, as then constituted, and the Secretary of State, would not have permitted us to make over the government balances, without the fullest assurance that the bank's capital was quite large enough to remove all temptation to use the government balances as they would use ordinary balances entrusted to them by private individuals.

6375. I want to ask you a question of fact which I forgot to ask a director. Did the Government vote upon these questions of the increase of capital?—I cannot say.

6376. We have one authority saying that the Government never did vote upon any one question; but you do not happen to know?—I do not know.

6377. Your consent was not required by the Act to the increase of capital, and I only ask you these questions for the purpose of giving you an opportunity of explaining how far you may in fact have been consulted?—It is only just to the bank that I should say that I was cognizant beforehand of every proposal to increase the capital; and that in each case, as far as my opinion went, it seemed to me that a case had been made out for increase, but I am not sure that I was ever asked officially, or in any form, with a view to communicating my opinion.

6378. You have referred slightly to another question upon which there has been a great deal of correspondence, and I have never been able exactly to find out how the matter ended. There seems to have been an understanding between the Bank of Bombay and the Government, that when they opened branches at different places the treasury balances should be transferred to those branch banks. That understanding went on, and there was an active correspondence upon that subject all through the year 1862, and the bank eventually addressed Sir Charles Wood upon the hardship of the matter, and Sir Charles Wood wrote back again, and referred the matter back to you. How was it that the bank never got those cash balances?—There are two minutes which relate rather to what you have been speaking about before, but perhaps you will allow me to refer to them. There was a letter from the Bank of Bombay of the 8th of May 1862, requesting that an extraordinary meeting of the local Legislative Council might be called for the purpose of passing the bill for the incorporation and reconstitution of the bank, and urging the importance of the government treasuries at Poona, Ahmedabad, and Surat being made over to them. On that I find that I made the following minute: "A copy of the draft of the new charter goes home by this mail to the Secretary of State for his consideration. The bank might be informed in reply to their letter that the Government has referred on the subject of the bill to the Secretary of State, and that it is not likely the bill can be passed before the next ordinary meeting of the Legislative Council; but no delay which it is in the power of this Government to avoid shall be allowed to interfere with the passing of the Act." Then I put a question, "Does the transfer of the treasury business depend on the Act?—If not, we may consider that separately." (Exhibit marked A. 174.)

6379. The bearing of this matter may be put in the following way: the Government require the bank to increase its capital for the purpose of strengthening its position, so that they may trust their treasuries to it; it increases its capital, and it opens branches, and then the Government do not hand over the treasuries to those branches. I want to know exactly the position. Who is to blame for not handing over the treasuries, if there is any blame in the matter?—There is a second minute. I find that that letter produced a remonstrance from the bank in June 1862.

6381. There was a letter of the Bombay Government cited in the board minutes of the 10th of July, in which it was said that they awaited a reply from the Government of India to a reference made to them to enable the Bombay Government to decide the terms upon which the Government treasuries at the stations at which branch banks had been established by the bank were to be made over to it.—I find that on the 1st of July 1862 I pointed out again why the Act had not been passed (Exhibit A. 175), and my minute goes on to say, "Add that the Governor in council would gladly have complied with the request to lay the charter bill before an extraordinary session of council, but that in the interim doubts had arisen as to how far its provisions were in accordance with the views of the Secretary of State, and these doubts could not be resolved without a reference to England, in making which no time was lost. The bank cannot be more anxious than the Governor in council for the passing of the bill, but until assured as to the views of the Secretary of State it cannot be proceeded with. The whole correspondence has gone home to the Secretary of State. Inform the bank that this is the case. Telegraph for an early answer daily till a reply is received."

Then there is a memorandum in the margin from the chief secretary.

"Paragraph 7. With respect to paragraph 7 of the letter" (that is the letter from the bank), "I beg to explain that the agreement referred to is the one which has been executed between the bank and the Government, in the 20th article of which provision has been made for the establishment of branch banks, and that we are awaiting a reply to the letter to the Government of India, No. 783, dated 7th instant, to enable us to decide the terms on which the Government treasuries at the stations, at which branch banks have been established by the bank, are to be made over to it." (Exhibit marked A. 175.)

6382. That is what I have just been reading. I am aware of all that, but I want to know what was done eventually. It appears to have gone up to the Governor-General, and the bank appealed to Sir Charles Wood; why is it that the bank never got these treasuries?—I believe that we were perpetually making references to the Government of India on this subject, but that we did not receive authority to make over the treasuries.

6383. I can very well understand the conduct of the Government of India after, say, 1865, when they got alarmed about the bank; but in 1863 and 1864 there was no alarm, and I cannot see why they should not have handed over the treasuries?—That would be a question for the Government of India to answer rather than for myself.

6384. Are you prepared to say that you got no order and no explanation back from the Government of India about this matter?—I believe not; but, if you will allow me, I will look further. I find a draft agreement which was sent to the Government of India on December the 23d, have you that?

6385. We have a great deal of correspondence with regard to that, but I would rather put that question of the agreement aside?—Here is a letter which I find in March 1864, have you that?

6386. I do not know that I have.—It is a letter from the Government of India.

6387. Of what date is that letter to which you refer?—March 23d. I find in the abstract of proceedings of that date, "Letter from the Government of India, No.6,280, dated 17th December 1863 (Exhibit A. 176), remarking that on the 14th of November 1863 the balance of the Bombay Bank was rupees 9,91,333, while its liabilities payable on demand were on the same date, rupees 1,56,71,745, and requesting information as to what explanation the Government directors can give of a bank, in the proper management of which Government are so much concerned, having been allowed to fall into this state."

Then there is a reference to a minute by Mr. Birch, Government director, concurred in by the Honourable A. D. Robertson, dated 27th January 1864, and there is the following letter to the Government of India. "I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, No. 6,280, dated 17th December 1863, relative to the state of the balances of the Bank of Bombay in November last, and to forward herewith copy of a minute by Mr. S. D. Birch, Government director of the bank, concurred in by the Honourable A. D. Robertson, together with a copy of memorandum which, with your letter and the above minute, were placed before the Honourable the Governor in council. I am instructed to state that this Government do not see any grounds for holding the Government directors, who are only three out of nine members of the board of directors of the bank, in any way responsible for the general management of the bank. That management, I am to observe, was freely criticised at the period to which your letter refers by the public press, and the commercial community, but Government find that the pressure then experienced by the Bank of Bombay was shared by every one of the numerous banking institutions in Bombay. This Government are not in a position to judge to what extent a different system of management might have enabled the Bank of Bombay to hold a better position. His Excellency in council would, however, have gladly gone further into this question, but for a conviction that Government themselves are not in a position to censure the bank's administration, for the reasons noticed in Mr. Birch's minute. The balances in the district treasuries have not been made over to the bank owing to the non-receipt of the authority asked in my letters noted in the margin;" they are dated 23d December 1862, the 22d June 1863, the 19th of September 1863, and the 28th of October 1863. (Exhibit marked A. 176.)

6388. What is the date of that letter?—The 23d of March 1864.

6389. What is that book from which you are reading?—An abstract of the proceedings of the Bombay Government Financial Department, 1864. It is not regularly paged. The letter goes on to say, "And I am further to state that the unexpectedly heavy drafts from the Secretary of State have led to the Government balances being overdrawn. Since the pressure above adverted to took place, the capital of the bank has been doubled, and a proposition has since been agreed to by the shareholders for a further increase, but I am desired to submit it is not the less desirable that this Government should be enabled to fulfil their engagements to the bank by handing over to it the balances in the district treasuries."

6390. Did the Governor-General still decline to do it?—I do not think that any answer declining was received; the matter lay over, as far as my recollection goes, but I speak under correction. You will find the letters referred to at page 65 of the appendix to the abstract for that month.

6391. How did the matter end? What was the position of things when the panic came; the treasuries had never been handed over?—They had not been handed over at that time. I am not sure whether at Poona the treasury had not been handed over, but I think that I could find out by referring.

Further on, at paragraph 14 of the minute, he says, "In considering this question it must be borne in mind that the immediate contraction of the bank's business had been rendered more difficult by the necessity that had been forced upon it of supplying the branches with funds. When it was decided by the directors to establish branch banks, the measure passed on the understanding that the Government would be prepared at once to make over the Government business and the treasuries on certain conditions, wherever a branch might with its sanction be opened. The course that had been pursued with the Bank of Bengal led the board to the conclusion that no delay would take place in this arrangement; but although several branches have now existed upwards of twenty-two months, not one of the Government treasuries has as yet been made over. The result has been that, instead of the branches having funds at their disposal from sources the directors conceived they were justified in relying upon, the head office has been compelled to keep them supplied, instead of being feeders to it, as it was expected they would be; they have been a continuous drain."

6396. The agreement provides that "if at any time during the continuance of this agreement the said bank shall establish a branch office at any town or place other than Bombay, and the Governor of Bombay in council shall offer to the directors of the said bank for the time being, and the said directors shall, on behalf of the bank, accept the business of bankers to the Government of Bombay for the district or locality within which such branch shall be established, or the business of issuing and circulating the Government paper currency within such district or locality, then and in every such case the business so arranged to be taken up and performed by the said bank shall be carried on under and subject to the provisions of this agreement, so far as the same are applicable, and on the basis of the clauses cited in the margin, being the third and fifth paragraphs of the memorandum of the Government of India of the 20th of March 1861, relating to the establishment of such branch bank, except in so far as the provisions of this agreement, or of the said clauses, may be modified or altered by any special agreement which the said Secretary of State in council, through the Governor of Bombay in council, may from time to time enter into with the said bank in reference to the business so to be carried on at the particular branch bank." I suppose that you considered, did you not, that that authorized you to deal with the bank?—Certainly not in the way of transferring the Government balances to it.

6397. That agreement was approved of by the Governor-General in council?—We certainly had no power to make over the Government balances without the distinct sanction of the Government of India.

6398. You considered that to be in the financial department as to which the Governor-General was supreme?—Yes. I find that on the 18th of May in the same year, 1864, the Bank of Bombay forwarded to the Government of Bombay a copy of a letter addressed by the directors of the bank to Sir Charles Trevelyan complaining of the delay. (Exhibit marked A. 177.)

6399. We have that in the minutes?—Then I find that there are two more letters from the Bank of Bombay to Sir Charles Trevelyan on the subject of the present position of the bank. (Exhibit A. 178 and A. 179.)

6400. I think that we have those letters?—Then there is a letter from the Government of Bombay to the Governor-General of India (Exhibit A. 180), "The Governor in council trusts that the sanction of the Government of India will be accorded to the arrangements which have been agreed to between this Government and the bank, with the view of carrying out the transfer to it of the business of the Mofussil treasuries, and which have been concluded so as to avoid the necessity of any cash payments to the bank on account of establishments, and on terms which his Excellency in Council conceives to be more advantageous to the Government than the agreement made with the Bank of Bengal with the same object." (Exhibit marked A. 180.)

6401. What is the date of that letter?—September 24th, 1864. Then there are the two letters to Sir Charles Trevelyan. I have not been able to trace them, but they must have been voluminous letters, for they occupy several pages.

6402. Was there no answer from the Government of India to the letter which you have read?—I am not aware of any; there was certainly nothing which enabled us to act. I ought perhaps to mention that I have understood that the Secretary of State disapproved of the arrangement under which the Government balances had been transferred to the Bank of Bengal, and that, pending a decision on that discussion, this matter was held over as regarded Bombay.

6403. Then probably you had some demi-official communication to that effect?—Probably; that was the impression which I had at the time.

6404. Namely, that there was a discussion going on between the Secretary of State and the Governor-General as to the transfer of the treasuries to the Bank of Bengal?—I understood that the treasuries in Bengal had been transferred, and that the Secretary of State expressed his disapprobation of the terms under which the transfer had been made, and that pending the decision of the points at issue between the Secretary of State and the Governor-General of India, this matter as regarded the transfer in Bombay was held over.

6405. Have you any demi-official letter stating that?—I will see.

6406. I think that we must add to the requisition which we have made for Thursday morning, that you produce all demi-official letters as well as confidential letters; they are very much the same, are they not?—Unless the subject matter is specified it will be difficult to produce the letters. The demi-official correspondence is very considerable in bulk.

6407. Of course I mean only that relating to the Bank of Bombay.—But with regard even to that the demi-official correspondence is extremely voluminous.

6408. Unless you can bring it within some legal objection I should like to see it.—I have not the least objection with regard to the greater part of it, but I have great difficulty in knowing what the Commission requires.

6409. I should like to see all those letters, and then we will return all those which we do not want. I should like to read everything relating to the Bank of Bombay. Have you any further papers to which to refer us?—There are some papers in April 1864 which illustrate the mode in which the correspondence passed between the Government of India and the accountant-general.

6411. I am quite aware of that. I know that the financial department is quite a distinct branch?—I have no doubt that I can refer to other letters which will illustrate the way in which we pressed this matter upon the Government of India.

6412. We will turn to another matter. Do you remember the establishment of the branch bank at Kalbadevi?—I recollect that there was a branch opened at Kalbadevi.

6413. Do you remember that it was brought before you in council?—I do not recollect it being specially discussed in council. I find in these abstracts that the bank wrote a letter on the subject, and that it was approved.

6414. That was the letter (handing in Exhibit V. 1 to the witness). Did you authorize Mr. Robertson to sanction the establishment of that branch at Kalbadevi?—I cannot say whether this was authorized or not. My invariable custom, I believe, when a paper came before me was to put my initials, or some mark of its having passed through my hands, with the date.

6415. Mr. Robertson says that he has no doubt of that fact, and that the letter was produced by him at the council and read, and the order taken verbally?—It is very possible.

6416. Do you recollect the transaction?—I have no recollection of anything of that sort passing in council, or when Mr. Robertson attended me with his box of papers.

6417. Was your attention called to the clause of the Act at that time authorizing branches?—I have no recollection of anything of the kind. My recollection goes no further than that the Kalbavedi branch was established, and with the approval of the Government.

6418. Were you aware of the clause of the Act which only authorized the establishment of branches outside of Bombay? (handing the Act to the witness).—The question whether this Kalbavedi branch was or was not properly established under this clause (I speak almost confidently), was never raised.

6419. Whose duty was it to bring that matter before the Government?—It was certainly the duty of the Government to see that no branch was established contrary to law.

6420. My colleague, Major Innes, suggests to me whether the fact of your name not being on that document may be explained by the circumstance that it would be sent round in a slip, and that the slip would be signed by you?—The fact of my name not being to this document in no way diminishes my responsibility for the Act, because I have no doubt that in the printed abstracts this would appear as routine business, and would be disposed of without previous reference to Government. It was my duty, and as far as possible I performed that duty, to look through these abstracts, and to note wherever the previous sanction of Government ought to have been obtained. If, as I conclude, this is among the printed abstracts, the responsibility of myself as governor is the same as if it had been previously submitted to me.

6421. What was your system?—The Calcutta system used to be that there was a list of the business in one margin, and the note of the secretary in the other?—The way of doing business was that any paper of any importance, which was not considered routine, was either sent round to one or more members of the council, or was submitted at a council; and, if it went round, it was the duty of every member, whether he passed an opinion or not, to put his initials and the date, so as to show that he had passed the paper. If it passed at council the secretary would usually make a note that it had passed, with or without discussion. Matters of routine, or matters upon which the secretary felt certain that he knew what the Government orders would be, he might dispose of at once without previous reference; but they would all appear in the printed abstract, of which copies ought to be furnished to the Governor, and he should run his eye over them, and see whether in any of the matters which had passed, without previous discussion or reference, the secretary's powers had been exceeded.

6422. There is nothing there which leads you to doubt Mr. Robertson's statement, that he must have produced that letter to you in council?—Nothing.

6423. The next point to which we will refer is the steps which you took to repress speculation by Government officers. You republished, I think, all the previous orders and minutes, did you not, about the 16th of November 1864. On the 16th of November 1864 you issued an order and republished the minutes of Lord Dalhousie and Lord Elgin. First of all you published a minute of Lord Dalhousie of the 28th of May 1852, which prohibits interference with the management of joint stock companies. Here are the minutes if you like to look at them (handing Exhibit U to the witness). In point of date they run thus,—on the 28th of May 1852 there is an order of Lord Dalhousie which is very short, it prohibits any interference with the management of joint stock companies. You then published some long minutes of November and December 1861 by Sir George Clerk, the object of which was to repress speculation altogether?—Yes.

6424. Then you published an order of the 11th of March 1862 which I suppose was an order of Lord Elgin's. I think that he had then arrived ?—I think so.

6425. Probably you were a party to that order in Calcutta ?—Yes. I think that it was passed on Sir George Clerk's minutes coming before the Governor-General in Council.

6426. Then you passed your order of the 16th of November 1864. What was the exact meaning of that order ? What was your exact object ?—It had come to my notice that a great number of the servants of the Government had been accepting shares, and were liable to be involved as shareholders in companies with which they might be officially connected ; and I found that the orders which were in existence on the subject, the orders of Sir George Clerk especially, were imperfectly known. They were entirely unknown to some of the higher members of the service, and we considered in council what should be done, and after considerable discussion that notification was issued. There was a discussion as to how far we should go, and I considered that the notification should take the form which it now bears, and if possible I should have been glad to have made it rather stronger, but there was very considerable doubt as to whether we were not going beyond what would be considered legal and right, and we did not consider that it was wise to do more than is specified there.

6427. That order, as it seems to me, contained no prohibition against civil servants investing in the shares of the companies of the day ?—It appeared in the course of the discussions that the question of issuing a prohibition had been considered by the Government of India, and that no prohibition had been issued, and that we should be going beyond our powers if we issued a prohibition.

6428. You refer to the order of Lord Elgin of the 11th of March 1862 ?—Yes, and there were previous orders on the subject.

6429. There was an order of Lord Dalhousie on the 28th of May 1852 ?—Yes, and there were Sir George Clerk's.

6430. Sir George Clerk's were only minutes, they were not published before you arrived, were they ?—A part of them had been published, but not as I thought that it was desirable that they should be published.

6431. I want exactly to know why these orders were issued at that time ?—They were issued because it appeared that the whole Government service was becoming demoralized by the share speculation, and we went as far as we considered we could go, to stop the habit of entering into these share speculations.

6432. Had you heard that any officer of the Government connected with the Bank of Bombay had been speculating in shares ?—I had. I obtained my information in the first instance from the public prints. The Bombay Gazette had written several articles which I at first read as imputing motives to the members of the Government, and I did not at first give them the attention which I should otherwise have given, because I felt that the members of the Government were above all suspicion in the matter. Afterwards they became more specific, and I was informed that some members of the Government service had accepted allotments of shares ; and personally, as far as I could, I impressed upon those with whom I was in communication my own views. which were very well expressed by Sir George Clerk's minutes on the subject ; and, after the discussion to which I have referred, the Government collectively put out that notification. The Commander-in-Chief, Sir William Mansfield, thought that the notification I proposed went rather further than we were justified in going, and he submitted an alternative draft, but after discussion I published my own draft, with the concurrence of Mr. Inverarity. (Vide Exhibit marked A. 181.)

6433. I ask the question again because you have not answered it. Did you know that any director of the bank was engaged in speculation ?—Did you hear of it ?—I had heard in the manner which I have described that one of the Government directors, namely, Mr. Robertson, had accepted allotments of shares.

6434. At what time was that ?—It was as stated in a leading article in the Bombay Gazette ; and on reading that article I determined to ask him with regard to the matter. He came, I think, either on the same day or on the day after ; he attended me on business, and commenced by saying that he had seen this paragraph, and admitted that it was correct.

6435. He admitted that it was true that he had been dealing in shares ?—That he had accepted allotments of shares.

6436. When he was a director ?—I am not sure that he was then a director.

6437. He has admitted before us that he received some allotments when he was director ?—At the time I spoke to him he maintained that he was perfectly within the letter of the Government orders on the subject, as far as he knew them, and that his acceptance of these shares was not barred by either the letter or the spirit of the notifications.

6438. Did you hear that any other director received any allotment of shares ?—If you will let me see the names of the directors at that time, I can perhaps state.

6439. Mr. George Inverarity for instance ?—I heard subsequently to Mr. Inverarity leaving India that he had accepted them.

6440. I am speaking of the year 1864, during the mania. It began about the 1st of June 1864 and lasted up to 1865 ?—I did not hear until long afterwards that any of the Government directors, Mr. Birch, or Mr. Ravenscroft, or Mr. Mangles, or Mr. Jacomb, who were the other directors, had received any.

6441. You have stated to us that you had reason to believe that the civil service was becoming demoralized ?—Not the civil service, but the public services generally.

6442. And that one of the Government directors of the bank, namely, Mr. Robertson, had been dealing in shares, which he has since admitted (he says to a small amount), when he was a director. Would it not have been better under those circumstances to have given a less uncertain sound in that order of the 16th of November ?—I do not quite understand what is meant by an "uncertain sound." In what terms would it have been possible to have made it more certain ?

6443. That is perhaps a difficulty, but the fact is that we have examined civil servants who say that there was no prohibition, and that there was nothing in the orders of the Government to prevent their holding shares ?—They have had those orders put into their hands, and they have declined to admit that they in any way restricted their liberty to buy shares ?—Which order did you put to them ?

6444. I put to them the order of the 16th November 1864, and all the other orders. They have told us that they knew of no restriction, except that the servants, if they did it, did it at their peril ; and that they would probably get some stoppage of their promotion. What is stated is this. The Secretary of State's decision is first of all quoted, that "he saw no "objection to the servants of the Government holding "shares in joint stock companies having for their "object the development of the resources of the "country." The Secretary of State had before him Sir George Clerk's less uncertain sounding minute, in which he expresses a much stronger view against the practice ; and he simply concurred in that, and remarked that supersession in promotion was the proper way of noticing the matter. Upon that we said, "The "Governor in Council now desires to point out to all "public servants of Government at this particular "period, when there is so strong a tendency to specu-"lation in Bombay, the extreme importance of "obedience to the spirit of all the previous orders "above alluded to, rather than to the mere letter of "the law, and to repeat that Government will be

8 Dec. 1868.

"guided in its action in accordance with the principles "laid down by Sir George Clerk, concurred in by the "Government of India and the Secretary of State."

The particular object of that reiteration was that we had been informed by some gentlemen that they had taken shares under the opinion recorded by the Secretary of State, that they might take "shares in joint stock companies having for their object the development of the resources of the country," and that they would not have taken those shares if they had been aware of Sir George Clerk's views on the subject.

Then we went on to remind the public servants of the Government generally of their duty, and pointed out the necessity of "avoiding any connection, however remote, with any undertaking which might tend to fetter their action, or divert them from the numerous and important responsibilities imposed by the public service upon them." That seemed to me the only limit which it was possible to place, without going counter to the permission which had been accorded by the Government of India, and the Secretary of State, generally to hold shares.

6445. Then in fact do not I read the order aright, when I say that it amounted to no prohibition, but that it was a warning that if the public servants did invest in shares, it might operate to affect their future promotion?—Yes.

6446. That is really the substance of the order?—That is really the substance of it.

6447. Did you institute any inquiry at that time as to the extent to which this demoralization had prevailed?—I may say that there was no other subject at the time which was a matter of such unceasing anxiety to the members of the Government generally, and regarding which they took so much pains to learn all that they legitimately could learn about what did not come officially before them.

6448. Were not you of opinion that it was very likely to injure the service, and to affect the Government service at the bank?—I felt certain that it would —not specially the bank—but I looked upon it as most dangerous to the spirit and tone of the service generally; and I omitted no means which occurred to me as possible to make known my opinions.

6449. I am to understand that you think that that order of the 16th November 1864 did as much as you could do with propriety on that occasion?—If the Commission will allow me, I will show them the minutes which passed on the subject when it was discussed.

6450. Certainly.—The minutes to which I refer are two minutes of my own and one by the commander-in-chief. (Exhibit A. 181.)

6451. Your first intimation of danger was conveyed in a note received from Sir Charles Wood, dated the 3d of March 1865, was it not?—I think that that was the date.

6452. Have you that note?—Not here.

6453. We shall require you to produce that note; have you any objection to produce it?—It contained nothing more than was afterwards embodied in a despatch.

6454. We should like to see it and judge for ourselves?—With regard to that note, as with regard to the other notes of the Secretary of State, I can only refer to what I have ventured to offer to the Commission, and ask them to wait till Thursday.

6455. I hope that you will understand that we shall not think it any answer to say that it is inconvenient to produce it?—Not the least.

6456. We consider that, if it is not produced, it must be brought within the real legal objection, namely, that it would be detrimental to the interests of the state that that letter should be produced?—I would submit to the Commission, for the sake of clearness, that no reflection which it may cast upon myself, or my Government, would, in my opinion, be any reason for withholding it; but I put it solely upon the grounds of public policy, whether it is for the public interests to insist upon the production of letters written confidentially by the Secretary of State to governors of presidencies in India.

6457. In this case how are we to judge of this note of Sir Charles Wood, and the degree of warning which it gave, unless we see it. We must take now your verbal recollection of it?—You may presume, from my non-production of it, anything which you please against me, personally, or against my Government. You have the power to summon the Secretary of State, I believe, if you think it necessary to know what he communicated.

6459. What was the effect of the note? What was the nature of the warning?—It was simply to the same effect as the official despatch which came afterwards, namely, that he had received information from the Agra and Masterman's Bank that the Bank of Bombay was making advances upon shares (I think that you have the letter of the Agra Bank), and he asked me to be careful, and to put the Government directors on their guard.

6460. What did you do on the receipt of that communication?—I communicated with my colleagues, and with the Government director, who was secretary to the Government, and who, as far as my recollection serves me, had a few days before assumed charge of his office, and I begged him to be on his guard, and to see what had been done. I should mention that up to that moment I had no reason to suppose that the action of the bank had been otherwise than extremely discreet.

6461. What steps did you then take?—I received from Mr. Chapman the explanation which he got at the board of the bank, that the advances were not so numerous as had been supposed, or to so great an amount, and that the practice would be stopped for the future.

6462. At about what time was that? You would receive the letter of the 3d of March about the 25th of March, I suppose?—I cannot give the exact date.

6463. Are you quite sure that this private note referred to the same subject as the letter of Sir Charles Wood to you about the information which he had received from the Agra and Masterman's Bank?—Such is my distinct impression at present. (Vide Exhibit marked A 189.)

6464. Then how do you explain that the letter of the Agra and Masterman Bank to Sir Charles Wood is written on the 15th of May?—Probably the Secretary of State had received a previous intimation to the same effect.

6465. You still think that you have not made a mistake about it, and that it referred to this very letter of the Agra and Masterman's Bank?—That is my impression.

6466. There was a tightness in the market towards the end of May, and the beginning of June, was there not?—Yes.

6467. And there was at last a run upon the bank?—Yes.

6468. And then you addressed the telegram, which is to be found at page 4 of the Blue Book, to the Governor-General?—Yes.

6469. And then you received the telegram, "With reference to your telegram of yesterday in cypher, use your discretion; you will be supported. Keep us informed of the progress of affairs?"—Yes.

6470. Did not you receive another telegram from the Military Secretary of the Governor-General, dated the 21st of June?—Yes.

6471. I find that you state in your letter of the 22d of June, "Since I began this letter I have read your Military Secretary's telegram of the 21st, inquiring whether we have taken steps to ascertain the quality of the good outstanding bills and securities which the banks hold." That was the telegram, was it?—Yes.

6472. I am reading a paragraph from your letter in the confidential appendix (Exhibit marked A. 188), at page 10 ?—Yes.

6473. Then you go on to say, "This was done some six weeks ago, when Sir Charles Wood drew my attention to the management of the bank, and the result was better than I then expected. The advances on shares without collateral security were not large, nor the prices at which they were valued then high." At that time were not you confusing your then knowledge with the knowledge which you had six weeks before? Had you gone into the matter six weeks before? —I cannot be sure that I was not confusing, but my impression is that I was not.

6475. That was the case with only a few shares. Are you not aware that in the cases in which there were advances on shares, the advances were made in one of three ways; it was either an advance upon a promissory note or a bond without further security at all; or it was an advance upon a promissory note and shares by one agreement; or it was an advance upon a promissory note first, and afterwards, when the bank got themselves into a mess, they took shares as another or collateral security?—Yes, I was under the impression that it was only the second and the third kinds of advances which were in question, and regarding which I felt assured from what I had heard that mischief had not been done.

6476. The words "collateral security" do not mean that it should be taken at any other time. If you take two securities at one time they are collateral to each other?—Of course, but there is a substantial difference.

6477. But it is not conveyed by the word "collateral?"—No, but it depends upon the mind of the banker, on his bonâ fides.

6478. You will find that at that time the transactions were almost all collateral in the sense of their being one transaction?—But my impression was that the shares were simply taken as additional security.

6479. That was the case sometimes, no doubt, but only after the bank got into their troubles. There never was an advance on shares without a promissory note being given also. You are aware of that fact?—That was my impression.

"The chief points on which information is desired, are the precise position of the bank in regard to its assets and liabilities; what have been the losses of the bank since the commencement of the present commercial crisis; what is the present amount of overdue bills; what proportion of their amount may be fairly expected to be realized; and what are the prospects of the bank with reference to the bills which have yet to run."

Then the third paragraph goes on to say:—"The report should also state whether the provisions of the bank charter have been duly observed, and at what rates advances have been generally made on shares of public companies; whether they were made on shares at the market price of the day, or at a par value of the shares, or at any fixed rate below that amount. The Governor General in Council would hope that no loans have been made on the stock of public companies beyond par value of such stock.

"If the provisions of the bank charter, as defined in Act 10 of 1863, have been departed from, his Excellency the Governor General in Council desires to know whether the Government directors gave their assent to this departure, and if not, whether any representations were made by them on the subject to Government. In the former case, the Government directors should be called upon to submit an explanation of their proceedings, copies of which should form enclosures of the report." The last paragraph is, "I am to request that information on the points above referred may be furnished as soon as it can be obtained."

There were seven inquiries there; first, as to the assets and liabilities; secondly, what had been the losses of the bank since the commencement of the crisis; thirdly, what was the amount of overdue bills; fourthly, what proportion of that amount might be fairly expected to be realized; fifthly, what were the prospects of the bank with reference to the bills which had yet to run; sixthly, whether the provisions of the bank charter had been violated; and, seventhly, what had been the rates of advances on shares. How long at that time was a letter coming from Simla to Bombay?—It might have been five or six days.

6481. You see a letter of the 29th of June, on page 4; how came that letter to be written? what was the object of that letter to the Government directors of the bank? was it on the receipt of this letter from the Governor General?—I should think not, otherwise the letter would have been specified.

6482. It does not specify it at all.—The point will be cleared up by reference to the original letters. This letter of the Government of India must bear some endorsement upon it.

6483. We have not seen the original letter itself. You do not think that this letter of the 29th was another letter written with the view of carrying out the Governor General's intentions?—I think not.

6484. It certainly does not. Your letter of the 28th of June in the confidential appendix cannot be an answer to the Governor General's letter of the 22d, because it could not have arrived at Poona at that time?—No.

6485. Will you kindly tell us whether that letter of the 22d of June was ever answered?—I will look through the papers and see, but unless it is specified in some of the letters I conclude that it is not answered.

6486. I will tell you how I think that you fancied that you answered that letter, but I may be wrong. If you turn to page 9, in which is the letter from Mr. Lushington to the secretary of the Government of Bombay of the 13th of January 1866, and if you look at paragraph 5 you will find these words:—"But as the Government of India was subsequently assured, from a copy of a despatch addressed by your Government to the Secretary of State, No. 12, dated 8th July 1865, forwarded with your letter, No. 619, dated 10th July," (which I cannot find,) "that the liabilities of the bank, though unusually large, were not likely to result in heavy loss, and that its difficulties were for the most part of a temporary character, his Excellency in council was unwilling to press for an immediate inquiry, which might have given rise to unfounded alarm, and impaired the credit of the establishment. Six months have now elapsed since the critical state of the bank called for the assistance of this Government as before mentioned, yet no substantial improvement seems to have taken place, either in the condition of its affairs or its management." Is it not clear from that letter that what you did was to send the letter which you addressed to the Secretary of State of the 8th of July, which you will find at page 3 of the Blue Book, to the Governor General?—Yes, I may mention that every letter to the Secretary of State must have gone to the Governor General, that is to say, a copy of it.

6487. Have you a copy of that letter of the 10th of July 1865, enclosing this letter to the Secretary of State?—No, I have looked for it, and have not been able to trace a copy as yet.

6488. I suppose that it was merely a formal cover?—I cannot tell.

6490. You observe that this letter to the Secretary of State of the 8th July 1865, enclosing, as it seems, the report of the Government directors of the 30th June 1865, does not contain any answer to six out of the seven inquiries of the Governor-General in his letter of the 22d June 1865?—That is quite clear from a comparison of the letters now. At the time I feel assured that we were under the impression that we had obtained all the information which could be obtained upon the subject which was desired by the Government of India, and that we had given it to the Secretary of State, and to the Government of India.

6491. You gave the Secretary of State all that he asked for; he only asked about shares?—We gave as we considered all the information which could possibly be given. I draw that distinction, because from the first it appeared to me that there was a difference between the view which the Government of India took, and the view which I at the time took, regarding the amount of information which could be given, in the form required by the Government of India, while the bank was active and existing as a bank still doing business.

6492. Did you at this early period object to give an answer to these other six questions?—It did not occur to me at the time when this letter was received; it struck me that the Government of India had asked for more than it was possible to give while the bank was doing business, but I felt no doubt that the very full information which it seemed to me that we had given to the Secretary of State, and which was contained in the report of the Government directors, would satisfy the Government of India as far as it was possible, and that if we did not satisfy them we should have an immediate reply, pointing out what further was required.

6494. Had you not a letter in writing from the secretary of the bank before you, telling you that more had been advanced at that time?—Certainly not. Do I understand the question aright? Does it mean that at the time when we were satisfied with the information given in paragraph 4 we had reason to know that the information was inaccurate?

6495. Yes.—Certainly not.

6496. Did not you receive that letter on the 11th May 1865 from Mr. Chapman, and did it not inclose this letter from Mr. Robertson (handing Exhibit A. 155 to the witness)?—Mr. Robertson says, "Besides the above we hold a considerable number of Back Bay shares, which we took into safe custody from those names who have large loans from the bank on personal security, men such as Byramjee Hormusjee Cama, Cursetjee Furdoonjee, and Kursondass Madhowdass. These loans were not nominally granted on shares, but it was thought well to have some security collaterally, independent of their personal standing. Several of these large loans Premchund tells me will be paid up very soon?"—I certainly did not understand that that involved any inaccuracy in the information received.

6497. It amounts to this, that there were 80 Back Bay shares of Kursondass Madhowdass, and that there were others, making the whole number 154 Back Bay shares instead of 39?—That is apparent now; the question is, what would have been apparent then.

6498. I think that it was apparent then. Mr. Robertson's letter shows it to you. The shares were taken upon the express understanding that they were to be security for those loans?—Yes, but the loans had been given on other security.

6499. But the money was advanced upon the security of those shares?—That was not apparent to us at the time, and I feel sure that it never struck Mr. Chapman in that way.

6500. He could not explain it, certainly, when we asked him about it. Here is Mr. Robertson's letter which shows the practice, and that there were other shares?—I daresay that they had been doing it, but we had no reason whatever, so far as I can see, to believe that the official statement in paragraph 4 of the Government directors' report of the 30th June 1865 was inaccurate.

6501. I do not suppose that you deliberately misstated the thing, but was not that letter sufficient to have put you on inquiry, and ought you not to have discovered the real state of the thing?—That is a matter of opinion. There are a great many things (this is not the only one) which I ought to have known, if I had taken more pains to inquire.

6502. Again, the Government directors say, "The above shares were taken as collateral security." I want to know exactly what you understand by that. You repeat it in your letter to the Secretary of State, I think?—I thought that I had explained it before, namely, that there seemed to me to be a substantial difference between advances when the shares were original security, and advances when they were collateral security. A large loan is due from a man to whom money has been advanced, and you become anxious for the payment of your loan, and believing that you will improve your security, you take over the shares.

6503. That would have been better expressed by the words "further security." Did you at that time ask yourself this question, to what the shares were collateral?—I understood it in the sense which I have explained.

6505. Did you ever ask what security?—Certainly not. I was satisfied with the belief that these shares were taken as a further security upon money which had been advanced, and regarding the repayment of which the directors were getting anxious.

6506. Were you aware at that time that the directors were in the habit of advancing sums of money to a single person upon a mere promissory note, without other security?—Certainly not.

6507. Then it is said in the Government directors' report, "All advances of this description have for some time past been discontinued." What was your understanding of that expression?—The plain meaning deduced from it, namely, that advances of this description had for some time past been discontinued.

6508. Could you have understood that they had been discontinued for twenty days, and would that have satisfied you?—I cannot speak to the particular period.

6509. That is the explanation which we have received. We found that there were these advances on shares in May and June, and when we put that before the directors, they said that they meant that there had been none since the 10th of June?—My impression was that the warning which I had communicated to the Government directors, through Mr. Chapman, had led to the discontinuance of the practice.

6510. This report of the Government directors was enclosed in a letter to the Secretary of State, that is at page 3 of the Blue Book. In the second paragraph you say, "A note showing the latest market value of the securities referred to is also annexed. There can be little doubt that their value will speedily improve, but to what extent no judgment can be formed till the present crisis is over." Upon what authority did you make that statement?—On the general impression that we had seen the worst of the crisis, and that matters must improve.

6511. In paragraph 4 it is stated, "You will observe that the current rumours as to the extent of advances on Back Bay shares were much exaggerated."—Yes.

6512. With the light which you have now, was that the case?—I should say not; but the statement was made in all good faith, according to the best information which we had at the time.

6513. You say in the next paragraph, "We will reserve our opinion as to the conduct of the elected directors of the bank, till we are in possession of the more complete information regarding the management of the bank during the past year, which we expect will be supplied by the promised report of the Government directors, merely observing at present, that we do not find any evidence of undue favour shown to any particular interest in making these advances." What report do you refer to there?—I will see whether I can find that out.

6514. We have a report of the 31st of March 1866; that was not the one which you referred to, because it was made in reference to another letter of the Governor General's.—Yes.

6515. Had you then the intention of complying with the request of the Governor General in his letter of the 22d of June 1865?—I think it probable that this report, which we forwarded, was one in reply to a call which we had made upon the letter of the Secretary of State, and that we expected a second report upon the letter from the Government of India, and that that is what we referred to; but that is a mere probability.

6516. You never obtained that report?—I think that there was a report, which we considered was equivalent to it, from Mr. Harrison.

6517. That was long afterwards; that was after your second report. I suspect that what was passing through your mind was that you did intend to answer that letter then. Then again look at paragraph 10 of the same despatch:—"At present all monetary affairs in Bombay are in such an uncertain state that it is not likely the Government directors will be able for another fortnight, or three weeks, to form any reliable estimate as to the probable ultimate losses which will fall on the bank."—Yes.

6518. That report seems never to have been made?—Not within a fortnight. I should mention that I have a very distinct recollection that at this time the crisis was so much prolonged beyond what anybody expected, that we put off from day to day pressing for reports as to what was the then value of securities, because we were assured that it was impossible to state what the ultimate out-turn was likely to be.

6519. My own impression after a careful study of these papers is, that this letter of the 22d of June was never answered, except by sending the Governor General a copy of the letter of the 8th of July, and the enclosure of the report of the 30th of June.—Is the letter which was not answered dated the 29th of June?

6520. No, I refer to the letter of the 22d of June of the Governor General at page 2. That letter was never answered, except by sending to the Governor-General the letter to the Secretary of State of the 8th of July, enclosing in it the report of the 30th of June?—I will see whether I can find any answer.

6522. I have no doubt that they did attempt to do so at that time, but why should you say, "the more prudent procedure which has lately characterized the management of the bank?"—Because we believed that there had been imprudent procedure before.

6523. Did you think that there was any great amendment, are you aware of any change in the system?—The change to which I refer was in this way; when Mr. Chapman became secretary to Government, and ex-officio director of the bank, I had a great deal of conversation with him on the bank question. He was new to the work, and had had no previous practical experience whatever to guide him. He was at that time living with Mr. Ellis, a member of council, who had been, as I understood, an extremely efficient director of the bank in very safe times, and I recollect suggesting to Mr. Chapman that Mr. Ellis would give him excellent advice as to his duties as Government director. He then informed me of what I became aware of for the first time, that the old rules which Mr. Ellis had always, until he became a member of the Government, supposed to be still in force, namely, the byelaws of the bank, had been very much changed, and that they no longer afforded the same security which they did in Mr. Ellis's time. Upon that Mr. Chapman paid particular attention to his duties as bank director, and informed himself, as far as he could, of what was going on. He communicated to me from time to time, and I felt a conviction that both he and Mr. Lushington were exerting themselves, and exerting themselves with effect, with the aid of the new directors. The directors had been very much changed in the preceding few months, and I felt that they had been exerting themselves with very good effect to introduce a new system of management.

Before we leave that subject, may I ask your attention to my letters (in what is called the confidential appendix) of the 10th of June and the 15th of June, to the Governor General, and to the postscript at page 8. "I write in this form to avoid, as far as possible, the risk of the very serious state of affairs becoming prematurely known, but you will, I trust, deal with what I have written as though it were officially before you. Mr. Ellis, the only other member of Government now in the country, has gone carefully into the question, and agrees with me that there is no other apparent means to prevent the bank stopping, and to avert the consequent public bankruptcy, but to advance in case of need to the extent and in the manner above described." I considered that in these letters had put the Governor General in possession of a very considerable amount of information.

6524. This letter of the 15th of June is all about the currency, it does not answer his questions at all.—Possibly not because there were many of those questions which it appeared to me could not be answered in the form in which the Governor General asked them.

6525. You did not answer the letter of the 22d of June, except by sending the letter to the Secretary of State and its enclosure?—Yes, and by writing in this form.

6526. But I do not see that it answered the questions. There is also paragraph 11 of the Secretary of State's letter to you of the 8th of September 1865, at page 8 of the Blue Book, "But above all, it should be the care of the Government directors to watch very closely the proceedings of the bank, in order, so far as their influence extends, to prevent any repetition of imprudent management; and any disposition on the part of their colleagues to depart from sound principles should be forthwith communicated to you, in order that you may take such measures as may seem to you to be necessary in reference thereto."—Yes.

6527. Did you issue any instructions to the Government directors upon the receipt of that letter?—This letter came in the course of business into the hands of one of the Government directors; and I have no doubt that it was seen by the others. I cannot be sure of that.

6528. Did you issue any instructions to the Government directors on the receipt of that letter?—Not special instructions.

6529. Then comes the letter of the 13th of January 1866 to you at page 9, paragraph 4, in which the Governor General says, "The Governor General in council, in giving sanction to the exceptional support thus accorded by the Government of Bombay, was actuated by the consideration of the novel and extraordinary impulse imparted to commercial enterprise during the preceding year, and of the confusion which had arisen from the sudden cessation and collapse of speculations which had been entered into without regard either to commercial prudence or responsibility. Under these circumstances the Governor General in council urged upon the Government of Bombay the expediency of immediately instituting an investigation into the affairs of the bank, in my letter No. 958, dated 22d June last. But as the Government of India was subsequently assured, from a copy of a despatch addressed by your Government to the Secretary of State, No. 12, dated 8th July 1865, forwarded with your letter, No. 619, dated 10th July, that the liabilities of the bank, though unusually large, were not likely to result in heavy loss, and that its difficulties were for the most part of a temporary character, his Excellency in council was unwilling to press for an immediate inquiry, which might have given rise to unfounded alarm, and impaired the credit of the establishment. Six months have now elapsed since the critical state of the bank called for the assistance of this Government as before mentioned, yet no substantial improvement seems to have taken place either in the condition of its affairs or its management, notwithstanding the great demand in Bombay;" and so on.

Then paragraph 10 is, "On a full consideration of all these circumstances, and with special advertence to the Secretary of State's financial despatch of 2d June," (that is the letter on the first page of the Blue Book,) "addressed to your Government, the Governor General in council is of opinion that an examination into the affairs of the bank should no longer be delayed, with a view to such a revision of the terms upon which its business has been, and is conducted, as may seem expedient. The Governor General in council considers that the examination should comprise an investigation, not only into the assets and floating liabilities of the bank, but into its transactions especially during the past six months. In conclusion, his Excellency in council hopes that a full report on the several matters above referred to will be furnished by your Government without unnecessary delay."—Yes.

6530. Shortly after that you received another letter from the Government of India, which is at page 10 of the Blue Book, and paragraph 4 of which is as follows, "I am desired strongly to recommend to his Excellency the Governor the adoption of similar vigilance in regard to the affairs of the Bank of Bombay, and to remark that, in the opinion of the Governor General in council, the pursuance of such a course would effectually check the recurrence of difficulties similar to those under which the Bank of Bombay has been lately struggling. Loans and other banking business would be more cautiously conducted; the purchase of bills on Calcutta would not be sanctioned when, as in a late case, every available rupee in the bank was necessary to meet local demands; and, lastly, the interest and control of the local government in the financial affairs of the presidency would be advisedly increased, to the general advantage of the state." Did you on the receipt of that letter issue any orders to the Government directors?—I have no recollection of any, beyond communicating these letters.

6532. It appears from another minute of yours to which I have not referred that you seemed to understand the Government of India as charging the Bank of Bombay with having produced the crisis of December; I do not see that.—Such was my understanding certainly at the time.

6533. At the end of paragraph 4 of the report of the 31st of March 1866 you will find the following statement, "The bank was at this epoch in no difficulty as regards its own affairs;" did not that strike you as a very strong statement?—No, it appeared to me to be borne out by the facts which were stated, that if the Government business connected with the currency had been prudently conducted, the bank itself would have been in no difficulty.

6534. The currency business is another matter. If you will look at the next paragraph but two, you will see that it says that the bank "employed its capital in a very imprudent manner, and instead of having it available in the hour of need, the great bulk of it was locked up in loans and advances to parties from whom it was hopeless to expect punctual payment."—That is quite true.

6535. Again at paragraph 14 it is stated, "On a careful review of the whole circumstances, we have come to the conclusion that the currency crisis in December last was in no way attributable to the bank or its management." (I cannot see that the Governor General ever said that it was.) "In expressing this opinion we must add, that although the position of the bank on this occasion was not one of danger as regards itself, yet it was not as strong as either the Government, or the public, had a right to expect." Then it goes on to say, "It ought not only to have been in a position of unquestionable security as regards its own affairs, but to have been able to render material and direct aid to the Government. That it was not able to do so was owing to the greater portion of its capital being unavailable in consequence of the imprudence that characterized the management prior to April last, and not in consequence of anything that subsequently took place."—Yes.

6536. I think that those statements themselves almost contradict the statement that "the bank was at this epoch in no difficulty as regards its own affairs." At that very moment, the 31st of March, I should say that more than half the capital was lost.—They were speaking of December.

6537. I do not think that you are answerable for the Government directors' reports, but I only ask you whether it did not strike you, in forwarding this report, that there was a discrepancy from the statement that the bank was in no difficulty as regarded its own affairs?—No; my impression was that the bank could just pay its way and no more.

6538. Were not you aware that the great bulk of the bank's capital "was locked up in loans and advances to parties from whom it was hopeless to expect punctual payment"?—Yes; that was the reason why the bank could not aid a large customer like the Government when it wanted assistance.

6539. The report goes on to speak, in paragraphs 6 and 7, of the reckless conduct of the directors previously to April 1865?—Yes.

6540. It says that the consequence was that the great bulk of the capital was locked up?—Yes.

6541. These statements were general and vague, but very strong. Did not you think that that was a sort of case which required some independent searching inquiry?—Decidedly; I was always of that opinion.

6542. At that time.—At that time, I considered that a most searching inquiry was required. There were two points which occurred to me upon it, namely, as to the time and as to the agency. As to the time, it appeared to me that we should only make matters much worse by attempting to make at that time such an inquiry as you have now made, into the way in which the money of the bank had been employed, and as to the agency, I felt quite convinced that we had not in Bombay the means of making a thorough and satisfactory inquiry—an inquiry which would satisfy the shareholders and satisfy the Government. I mean as a permanent and final report.

6543. Directly that the Governor General gets that statement, if you will look to pages 28 and 29 of the Blue Book, you will see the view which he takes of it; he says in his letter of the 13th of July:—"The embarrassments of the bank are wholly attributable to abuse of powers which ought not to have been conferred upon it by charter, and which are not possessed by the banks of Bengal and Madras. The Government of Bombay proposes immediately to remedy this grievous error by a legislative enactment, and this, with the recent removal by the Secretary of State of the restrictions on the qualifications for direction, which unduly narrowed the field of selection for that office, will, it is hoped, ensure sounder management in the future. But the Governor General in council observes with regret, that notwithstanding the discontinuance by the bank, for the last ten months, of business of an objectionable character, it has not yet retrieved its position, and that the recurrence of a commercial crisis has rendered it necessary for the Government of Bombay to come forward with renewed promises of aid in a telegram to the accountant general, to the following effect: 'If need require, Government authorize you to support the bank with all Government balances and other available resources.'

"The Governor General in council, though fully sharing in the desire of the Bombay Government to uphold the credit of the bank, cannot suffer the revenues of India to be indefinitely pledged to the support of an establishment of the affairs of which he is kept in ignorance. The information furnished by the report of the directors contains little more than is to be found in the general statements of assets and liabilities published in the newspapers. That there may be no further misapprehension on this subject, the statement which his Excellency the Governor General in council requires is comprised in the following particulars:—1. The banks, firms, and individuals to which the bank is under advances. 2. The dates and amounts of such advances. 3. The securities upon which they have been made, and the sums advanced upon each security." (He demands a minute inquiry.)

Then he goes on in paragraph 16 to say, "The bank should have no hesitation in furnishing these particulars, which, having regard to the peculiar circumstances at present affecting the relations of the Government of India and the bank, his Excellency the Governor General in council is bound to demand." That is the view which he took of the matter?—Yes.

6544. It does not seem to be the view which you took of it. I wish you to explain that.—There were two reasons why I did not consider that we could immediately comply with his call.

6545. I am asking you why, when you got this report of the 31st of March, you did not institute an inquiry, which I am quite surewould have frightened you in an hour?—Very possibly, if I had had nothing else to do than to go down to the bank.

6546. I did not mean to say that you yourself would have gone down, but that some really independent party should have done so.—I can only say that I looked about me on every side, and I could see nobody who was likely to do better than the Government directors and the then directors of the bank were doing, either to work the bank as it then stood, or to let us know when the time for a more searching inquiry came as to the exact losses, and the causes of them.

6547. Did it not strike you that it would be advantageous to have some outsider to look into that matter?—You will find that I mentioned that point in a letter to the Governor General. I got some excellent advice upon the subject from a perfectly independent gentleman, in a letter from Mr. Ralli, a very eminent Greek merchant, and he suggested the appointment of three competent independent gentlemen.

6548. That will come afterwards. I want you to confine yourself to the report of the 31st of March. I find that you wrote a minute upon that on the 29th of May 1866, which is at page 41. Look at paragraph 5. You there say, "The first question that suggests itself as regards that period" (that is, a period ending in April 1865) "is whether any of the ex-directors of 1864 and 1865 can be individually held responsible to Government for the bad management of the bank during that period; and here I confess I cannot see my way to any practical action. Whatever opinions we may form, either of the general management of the bank, or of the conduct of individuals, I find nothing tangible in the shape of impropriety, or illegality, which we could charge against the collective body; and, if we had, I do not see how we could fix the responsibility for it, either on the Government directors as a body, or on any one of them."

I would ask upon that whether it did not strike you that a further and more minute inquiry by some persons outside the bank itself would have detected both the impropriety and the illegality?—I had no doubt that a very searching inquiry made by persons outside the bank, with powers such as you now possess, would have elicited the entire truth; but by any sort of inquiry for which we had the means at the time, I did not see that anything could be done to fix the responsibility according to the information which I then had.

6549. Do you not think that it was taking rather a narrow view of the matter to say that the first question was as to fixing the responsibility on certain directors, was not there a very grave question as to the solvency of the bank?—I had not a doubt at that time that the bank was perfectly solvent; I was perfectly satisfied in my own mind with the estimates which we then had of the probable losses.

6550. Notwithstanding the strong language of paragraphs 6, 7, and 14 of the Government directors report?—They seemed to me to point to resources being locked up and requiring a long time to realize, but I felt that each of these successive reports, as they came in, told us the worst which we could then know, by any inquiry which we had the means at our command of making.

6551. Did it not in plain language tell you that these directors had been guilty of most extraordinary and most reckless conduct (the language which is used), and did not the propriety of some investigation as to that matter strike you?—Certainly. I never doubted that when the time came, and when the agency came, inquiry ought to be made.

6552. Looking through this minute I do not find another thing which I am surprised never struck you. Was not the conduct of the secretaries very important?—Which secretaries?

6553. Both of them; Mr. Blair and Mr. Robertson?—Certainly; at that time I had a considerable distrust of Mr. Blair's judgment and management; but I had the fullest belief in Mr. Robertson's soundness, and that he was doing his best, and had done his best. Till a period very long subsequent to this, I had not the slightest reason to suspect either of the secretaries of having forgotten what was due to the bank, or of having done less than his best, according to his ability, for the bank while he was secretary.

6554. Did not the statements in paragraphs 6, 7, and 14 of the report lead you to think that the system must be very wrong which could allow such a state of things?—Certainly.

6555. Then surely some inquiry into that system, and how far it was carried on, would have ben useful, would it not?—I can only ask the Commission to consider that when you are in the height of a storm, it is not the time to inquire whether the captain was wise in putting to sea, or whether some better seamanship might not have avoided the ship getting into danger. During the whole of the period to which this correspondence refers, the bank was in almost daily danger of breaking down altogether, and in the belief that that was as great a calamity as could be added to those which had already overtaken the place, I considered that our chief business was to do our best to keep the bank active as a bank, and I never gave up the hope of being able to do so until just as I was leaving Bombay.

8 Dec. 1868.

6556. That is just my opinion; that you were really too sanguine, and tried to put the best face on matters too long?—It is quite possible. I can only say that I was convinced at the time that we had in the reports before us the worst which could be said of the bank, especially the report of Mr. Hunter and Mr. Harrison. There is a question connected with what the Government directors might have done, and I wish to draw your attention to the minute of Colonel Marriott. He was not a professional banker, but he had written an excellent pamphlet on the subject in the worst time of the Bombay speculation, and he seemed to me to be a man upon whom we could thoroughly rely as a man of judgment, and we put him in, but we were obliged to allow him to be superseded by an officer of whom at the time we knew nothing. I mention that merely to show that, when we did see a good man available, we did our best to get hold of him.

6557. I will call your attention to paragraph 9 of your minute, at page 42, "With the management of the bank during the difficulties between April and July 1865, I am not aware that any particular fault has been found; the course pursued by the bank was prudent and forbearing." That strikes one as a most extraordinary statement. On the 12th of April 1865, the directors passed the resolution to lend on shares which you have been yourself so much condemning.—I should have excepted that. I should probably have said "between May and June."

6558. Were you not aware that between April and July loans upon the promissory notes alone were still continued?—Certainly not. At the time when I wrote this minute, I believed that a very prudent course of management had been commenced.

6559. You were not aware that during that very time loans still continued to be made upon shares?—With the exception of what I have learned since the Commission has sat, I was not aware of it.

6560. Then you say, "A period of respite followed between July and the crisis in November and December last, and it is objected by the Government of India to the bank's management that the bank did not gather up its resources," and so on. Then you say, at the beginning of paragraph 12, "Upon the whole, I think the bank must be acquitted of any charge of mismanagement during the period in question." Are you aware that the prices of shares rose very much in August and September 1865?—I do not recollect any particular rise. We were during all that period under the impression that better times were coming, and that we had seen the worst of the crisis.

6561. Were you aware that the secretary was pressed to realize those securities, and that if he had done so the bank might then have got out with much less loss?—Certainly not. I watched the state of the market with great anxiety, and, upon the whole, my impression was that there was reason to hope that the worst of the crisis was over, and that it was wise not to press more than the bank could help, which I understood was generally the policy of the banks.

6562. Did it not occur to you that one reason for that policy might be that the secretaries and directors of banks held shares themselves largely, and did not wish to glut the market?—I had no knowledge of the kind, and I had no suspicion of it.

6563. With respect to the policy of forbearance, I suppose that you read the report of the Government directors of the 31st of March 1866 with very great care?—Yes.

6565. Then they say that 79 lacs were realized, and that 126 lacs were overdue. Did you inquire what had become of the other 116 lacs?—No.

6566. If that had been inquired into you would have found that those 116 lacs had been renewed, and that a large portion of them, though nominally current, were very much in the same position as if they had been overdue, that they were renewed over and over again, and that payment could not be got. You did not inquire as to the remaining 116 lacs, and under what circumstances they were renewed?—No, it did not strike me that there was a necessity for it.

6567. Again, at paragraph 20 of that report, at page 32, the Government directors say, "And we have reason to believe that the directors would have no objection to its being expunged," (that is, the power to advance upon shares,) "as for the last ten months this power has never been made use of." Did you inquire at all upon what authority the Government directors made these statements?—No. I concluded that they made them from the knowledge which they acquired in the bank.

6568. It did not occur to you to ask whether they had just gone to the secretary, and had got the information from him?—I made no inquiry about it, I relied upon the impression that they would make the best inquiry which they could.

6570. The report is dated the 31st of March 1866, your minute upon it is on the 29th of May, then there is a minute by Mr. Ellis, dated the 11th of June?—Yes.

6571. And then it does not go off till the 16th; there was a very considerable delay in the forwarding of that letter, was there not?—I think not an unusual delay, considering the magnitude of the question involved, and the necessity for deliberation and writing upon it.

6572. We now come to another application by the Governor-General to you for information with respect to Mr. Brown's release. The letter of the Governor-General as to that release is dated the 10th of February 1866, you will find it at page 113 of the Blue Book. "Sir, I am directed to state that the Government of India has been furnished with a copy of a letter dated 23d January 1866, from the secretary of the Bank of Bombay to the Government directors of the bank, relating to Mr. F. L. Brown's release, but that the information therein contained is not sufficient. The Governor-General in council desires to be informed precisely what securities were offered by Mr. F. L. Brown, and accepted by the bank; what was their par value and their market value at the time the loan was made to Mr. Brown; at what rate they were then valued by the bank, also what is their present value. Further, the Government desire to know what will be the precise loss on the bank's transactions with Mr. Brown. I have, &c., (signed) E. H. Lushington, secretary to the Government of India. Fort William, 10th February 1866."

It appears that the report furnished was dated 10th March 1866, and was not sent to the Government of India till the 16th March 1867, between 12 and 13 months after the inquiry?—That delay struck me, and I can only speak to the best of my recollection as to the reason of the delay. It was, as far as I recollect, this,—this case of Mr. Brown had attracted my attention before we heard from the Government of India upon the subject, and I had directed inquiry to be made as to the reason of his release, when we received the call from the Government of India. I think that we were under the impression that the Government of India had also written to the accountant-general or was in other ways making inquiry on the subject, but I kept those papers by me in my own office for some time, in the expectation of seeing an opening for further inquiry. The utmost that we could get at the time was that Mr. Brown had been pressed as far as there appeared any prospect of getting anything out of him, and that he had been let off instead of being further pushed. That seemed to me a most unsatisfactory conclusion, and I recollect hearing, in a very casual, gossiping manner, that there were reasons which had induced some of the other creditors of Mr. Brown to be more than usually forbearing in his case. I thought it possible that we might obtain some information on the subject, and I kept those papers much longer than I otherwise should have done.

6573. It is clear, as a matter of fact, that the letter was not sent until the 16th of March 1867?—Certainly; but I believe that in that case the blame of the delay rests entirely with me, as far as I can judge. The papers were with me the whole time.

6575. Did it not strike you as very singular that not a single date was given in an important paper like that?—Yes; it struck me as most unsatisfactory.

6576. Then if such was the case, why did not you have more particulars given?—I inquired what more could be learned about it, and I was answered that these very meagre facts were all which could be ascertained.

6577. The absence of dates did not strike you as a suspicious matter in a document coming from business men, about a matter of business?—No, certainly not.

6579. I must next call your attention to the Governor General's letter of the 13th of July 1866, and to paragraphs 15 and 16 of that letter, at pages 28 and 29 of the Blue Book. You will find that he demanded three things. It is said, "That there may be no further misapprehension on this subject, the statement which his Excellency the Governor General in council requires is comprised in the following particulars:—1. The banks, firms, and individuals to which the bank is under advances. 2. The dates and amounts of such advances. 3. The securities upon which they have been made, and the sums advanced upon each security. The bank should have no hesitation in furnishing these particulars, which, having regard to the peculiar circumstances at present affecting the relations of the Government of India and the bank, his Excellency the Governor General in council is bound to demand." What did you do on the receipt of that letter?—Do not the papers give information?

6581. Will you look at page 57 of the Blue Book?—Here is the first reminder of the Governor General, that is, when he had received information that the losses of the bank were 850,000*l.* In paragraph 3 of that letter he says, "In the absence of a sufficiently detailed explanation of the affairs of the bank, as required by my letter of the 13th July last, the Governor General in council is unable to form any opinion how far the directors were justified in taking such a sanguine view of their position at the end of March, and in impressing on this Government at that time that the losses of the bank were likely to be limited to so small an amount compared with that now disclosed in the half-yearly statement. The wide difference between these losses, combined with the very meagre particulars contained in the half-yearly report above noticed, justify the entertainment of grave doubts whether the position of the bank has even yet been stated as faithfully as the Government, in common with other shareholders, have a right to require. Until the Government of India are in possession of the particulars required in the 15th paragraph of my letter of July 13th, the Governor General in council will not be in a position to form a sound opinion of the position of the bank, or to arrive at any conclusion as to the future maintenance of a connexion between the Government and the bank."

Then again, on the 13th September, he says, "With reference to my letters, dated the 13th July and 23d August 1866, I am desired to inquire when Government may expect the information therein required, relative to the position of the Bombay Bank."

Then again, on the 3d of October, you will see at page 60, where he is speaking of something else which I am coming to by-and-by, that he says, "The wide discrepancy between these several estimates, framed during a period not exceeding six months, renders it more than ever necessary to insist upon the production of the detailed information which the Government of India called for in the 15th paragraph of their despatch to Bombay, dated 13th of July last, No. 1,456, but which, notwithstanding repeated reminders, has not been furnished. The Governor General in council, however, does not feel called on to publish the report of the committee. It is for the directors to afford their constituents such information as to the position of the bank as the latter may be entitled to expect. But it is the duty of the Government of India, as the largest shareholder in the bank, and as trustee of the treasury balances in their custody, to require that the full and unreserved exposition of their affairs, so repeatedly demanded, shall no longer be withheld."

Then again, on the 26th of October, the Governor General says, "Under any circumstances a new arrangement must then be made for the currency department, according to the plan now in force in Bengal. But before entering into any consideration for the disposal of the business of the general treasury, it is absolutely necessary not only that the Government of India should be in possession of the statement of the precise position of the affairs of the Bank of Bombay, which has been so repeatedly called for, but also that the Governor General in council should have time to consider the new bill," and so on.

So that you see that there were four distinct reminders. I want to know what you were doing during all that time, between the 13th of July and the 22d of October, when you did write a letter, which we have not been able to get hold of, to the Governor General?—During that time this report from Mr. Harrison's committee was made.

6582. I am prepared to take up that report. I am not going to avoid that subject; I am going fully into it by-and-by; but I want to know what answer was given to the Governor General's letter of the 13th of July?—I do not find any answer to it.

6583. Were you willing to afford that information?—Unquestionably.

6584. Then I am to understand that you did not object to furnish that information?—Not to have it furnished at the bank. What struck me in all these letters of the Government of India as a most unaccountable procedure on their part, was putting their questions in a way which apparently could only be answered by sending all the books of the bank up to Simla.

6585. Surely the replies to those three questions could have been furnished in a tabular statement, only perhaps double or treble the length of what you did send at page 96?—I would only ask you to consider the time which this statement took to prepare, and how very unsatisfactory it was after all. This was only a part of the information which was required.

6586. But it was unsatisfactory because it was a part?—Undoubtedly, that was one of the points in which it was unsatisfactory, but the requisition of the Government of India, if it had been literally fulfilled, seemed to me an utter impossibility as long as the bank was carrying on its business.

6587. Did anybody object, except yourself and the Government, to the production of those returns?—Certainly not, because we put off making the demand on the bank for the information in that particular form till we could see our way to getting it without bringing down the bank at once.

6588. Was it impossible to communicate privately to the Governor General of India such information?—I do not see how it could have been obtained. He asks for "the banks, firms, and individuals to which the bank is under advances." That would have involved a statement to be copied out and sent up to Simla of the whole business of the bank.

6589. No, it would only have contained a list of all advances. It would probably have been three or four times the length of that which you have put out, but that is all. There was such a statement made out afterwards on the 30th of June.—In what year?

6590. (Major Innes.) Periodically such a statement was in existence on the 30th of June?—All those periodical statements were sent to the Government of India as regularly as they were sent to us.

6592. I cannot conceive of anything more explicit. You have only to make a list of the names, and dates, and amounts of the advances, and then there is another table of the securities upon which they have been made, and the sums advanced upon each security. There would have been six or seven headings of a tabular statement?—It seemed to me, as far as I could judge from what knowledge I had of the subject, that this was a statement which could not possibly have been given from the bank while the bank was doing business.

6593. I suppose that that is the same proposition as was put to me the other day by Mr. Claude Erskine. He said that it would have been disloyal. Do you adopt that expression?—Certainly not.

6594. How do you believe that it would have been prejudicial to the bank?—It seemed to me that it would be suicidal.

6595. If it had been diffused to the public it might have been. If the secretary had only the ordinary intelligence of a man, he could have prepared that statement in a day, especially if he had the outstandings book, which he tells us that he had.—That was not the impression which I had at the time.

6596. Did you write a letter to the bank, and ask them whether they could furnish that information?—No, I felt convinced that if at that time we had asked for this information, and had pressed that this information should be sent to the Government of India, there would at that moment have been an end of the Bank of Bombay altogether.

6597. I believe that good would have been done by disclosing that they were perfectly insolvent.—That appears now. We had at the time reason to believe that although the bank had suffered heavy losses it was solvent, and that under the more careful management which we were satisfied was then being exercised, it might recover, and avoid all the evils of an immediate stoppage. I felt at the time that if we had frankly put this demand before the directors they would have resigned in a body, and that every firm which could do so would have withdrawn its balance, and the bank would have come to a stop at once.

6598. On what grounds should you have thought that?—On the grounds that the whole business of the bank would have been sent across to a distant authority, without the possibility of taking any precautions as to the information not being made an improper use of. I ask you to consider the case of a bank, say in Dublin, sending such information to London. This information I would beg to state I consider perfectly legitimate for Government to ask for, or for any shareholder to ask for, within the bank itself. My objection was, and is, simply to supposing that anybody can call upon a large shareholder in the bank to make use of that shareholder's position to send such information as this to an external authority, while the bank is pretending to do business.

6599. Could not you have secured freedom from publicity if you had sent the tabular statement privately and confidentially to the Governor-General?—I believe not. The Commission will see the amount which I took the trouble of writing with my own hand to the Governor-General, because I was convinced that in no other way was it possible to ensure confidence being observed.

6600. We will assume, for the purpose of argument, that you could not possibly have communicated the information privately to the Governor-General?—I do not say that it was impossible, but that there would have been a very serious risk; such a risk as, if I had been a merchant, would have induced me instantly to have withdrawn my balance from a bank which permitted such a thing.

6601. Supposing that the information as to these advances had been prepared in this way, disclosing the names of all persons whose bills were overdue alone, there would have been no impropriety in that, would there?—I have no doubt that we might have got a great deal of useful information.

6602. Would there have been any impropriety in sending a list of all advances overdue, mentioning the names of the parties?—I conceive that there would. I am not a banker, but I consider that there is a clear and unmistakeable distinction between what you may do as a banker doing business, and encouraging people to entrust their affairs to you, and that which you have a right to do when you are investigating the affairs of an insolvent company; that in one case you may very properly bring all these things forward, and that in the other case you are bound to take due care that they are not imprudently published.

6603. Either the bank was solvent or it was not?—Certainly.

6604. If it was solvent what harm would such a tabular statement have done?—It would have destroyed all confidence in the management of the bank. Had I been a director of the bank myself, and had I been asked to give such a statement, I should have said, "If you require such a statement I must cease to be a director."

6605. Why?—Because I am professing that as a banker I am keeping the accounts of these people, and that I am taking due care to prevent their being made public.

6606. But has not a shareholder a right to know the affairs of the bank when they have got into such a mess as this?—At the bank certainly.

6607. But anywhere, when there is 1,190,000*l.* of losses, has he not such a right?—I consider that his right consists in going to a meeting of the bank, and insisting upon any information which the bank can give him at the bank, that is, while the bank is doing business.

6608. But as I understand you, you were representing the Government, and not the bank?—Certainly.

6609. Was not it your duty to try and get such information as you could?—Certainly.

6610. The bank made no objection to produce this account. When the Governor-General of India wanted to get these statements, and pressed for them (and their importance cannot be exaggerated), why did you not carry out his instructions?—For the reasons which I have given.

6611. Because you felt for the bank?—Because I felt for the honour of the Government. I did not consider that a Government could with honour make a demand which individual members of that Government would feel that they broke trust if they complied with.

6612. How could they break any trust? It would be for the bank to refuse information, and not for you to suggest that the bank would refuse it, or that you would not ask for it; there would surely be no harm in seeking to get the information?—There is harm, I believe, in making a demand which ought not to be complied with. I would ask you to read what I wrote on the 22d of June to the Governor-General. You will find it at page 20 of the confidential appendix. (Exhibit A. 188.) On the 22d of June 1866 I said to him, "You ought ere this to have received a great mass of official papers about the bank, and my letter of the 15th will have briefly stated how we stand, and what are my own views. I really do not know what more we can send you, but if you will specify the information you require it shall be sent. You can have daily returns of the bank's state, such as we ourselves receive by post. But reaching you by post at least a week or more after date, they will be of no practical use to enable you to advise, assist, or control our bank management. A run would have broken the bank, or been successfully met, before the letter was half way to you."

6613. The Governor General specified what he wanted, and he wrote you four reminders, each stronger than the other, saying, "I want this information," and instead of applying to the bank for that information you chose to assume that the bank would not give it; I doubt whether they would have refused to give it?—Had I been a director I should have said, "I am ready to do my best to make any inquiry you please within the bank; but while I call myself a director of this bank, and while I encourage people to bring as much business as they can to it, I will not be a party to sending these details away, when it is not known what use will be made of them."

6614. It strikes me that there is a great fallacy in that; that is to say, in your putting yourself into the position of a director of the bank, whereas you were in the position of a shareholder.—My feeling was that an inquiry of that sort ought to be deferred until we could obtain the means of making it in the bank itself, or that it should be deferred till after the bank had come to a stop, and it could be made by outsiders. That was the view which I repeatedly pressed upon the Governor General; it was suggested upon more than one of the committees of inquiry, namely, that any further inquiry should be made by an outside authority; and I did the best that I could to induce the Governor General to send such an authority to inquire into the bank's position.

6615. It appears that you did write a letter on the 22d of October; that was the first letter which you wrote to the Governor General after the third reminder. Can you say how it comes to pass that this letter of yours of the 22d of October, which we are told contained your reasons for refusing this information, is omitted from both the Blue Book, and the confidential appendix?—I am not aware what letter you refer to.

6616. It is a letter of the 22d of October. I understand that in that letter you stated your reasons for objecting to the production of this information?—Very possibly.

6617. Were those objections the same in substance as you have urged before us?—I cannot say how far they were a full statement of what I have now urged without having the letter before me. I cannot say why it is not before you, but all that I can state is, that in so much as I was able to write officially, and in what I wrote demi-officially to the Governor General, I stated the matter as clearly as I could. Looking over the letters now, I think that I might have made my case stronger and more intelligible, but I did my best to place before him the difficulty which we were under. It appeared to me that the same authorities could not have been reading and considering my private letters and these official letters; otherwise it seemed to me inexplicable that all that I urged should have remained unnoticed.

6619. What was your real object in not giving that information? Was it really simply the feeling that you hoped that the bank would come round, and that then all this would be unnecessary, or what?—No, we always intended that every information of this kind should be given as soon as we were in smooth water, and assoon as we had the means of getting at the truth. The Commission has found how difficult it is really to get at the bottom of these transactions. I had no suspicion at the time that matters were as bad as they have turned out to be, but I saw quite enough to assure me that it was very improbable that we should get what I could feel was a finally satisfactory statement on the subject, and I had the feeling that to make the demand then upon overworked directors, who were doing their best to bring the bank round, could only end in their all throwing up.

6620. I assure you that that list of outstandings was actually made by that time, and was before the directors, and only had to be copied, and the current bills had to be added to it. I do not think that it would have taken two days of Mr. Robertson's time to have written it with his own hand.—If I had been aware of that fact at the time, I possibly should have put the question direct, but it would not have affected my objection to sending away this information while the bank was still encouraging customers to send business to it.

6621. I will now come to the tabular statement at page 96. Did you in any way consider the heading of that tabular statement? We have found out that it is the production of Mr. Claude Erskine; but did you ever consider that heading, and how skilfully it was framed, so as to exclude almost all valuable information up to that date?—No; the intention with which it was framed was to give as much information as could be given bearing on these points.

6622. In the first place the names were not given?—They were intentionally not given.

6624. I will put this case. Suppose that a bank in Liverpool was in the same position as the Bank of Bombay, and that the question was, "Shall we close our doors?" They would send up probably just such a statement as that to a first-rate man, either a first-rate lawyer or a first-rate actuary, or some person who could be relied upon afterwards, and could be cited as a good authority for the step which had been taken both to the shareholders and to others. Would there be any difficulty in sending such a statement of their position?—I speak of course with very little knowledge of what is the practice in such cases, but I imagine that what would be done, would be, to send such a statement as could be prepared without names.

6625. Even without names this tabular statement is confined to sums above three lacs, and as the Governor-General very properly says, at page 102, the sums below three lacs may aggregate to a great deal more than those above three lacs. Then the statement is not given up to date, but up to the 30th of June 1866, which was almost five months before?—Yes, but there is a reason for that.

6626. You only sent for it on the 24th of October, and it was sent back on the 23d of November?—But there was some special reason.

6627. I do not know when Mr. Claude Erskine drew that form, but you only sent for the statement on the 24th of October. Did you really consider what this tabular statement was? "Sums overdue on the 30th of June." You must have known at that time of Premchund's loan?—Yes.

6628. Did you look through it and see whether you could find Premchund's loan of 25 lacs there?—No, I did not look at it particularly. I will explain why I did not feel so uneasy about Premchund's loan.

6629. It is excluded, because it had not been overdue at the 30th of June, but at the date of this tabular statement he had gone into liquidation, and the same was the case with the Asiatic Bank.—This statement was not intended to be a complete answer.

6630. It was perfectly illusory, and gave no real idea of the position of the bank.—The aggregate gave me an impression that the bank was very much worse off than we had anticipated.

6631. As a summary of your evidence upon this correspondence, it appears to me, after looking through this correspondence with the Governor-General, that the first letter of the 22d of June 1865, making seven different inquiries, was never answered, except by sending a copy of your letter to the Secretary of State, and the report of the Government directors upon one branch of their inquiry, namely, the advances on shares. Is not that so?—Apparently it is.

6632. The Governor-General's second application of the 13th of January 1866 was not answered for more than five months?—Yes.

6633. His application with respect to Mr. Brown's loans was not answered for between 12 and 13 months?—Yes.

6636. Casting about for reasons why you did not comply with the Governor-General's request, I want to ask you two or three questions. Were you annoyed and anxious on that account to conceal, or not to divulge, the bad management of the bank?—Certainly not; I felt convinced that, when the inquiry which must come some day was made, even my anticipations, which were then gloomy enough, would probably turn out to be less serious than the result. I had no sort of wish to evade compliance with the Governor-General's wishes for a most complete investigation. I only wished that the investigation should be deferred till it could be made without bringing down the bank at once, and with a chance of really getting at the truth. I could not give a better proof of the spirit in which I wished the inquiry to be made than by a dissent which I recorded upon the original instructions which were given to the Commission by the Secretary of State. In that dissent I pointed out that the original instructions which prohibited inquiry in this country could not possibly fulfil the object of a complete inquiry, and so it proved very shortly afterwards.

6637. There is one other ground which I wish to put to you—was this reticence on your part in any way attributable to annoyance at being interfered with in the management?—Not that I am aware of. I cannot give a better statement of the spirit in which I viewed these matters than by referring to almost the last letter which I wrote, and which is in the confidential appendix. Sir B. Frere.

6638. (President.) Are you prepared to produce the documents for which you were asked at the last sitting of the Commission?—Before entering upon that point, I would ask you to allow me to add something to the evidence which I gave to you at your last sitting on the subject of the delay in complying with the orders of the Government of India as to supplying information regarding the state of the bank. You concluded your examination by a sort of summary of your impressions, as I understood them, regarding the cause of the delay, and the numerous calls which had been made, and the way in which they had not been complied with, and by one or two questions which implied an impression that the information was not communicated owing to some pique, or want of desire to communicate it.

6639. It was not exactly that; but I was at a loss to know why it was not communicated, and two or three grounds suggested themselves to my mind. One was that you perhaps did not like to expose the bad management of the bank; and another was that you might be a little piqued at the interference.—I have made use of the interval since the last sitting, to look at the documents which have been printed, and which are otherwise before the Commission, and to endeavour to explain that point. I am under some difficulty, because, without the original papers which came before the Government of Bombay, it is extremely difficult to say why this was delayed, and why that was delayed, and why another thing was not done; and in merely taking the printed documents from the Blue Book, I am at a very great disadvantage in explaining delays, and also in explaining what was being done between the dates of these letters.

But I think that I shall be able to satisfy you from the documents themselves (as I have now looked over them) in a very few minutes, if you will allow me to go into the point, that the Government of Bombay wished to give the fullest possible information regarding the past history of the bank, and regarding its then existent condition; but that in the first place we did not think it possible to give that information in the way, and at the time, that it was called for by the Government of India, by sending the details of the bank's management away from the bank to the other side of India; that, secondly, we considered that an inquiry by external agency, and with further powers of investigation than we possessed, was absolutely necessary for this purpose; and that, thirdly, we did our best to explain this point to the Government of India, and that the delay was solely attributable to the unexpected prolongation of the commercial crisis.

I would ask the Commission first of all to look at the Blue Book, page 32, paragraph 18 in the Government Directors' Report, from which the Commission will see that as far back as the 31st of March 1866 these gentleman, in whom we had at that time, and we have now, every reason to repose the fullest confidence, stated the matter distinctly in the following terms:—"If any investigation in addition to that recently made by the auditors appointed by the shareholders is deemed necessary, we would suggest that it be conducted by competent accountants, wholly unconnected with the past and present management" (it must be remembered that such accountants were not then to be found in Bombay), "especially if such investigation is to have for its object how far each individual director, whether official or elected, is responsible for the losses that have been sustained. We have reason to believe that the present directors would have no objection to this course being adopted solely for the information of Government, and that they court the fullest inquiry into the report of the auditors appointed by the shareholders." Now I would beg the Commission to observe that that was stated on the 31st of March 1866.

6640. By the Government directors? — By the Government directors; and that we implicitly and expressly concurred in that opinion, and that it was without unreasonable delay laid before the Secretary of State, and the Government of India.

6641. Where did you concur in it?—We laid it before the Government of India, with Mr. King's letter of the 16th of June 1866, which you will find at page 30. Among the accompaniments to that letter, along with this report, was my minute of the 29th of May 1866. The whole tenor of that minute, which is not a short one, is one of reference to this report.

6642. I have read it very often, but I do not at present recollect anything in which you endorse that suggestion.—I will come to that afterwards; but I would beg the Commission's attention particularly to that minute, from paragraph 19 to the end, in which I tried to picture as clearly as I could, the anomalous position, as I said, in which the Bank of Bombay was placed, with numerous governing powers, some on the spot, and some at a distance, and influenced in a great variety of ways. I would beg the careful attention of the Commission to that opinion which I gave, and more particularly to the practical results which are indicated by the facts in the last paragraph.

6643. That is all about the amalgamation?—Yes; but it is also to the effect that the account and financial departments should as speedily as possible come to the place where the mischief was going on, and where, as I have repeatedly laid before the Government of India in various forms, the money market is larger and more sensitive than in any other part of India.

I would ask the attention of the Commission also to the first paragraph of Mr. Ellis's minute of 11th June 1866, in which he says:—"The report of the official directors, Messrs. Chapman and Norman, seems to me to set forth clearly and fairly the causes which have led to the present position of the bank; and I would refer the Government of India, and Her Majesty's Secretary of State, to that report." Nothing could express more unqualified concurrence, I think, as to Mr. Ellis's opinion. These, I think, were the papers which Mr. Erskine did not see at length, before they were sent to the Government of India. I see that some questions have been addressed to Mr. Erskine on that subject, and I know that he was unable to account for his not having given an opinion upon it.

6644. He said that he had gone to Poona.—That was his impression, but I find that there is a minute, which is not in the Blue Book, which states that before he had time to go over this question, (it being one which would occupy some time,) the papers had been called for by telegram from the Government of India, which, I trust, will exonerate Mr. Erskine, at all events, from any want of care in giving an opinion on this important subject. There is another point to which I wish to allude. I would ask the particular attention of the Commission to page 58 of the Blue Book.

6645. That is the report of the Committee. That is the next point into which I am going.—I will revert to it afterwards if you will permit me; but I would only wish to place my statement succinctly before you. I should wish to condense as much as possible what I have to say on the very grave insinuation of our having either from temper, or from indisposition, neglected to do what the Government of India ordered us to do. I will not go into the details of that report, but I will only ask you to consider the circumstances under which it was made.

6646. We shall ask you fully as to that subject.—On the 8th of September 1866 these gentlemen reported, and I would ask you especially to note what they say from the second to the fifth paragraphs of their report. They say, "We are of opinion that the statement affords proof of the fairness and care with which you estimated" (that is, the chairman and the directors) "the position of the bank at the close of the last half year. We regret, however, to have to state that a large addition must be made to the estimate of the loss incurred by the bank. During the past two months the shares of certain joint stock companies, held as security for advances, have fallen in value, and in many cases of claims from insolvent estates, the probability of a favourable return has greatly diminished. We have taken the joint stock shares at present market rates, many of which must be considered unduly depressed. The returns from insolvent and other estates have been taken at low estimates, and we hope that eventually the amount realized may prove considerably larger than that at which we have placed it." Now, I would ask the Commission to consider who were the gentlemen who made that report.

6647. We are going into that subject. You must not suppose that I am going to exclude such an important subject as that. I have full notes of it to examine you upon it.—I have one particular object in view, which is to exonerate the Government over which I had the honour to preside from a very serious imputation.

6648. You will have the opportunity.—If you find that what I say now will obviate the necessity of saying anything upon the point hereafter, perhaps you will permit me to speak upon it now.

6649. If you like to do it now, do so; take your own course.—You have noted the quotation of the second, third, fourth, and fifth paragraphs of that report?

6650. Yes, I have them marked.—The first point which I would ask the Commission to consider is, why these three gentlemen were selected? Mr. Hunter, whose name stands first on the list, was, I believe, at that time one of the merchants who in general estimation stood highest, as belonging to a perfectly solvent house, and a man who had abstained from all speculation in shares. The Commission is a better judge than I could be, even now, how far that general opinion was borne out by the facts. I merely mention it as the ground at the time which induced me to select him.

Mr. Harrison was a gentleman who belonged to the account department of the Government of India, and then stood, I believe, if not at the head, very nearly at the head of that department.

Dinshaw Manockjee was a native gentleman, supposed to be of very great wealth and very good credit, and he was also supposed to be remarkably free from share speculations. That likewise is a point, regarding the soundness of our judgment, upon which the Commission will be able to form their own opinion.

I find on looking at an abstract of the proceedings of the Government of Bombay, in the Financial Department, in August 1866, that there is a letter from the officiating deputy secretary of the Bank of Bombay, dated August 21st, 1866, requesting that, "as the two gentlemen (the Honourable A. J. Hunter and Mr. Dinshaw Manockjee) proposed by the directors to be members of the committee for examining the valuation of the assets of the bank have consented to act, he may be informed when the gentleman nominated by Government will find it convenient to act, so that timely arrangement may be made with the directors' nominees." Then there is the following resolution: "The secretary and treasurer Bank of Bombay to be informed that his Excellency the Governor in Council has, with the consent of the Government of India, appointed Mr. E. F. Harrison, of the Bengal Civil Service, to examine the assets and liabilities of the bank in company with the gentlemen appointed by the directors, and that Mr. Harrison is now in Bombay, and ready to at once commence the duty." (Exhibit marked A 182.) That shows that we had called for the consent of the Government of India, and that our selection of this gentleman was noted in that abstract which was in the same month sent to the Government of India and to the Secretary of State.

I would ask the Commission to consider, if Mr. Harrison was not competent to do what the Government of India wished, where it was possible that we could find a better man? I cannot at the present moment recall the circumstances under which Mr. Harrison was then present in Bombay, but I believe that he is now in England, and the Commission can, if they please, examine him themselves.

6651. (Major Innes.) Mr. Harrison is now the Controller General of accounts; he was employed at that time in going about in connexion with the changes which were then taking place. The gentleman to whom you allude as being in England is Mr. Richard Harrison. Mr. Edward Harrison succeeded him.—But he was, if I am not mistaken, a very eminent member of the Account Branch of the service. I would ask the Commission to consider that all this was before the Government of India, when they wrote the letters on the 3rd and the 26th of October 1866, which are to be found at pages 59 and 60 of the Blue Book. These reports were before the Government of India.

6653. But in these letters to which you refer, of the 3d and the 26th of October, the Government of India said that, notwithstanding that report, they insisted upon having that detailed statement?—Yes; and the Government of Bombay replied on the 22d of November 1866. Now I would particularly ask the Commission to consider well this letter of the Government of Bombay, because, although it is not so conclusive as I could have wished, still I think that it shows very clearly what our impression was at the time, and what we naturally expected the Government of India to do.

We acknowledged their letters, and we sent some further correspondence with the bank, asking for a renewal of their agreement, which would be a piece of incredible presumption, in my opinion, if the impression which I am now to submit to the Commission is not the just one. In the second paragraph the letter states, "His Excellency the Governor in Council is of opinion that, provided a statement that will be called for at the end of December next does not disclose a more unfavourable estimate of the losses sustained by the bank than that recently arrived at by the special committee, and provided that the resolution for reducing the nominal capital in accord with actual assets proposed at the meeting held on the 12th ultimo is confirmed by that to be assembled on 15th January next, the agreement with the bank should be renewed from the 1st March next, on the terms offered by the directors in their letter dated the 5th September last."

"With reference to the remarks contained in the second paragraph of your letter under acknowledgment, I am directed to point out that the new bill for the amendment of the bank charter was submitted for the assent of his Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General, as far back as 13th October last; that a copy of the rules now in force for the general management of the bank was furnished with the Under Secretary's letter No. 609, dated 16th June 1866; that the Government of India have already been informed of the actual present position with respect to assets and liabilities as ascertainable from the report of the special committee above referred to, and that the figured statement referred to in paragraph 9 of my letter No. 987, dated 22d ultimo, is now under preparation, and will be submitted as soon as it is received from the bank."

6654. Am I to understand that you considered that that was a compliance with the Governor General's letter?—I would submit to the Commission that that clearly shows the opinion of the Government of Bombay, as to the then position, namely, that at the end of December a statement would be called for, and if the result was not more unfavourable than that in June, and the capital was reduced, the agreement with the bank would be renewed; and the third paragraph of the letter says, in almost as distinct words as it can say it, "We consider that we have given you the information which you required, as far as we can." If the Government of India wanted more, it was merely for them to say so.

6656. He does say so in effect, at page 102 of the Blue Book, by his letter of the 9th January 1867.—I will come to that afterwards. I would ask the Commission now to refer to page 21 of what is called the Confidential Appendix (Exhibit marked A 188) and to my letter of the 10th of December 1866.

6657. You then fully realized the state of the bank. Your letter shows that.—I would especially ask attention to the fourth paragraph, in which I said, "But if any further inquest is to be held I think you had better send some one quite unconnected with Bombay, or even India, to make it."

6658. I have underscored the whole of that paragraph. You will remember that that is on the 10th of December 1866, when every shilling of the loss had been incurred.—We could not tell that at the time. We were under the delusion, which was shared by these gentlemen who had had access to the bank's books, and who had made the best estimate which they could, and they were under the impression (which I will almost immediately show you was shared by another very competent judge, who also had the very fullest opportunity of seeing what was in the bank's books) that there was a very considerable surplus.

When this letter, which the Commission appear to consider insufficient, was before the Government of India, I stated as distinctly as words could express my conviction that if any further inquest was to be made it should be done by somebody not only independent of Bombay, but of India. I go on to say, "Any further inquiry we could make here, and, I believe, any you could have made by people from Calcutta or Madras, would do nothing but tell us what is already known, and be no more productive of practical good than an inquiry into the South Sea Bubble." I would ask the Commission whether it was possible to state more conclusively than that, that we had exhausted our means of inquiry.

6659. You need not labour to establish that point at all. We are quite sure that at that time, in December 1866, you were perfectly awake to the position of the bank, and I believe that from that time to this you have been anxious to have a full investigation into the matter; but the question is, whether in the year 1865, when the first demand was made by the Government of India, and when mischief might have been prevented by an accurate inquiry, you took the right course?—I am only addressing myself, with such means as I have now before me, to that point, namely, that for nearly eight months we perseveringly or designedly put off the Government of India from getting what they wanted; and I have endeavoured to show from these letters that we considered that we were giving them every information which could be given while the storm was going on, and that we had no sort of intention of screening what had passed.

6660. Have you concluded your statement?—No; I have one more reference to make, and that is to the letter, in the same appendix, of the 23d of February 1867, in which I mentioned that shortly after Mr. Stuart's return a run had commenced on the bank. I expressed an opinion that the bank was almost irretrievably gone, but I would ask you especially to refer to paragraphs 5, 6, and 7 of the letter. I there said, "I feel great trust in Mr. Stuart. He is of the same sound school as Mr. George Dixon," and so on, and I stated that I hoped he would be able to retrieve past errors. "But your financial member of Government and all your financial advisers ought, I would respectfully submit, to know more of this very sensitive money market than they do. The place is now as big as two Glasgows. Lyons and Marseilles rolled into one would hardly equal it in either population or trade, and it is daily growing at a rate I have never seen equalled."

I would ask the Commission whether it was possible to state more conclusively than these papers which I have quoted stated, what was our impression, namely, "We have given all that we could get at, and if you want to get more you must find external agency for obtaining it."

Lastly, I would ask the Commission to refer to Mr. Stuart's letter to the Government of Bombay of the 1st of February 1867, and to his evidence at page 253 of the Indian Evidence. I do not wish to ask what is the opinion of the Commission as to Mr. Stuart's evidence, but I would venture to state my own opinion at the time, which was that it was impossible to have found a man more thoroughly determined to do his duty, and more thoroughly competent to do his duty in that respect, than Mr. Stuart was. His coming to this inquiry was not an accidental matter. He had been sent for months before, and I have not the least doubt that the knowledge that he was to supersede Mr. Robertson was one of the reasons which actuated us at the time very considerably, in not being more careful to put before the Government of India our impressions as to the difficulty of getting what they required. We expected a man who was entirely unconnected with what had passed, and who was thoroughly competent to know where to put his hand upon the information which was necessary; and I do not think that it is unreasonable or worthless evidence as to there being every disposition to comply with the desire of the Government of India, that we deferred further inquiry till Mr. Stuart came. These were points which did not suggest themselves to me till, on my return after the sitting of the Commission the day before yesterday, I again looked over this correspondence.

6661. As you have referred to that subject, before we go to the next point, I may as well conclude it by asking you a few more questions upon the same subject. Will you look at your letter of the 29th of June 1865, at page 4 of the Blue Book? I suppose that that letter was written upon the receipt of the

10 Dec. 1868.

Governor General's letter of the 22nd of June?—To what paragraph do you allude?

6662. I refer to the whole letter, signed "E. S. Chapman,' and dated "29th June 1865." Was not that letter written upon the receipt of the Governor General's letter of the 22nd of June?—You will see that it is a letter addressed to the Government directors.—Probably it was so written.

6663. Did you forward the letter of the 22nd of June with it to the Government directors? It does not refer to it at all; it is in much more general terms.—It may, or may not, show that that was a subject before them. The original letter, if you have it on any of the files, would show.

6664. We have not the original letter. We accepted the Blue Book as being so far correct. Was that letter of the 29th of June ever answered?—You mean the letter of Mr. Chapman to the Government directors?

6665. Yes.—What I should conjecture was the course of things (but it is simply a conjecture) is this: we got a despatch from the Secretary of State, which was referred by endorsement immediately to the Government directors. When that despatch got on to the Government of India, they wrote to us, and we considered that the report upon the despatch of the Secretary of State answered the letter of the Government of India. That is the only conjecture which I can make.

6666. But that does not explain this letter of the 29th of June; what was it written for?—I have no doubt that you intended to answer the letter of the 22nd of June. What was the object of this letter of the 29th of June to the Government directors?—It was to get a confidential report of the then present state of the bank.

6667. Do you take the report of the 30th of June to be an answer to that letter; it must have been written at the time?—No.

6668. Then was there any answer to that letter of the 29th of June?—I cannot trace any.

6669. Neither have we been able to trace any. I called your attention the other day, and I want to do so again, to what you say in the letter to the Secretary of State.—Might I be allowed to make one remark, namely, that in all these cases the question of whether there is an answer or not is one which can be immediately answered from the original files. Are the original files still in India?

6670. I dare say that they may be.—Then, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion, I would observe that these points, instead of being elicited merely from recollection, would be instantly and conclusively answered by a reference to the Government of Bombay. You are aware that every letter, when it comes in, shows by its endorsements, or ought to show, the exact course through which it has passed.

6671. (Major Innes.) Would not the abstracts of proceedings, which are sent both to the Secretary of State and to the Government of India, show that?—Many of them would.

6672. Would they not necessarily do so?—No, not necessarily, I think, because while I have been able to trace some documents, I have not been able to trace others.

6673. (President.) But the reason why you have not been able to trace others, I suppose, is because they have never been written?—I will mention the reason. When a letter comes in and is disposed of within a month, you can then easily trace from the abstract what has been done with it, whereas in this case probably it went on into other months, and very possibly got into a compilation which was in circulation for many months together. It would require the original documents to trace the history of any particular letters, and what pains were taken to answer it.

6674. I will call your attention to the fifth paragraph of your letter to the Secretary of State, at page 3 of the Blue Book. I want to understand your action upon this matter. This is on the 8th of July 1865. I called your attention to this point the other day. You there say, "We will reserve our opinion as to the conduct of the elected directors of the bank till we are in possession of the more complete information regarding the management of the bank during the past year, which we expect will be supplied by the promised report of the Government directors." I asked you the other day what was that report. It seems that you continued your intention to send in that report. You say, at page 9 of the Confidential Appendix, in your letter of the 22nd of June, "Meantime Chapman and Lushington are preparing a very full report, which I have no doubt will show how far their predecessors, as Government directors, were or were not to blame."—Yes.

6676. What our evidence pointed to the other day, was to show that that letter containing those inquiries was never answered, and that only one of them, namely, that relating to the shares, was ever answered.—I would remark that if the Commission would say to me, "Here is a letter with no answer, can you explain that, or can you find the answer?" I should at once say if I could trace it, "Here it is." But you could clear up such a point immediately by referring to Bombay.

6678. I do not think that the letter of the 29th of June has anything to do with the letter of the 30th of June (Mr. Chapman has said so), but the letter of the 29th of June at page 4 is inexplicable to me.—It seems to me very clear from this, either that the answer is not here, or that it has not been sent. But that could not be cleared up, unless you made a reference to the original documents.

6679. It is not of much consequence, but I just wished to ask whether there was an answer to that document?—It is quite clear, from the omission of one or two letters which are specifically mentioned by number and date, that this Blue Book cannot be considered a perfect compilation.

6680. We have telegraphed for two or three of those letters from India, and we hope that we shall get them long before we finish our report.—If the Commission would permit me, I would offer a suggestion as to the sort of question which would elicit the truth regarding this letter of the 29th of June, namely, if you directed the Government of Bombay to refer to the original files containing that letter, and to give a copy of all the endorsements on it with all notes and letters, because they must be on the original file.

6681. If that document had ever been answered, I apprehend that it would have been upon the minutes of the Bank of Bombay?—I cannot say.

6682. My colleague, Mr. Melvill, went over to the Bombay secretariat and looked through all these endorsements, but he could find no answer to this letter.—Did it appear why there was no answer?

6683. We cannot help you as to that. He went through the documents, and he found that there was no express answer.

With regard to the production of the letters which we called for, what observations have you to make?—I made a reference to Lord Halifax, whose letters have been called for, and he entirely concurred in the view which I had taken; but he considered that it was for the Commission to decide how far any paper of this sort should be made public. He said that of course it must be produced, and he asked me to reiterate my objection.

6684. Perhaps you had better read his letter.—He says, "I would ask you to reiterate your objection, saying that you beg the Commission to understand" (I am giving the substance of the letter) "that you have no objection on the score of what is contained in the letter, but that your objection is simply on the point of public policy. If they insist upon it, produce the letter in obedience to the Commission's orders."

6685. Then I do not understand that you withdraw your objection?—My objection would always remain to the production of any letter from the Secretary of State to a Governor, except for some object which the Commission, acting as a court of justice, considers adequate to overcome the objection of public policy.

6686. There are two questions more or less connected with each other, and yet in some degree distinct; there is first of all the question of law, and there is next the question of propriety. Now it may be said that as a court of law (for we have those powers) it may be sufficient for us to discuss only the question of law; but we are also a court of inquiry, and I therefore think that we may look at the case in both aspects.

As a question of law, it is no doubt perfectly clear that the communications between a Secretary of State and the officials acting under him are protected in any suit, brought even where the Secretary of State himself is a party, but it has never yet been decided that when a Secretary of State appoints a Commission, and directs that Commission to make an inquiry of this nature involving the conduct of officials, and to report thereon, it is in the power of the Secretary of State to withhold that information which can alone enable the Commission to come to a correct conclusion. It has never yet been decided that the Secretary of State has power to say, "I will show you these confidential documents" (for he has shown us documents actually confidential, with the word "confidential" stamped on them), and yet to say "I will withhold other documents," equally confidential, I dare say, but which, for some reason or other, he wishes to withhold. I think that it would be a grave question in law, which I do not wish at present to decide, and which unless I am driven to it I would rather not decide whether the Government has not abandoned the question of privilege by having gone so far as it has done, and having professed to appoint this Commission for the purpose of making a full and searching inquiry.

But I would rather put it upon another ground. I would rather not decide, as Lord Halifax wishes me to do, the question of law; I would rather appeal to the Secretary of State, and the Council with which you are connected, to decide that point; and I put it really as a question of propriety. It seems to me, that this Commission having been appointed to inquire and report as to the causes of the failure of this bank, a question necessarily involving all the officials connected with the bank, and the Government up to this moment not having attempted to conceal anything, but having shown all confidential documents, if the Government now withholds these particular documents, it must expect the Commission to conclude that these particular documents are in some way peculiarly inconvenient to be produced, and that their production is not objected to on the ground of public policy, because otherwise the production of all the other documents would have been objected to; but that it is objected to because their production may be thought damaging to the case of the Government. That may or may not be, but still, if the Government takes this line as to these particular documents, it must expect some conclusion of that sort to be drawn. And I would say that it is hardly fair to this Commission to call upon them to inquire and report as to the causes of the failure of the Bombay Bank, with which many of the officials of the Government have been connected, and yet at the same time to withhold any materials from which they might have framed that report. Of course we have no feeling or animus in the matter in the least. Our sole desire is to do justice between the parties who come before us, and we have no other object in view. And instead of calling upon me to decide this point now, I would suggest to you again to refer it to the Secretary of State, and to the Council with which you are connected, whether they would not spontaneously produce those documents.

(Sir Bartle Frere.) If the Commission will permit me, I would beg to express my entire concurrence in almost every word which has fallen from you, sir, and to say that I never considered that there was any question involved in producing papers in public, other than that of public policy, after they had been laid before the Commission, who would be the best judge of how far there was any ground of public policy involved in producing them. You will see that there could be no possible reason against their production but that of public policy; and I would only further venture to submit that this was not a question in which the present Secretary of State was concerned. These were letters which had been received from a former Secretary of State, and therefore the present Secretary of State and his council could have no possible ground for wishing them to be withheld. When you see these letters you will see that there is no other reason against their production than the general ground of public policy.

6687. I wish to know whether the objection is withdrawn; if so I shall be happy to look at the letters?—I thought that I had stated so.

6688. No; you wished me to decide whether the letters should be produced or not?—I have not the least objection to produce the letters, but I must still beg that, as regards every letter which the Commission may ask me to produce, they will consider the ground of public policy. The Secretary of State writes to the Governor in the most unreserved manner about men and measures, and I would submit to the Commission, with all respect, whether it is always a good thing in the view of public policy that such opinions so expressed should be published.

6689. I am afraid that I have not made myself understood. Nothing is more clear, and I think more sound in principle, than that the communications between the Secretary of State and the officials acting under him should be secret, and should be privileged. If it were not so, as Lord Lyndhurst well said in one case, the consequence would be that people in those positions would never write freely to each other, and that there would be such a reserve which could not but be detrimental to the public service. But this is not a case of that character. I wish to call your attention to the fact that this is a Commission appointed by the Government themselves, and that they must be taken to have intended a full and searching inquiry, and that they never gave any notice to any human being (certainly not to us) that any evidence would be withheld. If it is not a communication from the Secretary of State, I do not know how you will put it. It is not then privileged at all?—Of course.

6690. We may be wrongly informed, I cannot give you the data, but we have information that you had positive orders to pass no Bombay Act except in accordance with that of the Bank of Bengal. That may not have been conveyed to you in an official letter, but I believe that it was in a demi-official, or confidential communication.—That is not a point which I have been looking for, because, I have been under the impression that whatever the Secretary of State said on that particular point, was to precisely the same effect as what was officially on record.

6691. That is not my view. What I want is to have those demi-official papers handed in, and, of course, knowing what the nature of the circumstance is, we shall only make use of such parts of them as really apply to the case. I wish to know whether the objection is withdrawn, or whether we are called upon to decide the case?—Which objection?

6692. The objection to produce these documents?—I thought that I had made my meaning quite clear, that I have no objection to produce the documents, and, with all respect, I leave it entirely to the Commission, and have always wished to leave it to the Commission to decide, when those papers are produced, whether it is expedient that those papers should be made public.

6693. I do not know what you mean by that, unless you mean this, which I think is a reasonable proposition, namely, that we should look through these papers and only make use of such parts of them as are really applicable to the case?—Precisely.

6694. Then that we have no objection to do?—Might I ask which documents you want.

6695. I should like to have them all. I want all confidential communications which you received from the Secretary of State during the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and the first half of 1865?—These are the letters.

6696. Of course I do not wish to read anything else than what really applies to the Bank of Bombay. —The subject is mixed up more or less throughout the whole correspondence. I should be glad if the Commission would give me some indication as to date.

6698. Here is, for instance, a letter of the 18th of October 1859.—There are only one or two of that early date; you will find that they are chiefly in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, and 1866.

6700. We are not only inquiring into precise points, but we are on a general voyage of discovery. The great point which we have on our minds is that you had instructions to pass a Bombay Act, in accordance with the Act prepared for the Bank of Bengal.—If the Commission will permit me, I will make one remark. I believe that during the time that Sir Charles Wood was Secretary of State, there was hardly a mail which did not carry out to each of the Governors a letter on all subjects of interest which were before them. The amount of labour in writing those letters is something perfectly marvellous. These are the letters which he wrote during four years to one government.

6701. Will you kindly run your eye through them, and mark those passages which relate to the Bank of Bombay?—Might I add also the currency question?

6702. The currency question was before the Act 10 passed, and it was before then that the government had made up their mind that they would not allow the bank to interfere with the currency at all. —Just so; but it became mixed up with the question of the bank as connected with the transfer of the Government treasuries.

6702*a*. If you like to mark those passages, do so.— I am only anxious to give the Commission every information as easily as possible. Then may I understand that I am to produce to the Commission all those letters?

6703. If you will kindly bring us back these papers we will look through them, and I will just cast my eye over them, so as to be sure that nothing relating to the present question is omitted. We have a great number of people watching our proceedings with intense interest, and they wish to be sure that we have gone to the bottom of everything. I shall go through those papers, just running my eye over them, so as to see that there is no passage omitted with reference to the Bank of Bombay, but not with a view of reading them.—I have not the least wish to limit the Commission, or to attempt anything so foolish. My only wish is to lay before the Commission all the information which I have, and to free myself from any imputation which might afterwards remain on their minds, that I had not fully complied with their desire. Am I to understand that I am to mark anything relating to the Bank of Bombay, the transfer of the Government treasuries, and anything relating to the renewal of the agreement?

6705. (President.) I think that we will promise Lord Halifax that the extracts made shall be made by one of the Commissioners.—He has the fullest confidence in the Commissioners. He entertains a strong view as to the necessity of observing confidence in this matter, and all that he wishes is, that having expressed opinions very fully regarding men and measures in his confidential communications, he should do nothing as an ex-Secretary of State which might hamper the proceedings, or impair the confidence of those who succeed him in the government of the country.

6706. We will now proceed with the examination; and I shall take you into a matter into which you have already gone at some length, namely, the committee of Messrs. Harrison, Hunter, and Dinshaw Manockjee, but perhaps not quite so fully as I otherwise should have done.—There is one point, which is a very small one, namely, that I was away from Bombay in Scinde at the end of that year, which probably accounts partly for some slight delay.

6707. When was that?—In December 1866.

6708. But the tabular statement was sent up on the 23rd of November 1866. How was that committee appointed?—In this abstract, which I have already shown to the Commission, I have not been able to trace anything which is not dependent more or less upon my recollection. The Commission will understand that I am speaking solely from recollection. We were anxious to get, as far as possible, an unbiassed and impartial committee who would do their duty thoroughly in the matter.

6709. Then you applied to the Government of India?—We applied for the services of Mr. E. F. Harrison.

6710. By whom were the other two gentlemen, Mr. Hunter and Dinshaw Manockjee, appointed?— Mr. Hunter was, I think indicated by the Government. We had communication with some of the merchants who were supposed to be least connected with share speculations (I am not sure whether you would wish the names), and they indicated Mr. Hunter as a person who was remarkably competent, and remarkably free from connexion with share speculations, and, as far as I recollect, we communicated with Mr. Hunter. He at first pleaded difficulty on account of his own private business, and I think he also stated objections which were connected with his partners in England; objections to his undertaking any duty beyond that which was directly connected with the work of the house; but we overcame his objections when we pointed out to him that it was a matter of great public importance, and he consented to serve. In a degree, the reasons for selecting Mr. Dinshaw Manockjee were, I believe, the same.

6711. My point is this. Were they nominated by the directors of the Bank of Bombay?—It was considered that it would be more proper that they should be nominated by the directors after consultation with the Government, but that the nomination should come from the directors.

6712. Then am I to understand your evidence to be this that these two gentlemen were appointed in consultation between the Government and the directors of the Bank of Bombay?—Certainly, that is my recollection.

6713. That agrees, I think, with the evidence of Mr. F. S. Chapman. What instructions did this committee receive?—I really cannot lay my hands upon any at present.

6714. Did you lay before that committee the inquiries contained in the Governor-General's letter of the 22nd of June 1865, or the inquiries contained in the Governor-General's letter of the 13th of July 1866 ?—Those are points which I could not tell you, without looking to the documents regarding their appointment.

6715. Were the instructions which were given verbal or written ?—I really cannot tell. I might find something regarding it in the papers.

6716. Was not it simply this, that those gentlemen were told that the directors had made an estimate of the value of their securities, and that they were requested to go and see whether that estimate was correct ?—I really cannot tell without looking at any papers which there may be as to their instructions.

6717. You will see the way in which they made their report. They say, "We have the honour to state," not that they have gone into the affairs of the bank, at all, but, "that we have, in accordance with your request, examined the valuation which has been laid before us of the assets of the bank, as on the 30th June last."—Yes.

6719. Is there anything upon the face of that report to lead this Commission to think that there was any such inquiry into the position of the bank as the Governor-General required in either his letter of the 22nd of June 1865, or his letter of the 13th of July 1866 ?—There is certainly nothing of that kind in the report as far as I have read it. The only indication which I have of what their instructions may have been is this phrase in the abstract of August the 24th, that they are to examine the assets and liabilities of the bank.

6720. That is, the half-yearly statement in June. They understood that to refer to a valuation previously made; they just took this valuation of the directors, which we have been unable to get, and which the Government of India did not get at first, though they telegraphed for it, as you will see by the next page. When you first sent up the statement, and when the Government of India did not get this information, and telegraphed for it, did you send it up to them? We have never seen that valuation. We have asked for it, as well as for other valuations, but we have never been able to get that valuation.—I cannot explain its absence.

6721. Mr. Chapman and Mr. Claude Erskine and yourself put forward this report of the committee as an answer to the impression, which our examination no doubt must have conveyed to you, that there was a disinclination to furnish the Government of India with particulars. It was considered that there had been a full inquiry into the position of the bank by one of the Government officers, as shown by this report of the 8th of September. When we look at this report we see nothing as to a full inquiry into the position of the bank.—It appeared to me that when that committee was told to estimate the assets and liabilities o the bank, it was as full a di[illegible] could be given to state what was the financial position of the bank, and whether it was solvent or insolvent.

6722. This paper would hardly enable the Government to form any conclusion as to how the business of the bank had been conducted either by the secretary and directors, or as to what the nature of the reports was. What the Governor-General wanted to get was a statement which would enable him to say, "Putting my hand upon this, it shows that your bank has been conducted in a scandalous way," which he would have done if he had been furnished with it.—He had been repeatedly told so before.

6723. This report of the committee does not seem to me to convey to the Governor-General anything except a small portion of the information which he required.—Then I think, as I have before submitted, that it was for the Government of India to say, "You have mistaken our object; we want not this, but something else; and if you do not give it to us, we will send somebody else to get it for us." They had an accountant-general of their own, and a large body of officers in Bombay, with whom they were in direct communication, and from whom they received, I believe, the most minute information regarding the state of the bank. If they had the slightest reason to suppose that we were fencing with their questions, they had two courses open to them; one was to have immediately superseded the action of the Government of Bombay in the matter, and to have sent a man of their own; and the other was to have told us frankly, "You have sent us a report of Mr. Hunter and Mr. Harrison; that is not what we want, we want something else, and you must send us something else."

6724. Is not that exactly what they did ?—They did not do it in a manner intelligible to us.

6725. You sent up the report of the committee on the 19th of September 1866, with some enclosures ?—At what page is that?

Then the Governor-General answers that communication; he first of all sends by telegram for a statement of affairs, and he then answers you in a letter which states, "The directors do not concur in this estimate, grounding their dissent in the certainty of the reaction which must sooner or later succeed the present depression of commercial affairs. The probability of a reaction may be admitted; but it does not follow that the effect will be to restore in any degree the value of the securities held by the bank. On the contrary, much of this property is likely to become valueless altogether." That was really a prophecy which turned out to be correct. "The wide discrepancy between these several estimates, framed during a period not exceeding six months, renders it more that ever necessary to insist upon the production of the detailed information which the Government of India called for in the 15th paragraph of their despatch to Bombay dated the 13th of July last, No. 1456, but which, notwithstanding repeated reminders, has not yet been furnished." So that the Governor-General did say, "I am not satisfied with the report of this committee."

Then he goes on to say, "In the absence of such information the Governor-General in Council cannot concur in the entire confidence expressed by the Government of Bombay, 'that the former valuation was at the time a perfectly fair and conscientious one, nor can the Governor-General in Council appreciate the grounds upon which the Government of Bombay formed their hope that it may yet prove the more accurate estimate of the probable out-turn of the securities held. The Governor-General in Council, however, does not feel called on to publish the report of the committee," and so on. He also goes on to say, "It is the duty of the Government of India, as the largest shareholder in the bank, and as trustee of the treasury balances in their custody, to require that the full and unreserved exposition of their affairs, so repeatedly demanded, shall no longer be withheld."

Then again in the next letter, of the 26th of October, there is the same thing. The Governor-

10 Dec. 1868.

General there says, "It is absolutely necessary not only that the Government of India should be in possession of the statement of the precise position of the affairs of the Bank of Bombay, which has been so repeatedly called for, but also that the Governor-General in Council should have time to consider the new bill for the amendment of the bank charter, which has never yet been submitted."

Then when he gets your detailed statement, if you will turn to page 102, you will see that he does not express himself as satisfied with it. He says, "With regard to the statement of advances" (that is the statement at page 96), "which has been so long and repeatedly called for by this Government, I am desired to observe in the first place that, as recorded in the heading, it is a statement of sums over-due above the amount of three lacs, for which on the 30th June 1866, the Bank of Bombay was in advance by way of discount, loan, or otherwise, exclusive of loans on deposit (to the full value) of Government paper or guaranteed railway scrip, or imperishable goods. This statement cannot therefore be received as containing a full and complete account" (which was what he had asked for) "of the bank's position in regard to its advances, inasmuch as there may be many sums for which the bank is under advance below three lacs of rupees on which the bank may stand to lose as much in proportion as on larger amounts, and the aggregate of which may amount to a large sum." I suppose that he had got rather tired of trying to obtain the information which he wanted, and he went on and dealt with the statement as he could.—With regard to that I would observe that the criticism is perfectly just, but, at the time when these letters were written, Mr. John Stuart was on his way, or had arrived there (the bank were under treaty to get him), and one of the things which had impressed us at the time was, that a change in the office of secretary was imperatively necessary. I cannot state exactly at what particular period that impression was communicated to the Government, but at the very time when these letters were being written measures were being taken by the bank to obtain a secretary who would be able to give the information which was required in a trustworthy manner.

6727. You will also remark that the report of the committee contains no statement as to the amount of sums outstanding?—I have no doubt that it was a very imperfect report, looking at it by the light of the evidence now before the Commission. I can only speak, and I am only speaking now, as to what were our views at the time. I say most distinctly that we had no reason to suspect that the secretary was dealing otherwise than with perfect fairness by us.

6728. Neither does that report contain any statement of the securities. It only refers to them generally. It does not state what the securities really were, nor how much was advanced against each security, which was very important, and all of which had been asked for, by the Governor-General's letter of the 13th of July?—We were not good judges of that, and no doubt with the information now before us we should deal differently with the matter.

6729. When you got this great diversity of opinion between the committee and the directors, the impression upon the mind of the Governor-General was that it was desirable to have a fuller inquiry if possible. What was the effect upon your mind at that time?—The fact attracted my notice very strongly, and I made what inquiry I could, and I was informed (and I had no reason whatever to doubt the soundness of my information) that the crisis which had originally occasioned the shares to be taken over, instead of passing over as financial crises of the same kind had done in former years, continued and became more intense, and that what was really worth 100 rupees at the time of the first valuation was not worth more than 50 at the time of the subsequent one.

6730. It is material for you to show, if you can, that at any time in the year 1865, or in the first half year of 1866, you instituted in any way a thorough or searching inquiry into the position of the bank. As I understand your case, it is that you had not the materials for such an inquiry outside the bank. Is that the case? I want to give you an opportunity of explanation. Can you say that ever instituted any thorough and efficient inquiry into the position of the bank after May 1865, down to the first half year of 1866? After that time the mischief was done?—May I state briefly my view of the successive difficulties?

6731. Certainly. Any explanation which you like to give I wish you to give.—I will begin with the very unexpected fall in the price of cotton at the end of the American war. That occasioned the first crisis; and from that time up to the present moment a period of depression has prevailed which I believe is quite unexampled in the financial history of the world. With few exceptions every other financial crisis has passed off, within the space of a very few months. The rotten houses have been wrecked, and the sound ones have gone on with business as before. But there is this peculiarity in the financial history of Bombay, and I believe that I might say of England also, that from the end of the American war to the present time there has been a constant succession of panics and of prevailing mistrust, which, instead of allowing affairs to right themselves financially within a few months or weeks, has caused them to continue depressed for a much longer period. I believe that on former occasions such a thing as a depression of this kind enduring for a whole year has been quite unknown.

6732. Is it your meaning that you did not make an inquiry because you thought that things would look better?—We continually deferred making inquiry because we hoped that things would get better, and that we should be in smoother water.

6733. Do you not think that an inquiry, if instituted at that time, would have shown you a most defective system of management of the bank?—I am certain that it would; and looking back with the light of subsequent experience at what has passed, I feel sure that what we ought to have done, would have been to have let the bank break at once. The possibility of the bank's breaking was looked upon as an unprecedented calamity, which ought to be averted by any legitimate means at our command; but I am satisfied now that the wisest and the best course for everybody would have been to have allowed that ruin once for all to have overtaken the institution, and to have done our best to begin again.

6734. Had you any reason to suspect at that time the conduct of the secretaries? I have collected from you that you had not.—Certainly not. I made frequent inquiry in every way that I could imagine, as to the conduct of the secretary; and I may state that up to the time when I left Bombay, though I made inquiry from persons who, like directors, were suffering so much from it, and from Mr. Stuart, none of them gave me any reason to suppose that there was anything worse than extremely bad banking, and great want of judgment. I may mention that Mr. Stuart answered my inquiry with some hesitation. Within a very few days after he came he told me that had he known how bad affairs were, nothing should have induced him to come out to the bank. I put this question to him, "Do you consider from what you have seen that there is anything worse than gross mismanagement?" He paused for some time, and thought over the question, and he said, "I cannot, as at present advised, lay my finger upon anything else than extremely bad banking, and very great want of judgment."

mation which I had of anybody supposing that the Government directors had not done their duty, was when I requested Mr. Chapman to pay particular attention to the bank's proceedings, just after he joined. He then informed me that on his asking to look at some of the books, when he first went to the bank, the secretary for the time (I am not certain which of them it was) said, in rather a sarcastic manner, "We are glad to see a Government director taking an interest in the business of the bank." Mr. Chapman mentioned this casually. That was the first intimation which I ever had that anything less than a most complete devotion to their duty characterized the proceedings of the Government directors.

6736. You were not aware that the chairman attended the bank only on the day of the board meeting, and called only casually once a week or so besides to inquire? — Certainly not. The only Government director with whom I was much in communication was the Secretary to Government, Mr. Robertson, and incidentally I had a great deal of evidence to show that he paid unusual attention, and took great interest in the current duties of the bank.

6737. But he left the bank on the 12th of May 1864, when there were really no losses, when only three accounts had begun with loss. I am now speaking of Mr. Birch. You say in your letter of the 15th of June 1865, "Among the Government directors, Mr. Birch, the Accountant and Auditor General, who has just returned to England and retired from the service, had the greatest weight, and I believe he had great experience in the management of the bank at Madras, and much practical knowledge of banking affairs generally. He certainly possessed a weight among mercantile men in Bombay greater than could be due merely to his official position, and I believe Trevelyan and others who had long known him thought highly of him. Of late, I am told, he devoted himself much to the bank's affairs, rather to the prejudice of his other duties. As far as close attention to the bank went, he is not to blame; but whether he aggravated or mitigated the secretary's mismanagement I have at present no means of deciding." Where did you get that information with regard to Mr. Birch?—It was the general result of what I heard and saw.

6740. He tells us that he only went to the bank occasionally, and attended on board days. You do not know who told you all that about Mr. Birch?—It was not any one person certainly. I was always under the impression that Mr. Birch was an extremely competent, and an extremely attentive bank director.

6741. There is one question which I wish to put to you, and it is rather a material one. I do not want to make this Commission a mere vehicle of scandal, but at the same time I wish to ascertain facts. It has been very constantly put to me by the shareholders to examine certain Government officials as to their holding shares and allotments, and I have always done so, and have not spared them, so far as I can judge, when they were dealing with shares while they were directors, or before they were directors, but I have thought it irrelevant to examine them as to holding shares, except very casually, after they were directors. One director I examined very particulary in order to get out another fact, namely, that he was buying shares in the names of other people, and I carried this back to a previous time. But it has occurred to me since to ask you this question. Do you think that any Secretary to the Government, such as Mr. Robertson could in any way have affected the judgment of the Government after he left the bank? Supposing that it had been proved that he had gone very largely into speculations of any kind, was he in a position after he left the bank to operate in any way upon the Government, or upon any other person so as to injure the bank? Mr. Robertson left the bank direction on the 12th of May 1864; what was his exact position afterwards?—I should like to refer to the calendar. You allude to Mr. Robertson, the Secretary to Government?

6742. Yes. I did not wish to enter into any speculations after he left the bank, because it did not strike me that they could have affected the failure of the bank; but it afterwards occurred to me that, in the way which I have mentioned, it might be material to the inquiry. Could he in any way have influenced the conduct of the Government?—Certainly not. He went home.

6743. And then he came back again. When did he come back?—I could tell by referring to the official calendars, the service calendars.

6744. What appointment did he hold; was it that of financial secretary?—He was financial secretary originally; then he went home, and I think that he vacated his appointment by staying at home. But these are matters which I could answer decidedly and without any question, if you would allow the secretary to write to Mr. Seccombe for the dates as to Mr. Robertson.

6745. I am very anxious to get at the truth in every possible way, and I want to retrace my steps if necessary. I have refused to examine Mr. Robertson with regard to subsequent transactions, because I could not see that they had anything to do with the bank; but it occurred to me afterwards that they might have influenced you and the other members of the Government.—Most decidedly not.

6746. He was not in a position to do so?—He was not in a position to do so, as far as I recollect.

6747. (To Mr. A. D. Robertson.) At what time did you return?—I returned in May 1866; but I may be permitted to remark that I have stated to the Commission every transaction, whether in shares or anything else, in which I was concerned, both while I was a director and after I ceased to be a director, so that there is no information upon which it remains for the Commission to ask me any question.

6748. (To Sir Bartle Frere.) There is another point upon which I wish to give you an opportunity of making an explanation. What steps did you take after March 1865 to keep yourself thoroughly informed as to what was going on in the bank? As I understand the matter you were in daily communication with the Chief Secretary to Government. I refer to March 1865, when you got the first letter of Sir Charles Wood. Will you let me look at that letter now?—There are two notes, in March and in May. They are very short, and if you will allow me I will read them. On the 3d of March 1865 Sir Charles Wood writes, "I cannot help being in some alarm at the possibility of a crash in your Bombay speculations. We hear disagreeable rumours, and after the way in which they have been going on I am afraid that it is probable. Pray look after your bank and currency matters. We must stand clear; but I would send for your Government directors in the bank, and desire them to look very carefully into what the bank is doing, and to keep you informed." (Exhibit marked A 189.) Immediately on the receipt of that note I communicated its tenor to my colleagues, and to the secretaries to Government. On the 18th of May, Sir Charles Wood again wrote as follows: "Pray desire your Government directors to look after the bank's proceedings. Your advancing on shares such as you have at Bombay is contrary to banking principles; it would be contrary to the charters of the banks at Calcutta and Madras; unfortunately not so as to Bombay, but it is not the less wrong." (Exhibit marked A 190.) By the same mail Sir Charles Wood enclosed to me a copy of the letter of the Agra and Masterman's Bank, which was afterwards the subject of an official despatch.

6749. You did not minute or pass any order upon those letters?—No; they were confidential communications. I communicated their substance to every member of the Government and to the Secretaries, but I did not put anything on record.

10 Dec. 1868.

6750. We will now turn to another subject, namely, Premchund Roychund's great loan. When did you first hear of it?—It was in April 1866. I have referred to a diary which I kept at the time, and which I will produce to the Commission, if they like to have it.

6751. I should like to see it, because we had a very great difficulty in fixing Mr. Lidderdale as to date.—I think that I can explain and account for Mr. Lidderdale's difficulty.

6752. When did you first hear of that loan?—I will give you the dates from the diary.

6753. From whom did you first hear of it; from Mr. Chapman or from Mr. Lidderdale?—From Mr. Lidderdale. At that time Mr. Lidderdale was taking a considerable share in the management of the bank, and I had very great confidence in him.

6754. He was president of the bank?—Yes. The diary merely says that I saw Mr. Lidderdale on the 5th of April, on the 14th, the 21st, and the 22nd.

6755. The loan was on the 27th?—I saw him on the 28th.

6756. That was the day after the loan. Read the entry of the 28th.—"28th; Lidderdale and C. Chapman; bad accounts of the bank and commercial crisis."

6757. Is there anything on the 27th?—No.

6758. He corrected his statement, and said that he was quite sure from the people in his office that he had gone to you on the 27th, the day of the loan.—It is quite possible.

6759. Are you sure that it was not on the 27th that you saw Mr. Lidderdale?—I can only speak from the diary.

6760. Did not you see Mr. Chapman at your breakfast on the 28th?—I recollect that.

6761. You did not see Mr. Lidderdale before breakfast?—My impression is that I saw Mr. Lidderdale in the afternoon, for the first time, on this subject.

6762. And he was the first person who came to you?—Yes.

6763. Then it must have been on the 27th?—That is possible, but I have no note of it. I am speaking from recollection as to time. Regarding what passed I have a very vivid recollection, but as to dates and times, my impression is that it was in the afternoon.

6764. Then it must have been in the afternoon of the 27th, if he communicated with you first?—Then I have no note of that here.

6765. You never received visitors before breakfast, did you?—Yes. On a matter of importance I would have seen Mr. Lidderdale at any time. If you will allow me I will just mention the different dates. The diary merely says that I saw Mr. Lidderdale on the 5th of April, the 14th, the 21st, and the 22d. On the 28th of April I have a note, "Lidderdale and C. Chapman; bad accounts of the bank and commercial crisis." On the 1st of May apparently, but it is written across, so that I cannot be quite sure as to whether it is the 1st of May or the day preceding, I have, "Lidderdale, about the bank and commercial crisis."

6766. You are not able to fix the date nearer than that?—Not nearer than that.

6767. You are quite sure that it was in the afternoon that you saw him?—That is my impression.

6768. Then if it was in the afternoon it must have been on the afternoon of the 27th, the loan having been made on the morning of the 27th, or it must have been before breakfast on the morning of the 28th?—I have an impression that it was in the afternoon.

6769. Then it must have been on the 27th?—My impression is that it was at Malabar Point, for I have a very vivid recollection of whereabouts in the room we were, and my recollection is distinct regarding what passed.

6770. You contradict Mr. Lidderdale again, because he said that he went out to Parel.—He may be right.

6771. Will you state what passed?—Mr. Lidderdale said that he was sorry to give me very bad news of the state of affairs; that Premchund was in difficulties, and had informed the bank that he must stop payment if he did not get a loan to the amount of 25 lacs; that a meeting had been called of the bank directors, and of the managers of all the other banks who could attend, and that they had come to the conclusion that it was of the utmost importance that he should be supported; that they had called for statements of his affairs, and that it was the unanimous opinion of the directors of the Bank of Bombay, and of all the other bank managers who were present, that he ought to be supported, and that unless he was supported almost universal ruin would involve all the houses in Bombay. That was the substance of his communication, and he stated that they had come to the decision that the 25 lacs should be advanced.

6773. What did you understand to be Mr. Lidderdale's object in calling upon you?—I understood that he wished to inform me of a very grave circumstance which had occurred connected with the commerce of Bombay generally, and more especially with the management of the bank. Premchund occupied a position which was like nothing that I have ever seen or heard of in any other community. He was supposed to be enormously rich, and he certainly was enormously influential. He was very able, and was consulted by everybody, and during the preceding year it was supposed that he occupied a position of unparalleled security, but there was the greatest difficulty in ascertaining how he stood. It was observed, and it was a matter of continual conversation, when people were discussing the subject, that no bad news of any kind ever appeared to affect him, or to make him anxious or hurried in what he did, and he was believed to be to a great extent clear of the cotton speculations. At this particular time there had been a temporary rise, which had tempted a good many people to embark in cotton speculations, and he was supposed to be clear of the damage which the subsequent fall in cotton brought upon so many of those who had escaped the first crisis.

6774. Did Mr. Lidderdale come to you for your sanction to the loan?—I did not understand him to ask for any sanction. He communicated it as a fact, which was of great importance and interest to the Government.

6775. Did you express any approval or disapproval of the loan?—When he explained to me that the opinion of the banks represented at their meeting was unanimous as to the necessity of supporting Premchund, and that most of them were ready to join in the responsibility, I intimated that I thought that they had no other course open to them. I do not think that I said so in so many words, but certainly Mr. Lidderdale had a right to suppose that I considered the course which they had adopted the proper one under the circumstances. I may mention, if the Commission will allow me, as a reason for Mr.

Lidderdale's forgetfulness at this time, that he was extremely fatigued and worn out, apparently ; and he looked like a man who was breaking down from nervous anxiety and overwork, and he complained then and subsequently of the way in which this matter weighed upon him, and expressed his anxiety to get at the truth in the matter.

6776. Did it occur to you at that time to inquire as to the position of the bank, whether it was in a position to make so large a loan ?—I looked at the returns (I was then leaving Bombay), and I asked Mr. Lidderdale to keep me well informed of how the bank stood. He did so in several letters. My impression was that he gave me very full information.

6777. Did you consider that the bank was at that time in a position to enter into so large a loan as that ?—I was hardly in a position to judge. There is a letter of Mr. Lidderdale's of the 11th of May 1866 (see Exhibit L 1), there is one of the 22nd of May, and one of the 28th of May, and another of the 14th of June 1866.

6778. We have copies of those letters. What took place at your interview with Mr. Charles Chapman ?—Mr. Charles Chapman called on me (I am not sure whether it was the first or the second time after his arrival in Bombay), and he mentioned the circumstance of this loan ; and I think that I told him that I had heard of it from Mr. Lidderdale. I reminded him, as far as I recollect, that the business connected with the bank direction would be one of his important duties, but the greater part of our interview was taken up by my explaining to him why he had not been previously nominated a Government director.

6779. Did he ask your sanction for the transaction of the loan ?—Certainly not ; not in those terms. I discussed the matter briefly with him, and he had the same right that Mr. Lidderdale had to infer that I considered that the bank had no other course but to make the advance. I believe that I noted to him also, as I had done to Mr. Lidderdale, the two particular points which had struck me, namely, whether the loan would carry Premchund through his difficulties, and whether it was sufficiently covered. Mr. Lidderdale, I may mention, referred to the jewellery, and the landed property which had been offered in mortgage ; and, regarding that also, my impression is that he spoke, at more than one interview, of the difficulty which he had in getting at the real value. I remarked, either to him or to Mr. Chapman, that this was rather pawnbroking than banking business, but that it did not seem to me that the bank had any help for it.

6780. When you were conversing with Mr. Lidderdale and Mr. Chapman with respect to the loan to Premchund, did you consider it as a transaction accomplished, or as still in fieri ?—I considered it as still in fieri.

6781. Were you aware that the bank, shortly after this time, in the months of May and June, I believe, commenced a series of advances to the Asiatic Bank ?—As far as I recollect, my information was derived from those letters of Mr. Lidderdale.

6782. I remark that he did mention to you the making of an advance. Were you aware of the extent of that advance ?—I am not sure when I became aware of it.

6783. Did you interfere in any way with respect to that transaction ?—No.

6784. The Bank of Bombay was almost in a state of liquidation then. You were not consulted as to whether it was a prudent or wise transaction ?—No. I may mention that at that time the credit of the Asiatic Bank was supposed to stand very high, on account of the very large amount which they held of money paid by the Back Bay Reclamation Company.

6785. That was two years before. That million was paid in in the year 1864.—But I think that it was supposed to be among their assets at the time.

6786. There is one question which I feel bound to ask you, namely, whether you invested in any shares at this time ?—Certainly not.

6787. Did you enter into any speculations during this time ?—Never.

6789. We have to look next at Act 28 of 1865. Do you recollect who suggested that Act, and how it originated ?—Yes ; it was originally suggested by the then Chief Justice, Sir Matthew Sausse. I met him when we were at Mahableshwur together, and we had a good deal of talk on the subject, principally with a view to the enormous amount of bankruptcy business which was likely to come upon the High Court ; and he subsequently wrote to me an account of what was doing with regard to bringing forward a measure of the kind, which he considered would be of great value in promoting a speedy and inexpensive settlement of bankrupt estates.

6790. Was it his suggestion originally, or did it originate with the Bombay Chamber of Commerce ?—I first of all heard of it from the Chief Justice.

6791. Was his suggestion afterwards laid before the Chamber of Commerce ?—I think that it was.

6792. The Act itself was not passed by the Legislative Council of Bombay ?—I am not sure.

6793. It was, I believe, passed by the Governor General and his Council, was it not ?—I think that it was.

6794. Did you consider its provisions ?—I did as carefully as a layman could.

6795. Did you make any minute upon it ?—I do not recollect any. It is possible that I may have done so. I may mention the course which the framing of the Act took. A memorial was sent up from, I think, the mercantile body generally, asking for such an Act, and we requested (I forget whether it was done officially or not, but it was probably demi-officially) Sir Matthew Sausse to take some share in directing the framer of the Act. As far as my recollection goes, we consulted him as to the person who should be employed to frame it, but it was a matter of considerable difficulty at that time to find any competent draughtsman who was not already overwhelmed with other business ; and rather as a matter of favour, the framing of the Act was taken up by a barrister. I think that there were two who had something to do with it, but I am not sure. I know that it was made rather a matter of favour to devote the time which it required, and Sir Matthew Sausse was consulted as to the form which the draft should take. We were under the impression that it would be a very beneficial measure, and would enable the creditors of insolvent estates to get what was due to them, cheaply, quickly, and effectually ; but the working of the Act entirely disappointed all our expectations.

6796. You are aware, I suppose, that the High Court of Bombay reported afterwards against the Act ?—It very soon became apparent that the thing upon which the efficiency of the Act hinged, which was the honesty and competence of the liquidator, was a thing which could not be provided for. People were appointed liquidators who had just escaped from bankruptcy themselves, and the Act was worked in a manner entirely different from that which the framers of it intended, and it added to the misfortunes of the place instead of assisting it out of them.

6797. Are you aware that only two estates had been wound up under its provisions when we were in Bombay in September last ?—Yes ; I heard that it had been for all useful purposes almost inoperative, and had only formed a bar to more effectual proceedings, and a cloak to a great deal of malpractice.

6798. Have you read Mr. Stuart's evidence, in which he said that he found that this Act was a great bar to recovering ?—I was looking this morning at some of his evidence, but I have not read through what he said about it.

10 Dec. 1868.

6799. It appears that the real working of the system was that, no particular time being specified in the Act as necessary for the notice of a meeting, a meeting was called for an early day, and a friendly president put into the chair, it being arranged beforehand who the trustees should be; such trustees were appointed, and there was an end of the matter; there was a friendly liquidation, and no money was recovered.—I am afraid that it was so.

6800. According to the best evidence which we have had, it has operated very unfairly upon the liquidation of the bank, and that Act has since been allowed to expire?—Yes.

6801. (Major Innes.) What was the information which you thought it advisable to defer until smoother times? I understood you to say twice or thrice that there was information which you did not like to ask for then, but which you would defer until smoother times?—As I understood the letters from the Government of India, they required that we should send them a statement of every account with every firm and with every individual in the bank. To have carried out their orders literally and completely would have involved a statement of every loan which was at that time unliquidated; in fact it would have been a complete disclosure of the whole of the then existing business of the bank, and it would have shown every one who was indebted to the bank; it would have shown simply the names of the debtors and the amounts which were due, and it would have contained no sort of information with regard to the prospect of paying, so that for all useful purposes the statement would have been delusive. And on the other hand it would have shown the accounts of the honest and solvent, as well as those of the dishonest and insolvent debtors to the bank, and I understood that it would have been a very voluminous and difficult statement to have copied out; it would have had to be sent all across India, and I need not remind the Commission of the risks which there are of information so sent being made a bad use of.

My impression was that any honest and solvent merchant, who heard that his account had been treated in that way, would instantly have withdrawn his account from the bank, and that any director, with a proper sense of his obligations, who was an honest man, if it had been demanded that he should send such a statement across to the other side of India, would have thrown up his office as director. That was my impression. I now understand from the Commission that it would have been an easy statement to prepare. I can only speak to what at the time was my impression, and it appears, from one expression which I observed in Mr. Stuart's evidence, that even he did not find it so easy, when he first came to the bank, to discover what the true state of things was.

6802. That would explain why you should not give that information at all. I refer to information which you thought it advisable to defer giving then, and which I understood you to say you would not mind giving in smoother times.—I am speaking hypothetically, and therefore I fear that you cannot repose the same confidence in what I say as you would in what is matter of fact. But I will suppose that Mr. Stuart had come, and that the state of affairs was not so fatally bad as he found; I should then have asked him to draw up such a statement with the aid of the Government directors, as far as he thought that it could give useful information regarding the state of the bank, and such information as a properly-minded banker could send to a distance. I should then have submitted that to the Government of India, and should have repeated the request, which I understood had been made more than once, that if they wished for further information they should send down some person and have it got in the bank parlour.

6803. Then did you lay any objections at all before the Government of India, and ask them to modify their demand?—I do not say that I did so as distinctly as I now think desirable. I may mention that my connexion with Bombay and with the bank was brought to a close more abruptly than I expected. In the ordinary course of things I should have remained on for another year, and I had every hope that, whatever the truth was, we should learn it when Mr. Stuart came out. My impression of the bad state of affairs was darkening almost every month, but until I read the evidence which the Commission has collected, I had no idea how bad things were.

6804. Did you consult the Government directors at all upon that point?—Upon which point?

6805. Upon the point of the information for which the Government of India had asked?—I did not officially. I discussed the matter frequently, whenever I had an opportunity, with such of the Government directors as I happened to be in personal communication with; but it would be unfair to them to give them any part of the responsibility. I deliberately deferred a full compliance with the orders of the Government of India, partly because I really could not understand what they wished for more than they had got, and secondly because I always looked for a time when I might be able to give them information which I felt was reliable. We had given them as much information as we could from reports, each of which at the time inspired me with perfect confidence as to its being an honest and complete report. Each of them had proved to be delusive; and I began to feel that, unless the matter was probed very much more closely, it was impossible to arrive at the truth.

6806. What was the difference, if there was any difference, between the cases which you referred to the Government directors, and those which you sent to the bank secretary?—We generally referred to the Government directors when we thought that the report of the Government directors would be that of comparatively independent parties. I always understood, and I understand now, that it is through the Government directors that the Government as shareholders should exercise the influence which they have to exercise upon the bank, and that it is in a different class of cases that we should write to the secretary for the general information of the Government.

6807. Did you ask the Government directors for this information?—Yes. I think that you will find that there are two reports by the Government directors.

6808. I mean this identical information which the Government of India asked for?—It may have been a misapprehension, but it would appear that that information was not called for from the Government directors.

6809. You have referred to the appointment of Mr. Harrison upon the committee as though the nomination of Mr. Harrison to that committee indicated an acquiescence on the part of the Government of India in the proceedings of the committee.—I did not intend to imply that. I only intended to imply that we, being charged with the duty of giving the information to the Government of India, made use, with the sanction of the Government of India, of such agency as we supposed would be entirely satisfactory to the Government of India. I have no doubt that in many cases where we referred to the Government directors, instead of to the secretary, we were actuated by a wish to give information which the Government of India would understand was the information vouched for by individual directors, and not written at the dictation of the board by the secretary. In the one case it would carry personal weight which it might want in the other.

6810. You have mentioned that you felt the want in Bombay of persons of experience and knowledge with reference to such matters, and especially with reference to a crisis?—Yes.

6811. Under such circumstances, on such a crisis occurring, you did not refer back to the Government of India for amplification or modification of their very precise instructions, when you felt a difficulty in acting on them?—It had been suggested by the Government directors, and we had acquiesced in their suggestion, that further inquiry should be made by external agency. I think you will find that in March 1866, besides what I said in my private letters to the Governor-General, the difficulty of getting trustworthy and competent agency was pointed out. I mean persons who were not only unconnected with these transactions, but who, as men of business, were competent to understand the whole thing, and who had the time and opportunity to go into it; and it was pointed out that that difficulty was extreme. In the case, I may say, of Mr. Hunter, and in other cases which I could mention, I made it almost a matter of personal favour to me that he should remain in his position both as a member of the Legislative Council and as a director of the bank, and that he should act on that special inquiry, and no better proof could be afforded of what was the state of things than when the Governor was obliged to do that.

6812. Is it the fact that there was no one in Bombay who had gone through a similar crisis elsewhere?—It is a very remarkable fact that during the whole of this time there was hardly a mercantile man of high position in Bombay over 45 years of age. The great majority of the mercantile men were very young men considering the positions they filled, who could have had no sort of experience in the great crises in London, and in different parts of the empire. I believe that there was hardly a man in Bombay who had the leisure and the ability, and who had also the experience of the management of even a considerable mercantile house during times of difficulty.

6814. That is to say, as a director of the bank?—It did not seem to me that without the appointment of a commission with very enlarged powers we had any legitimate means of getting at the truth, except through the Government directors. That, in fact, was the key to a great many of the mistakes which I have no doubt I made, if they were mistakes, namely, that I considered that such an inquiry made in the manner which the Government of India directed would have been almost equivalent to an act of bankruptcy.

6816. I am to understand distinctly that no endeavour was made, there being a desire not to give names, to convey as much information as could be afforded without giving the names?—The only endeavour made was to fill up the form prepared by Mr. Erskine. It appeared to me, when I looked at the form, that it would give a great deal of information, and probably useful information, and that it would throw special light upon one question, namely, that of the three-lac limit to advances. I thought that it would give a great deal of information, and therefore we called for it. I never considered that it would be complete or conclusive. I am not sure whether I have even now made my meaning clear, but I believed that there were only two ways of getting at the truth; one was by a thoroughly competent and disinterested secretary and able Government directors (that might have been done while the bank was going on and doing business), and the other was, after the bank had gone into liquidation, or was bankrupt in fact, by such an inquiry as the Commission has now made. I would refer the Commission to the dissent which I recorded just after the Commission was appointed (a dissent from the instructions which went out), as giving my views as to the mode in which such an inquiry should be conducted in order to be effectual.

6817. As respects the different estimates, viz., the estimate which you got in September from Mr. Hunter's committee, and the estimate in the January following, you accepted, in a general way, the statement that they had proceeded upon reliable data as to the value of the securities?—Yes.

6818. You did not get any further information upon this point, or even give that information to the Government of India?—I was not aware that the information, such as it was, was not given, but I felt confident, at the time when we got those successive estimates, that each was at the time a fair estimate of the bank's position. I was not startled at the way in which each report was worse than its predecessor, because I saw that the depression continued, and that naturally the best securities must be gradually depreciated. I recollect making inquiry regarding one particular class of securities, the fall in which had struck me very much. It regarded some shares in an iron shipping company. I am not sure whether they were in the bank or not, but it appeared that they had fallen very far below the then price of similar vessels, and that there were actually in the harbour of Bombay vessels which, if sold and paid for, would have realized more than the shares then stood at in the market. That was one particular fact which struck me with regard to property easily convertible and removable, and it was accounted for to me in this way, that everybody was at the time so pressed for money that, although under ordinary circumstances they would have bought these vessels and sent them away for use elsewhere, at that particular time there was nobody who had the money to give for them, and that in consequence this property was temporarily depreciated even below the amount which it might have fetched if it had been put into the market and sold by auction.

6819. Was that the opinion of authorities outside Bombay?—No; I am speaking merely of what was in the place.

6821. (Mr. Melvill.) With regard to the advances on shares, and the resolution of the 12th of April 1865, authorizing advances on shares, did the Government directors inform you that that resolution had been passed?—I forget how I first became aware of it, whether it was officially or demi-officially.

6822. So far as the papers before us show, the first intimation which you had of it was in a letter of the Secretary of State, written in consequence of a letter which he had received from the manager of the Agra Bank.—Can you mention the date of it?

6823. The letter of the Secretary of State to you was dated the 2nd of June 1865.—I think that I was then already aware of the fact.

6824. I think that you must have been so, for on the very day after the resolution was passed, there appeared a leading article in the Bombay Gazette which stated, "The directors of the Bank of Bombay passed yesterday a resolution which in effect reversed the policy the bank has adopted since the commencement of the present financial depression in Bombay. The older banks in general have, we think, acted during the last month with an excess of timidity that has tended to bring on a crisis which threatened to ruin this city." "The directors of the Bank of Bombay have seen the folly of the course hitherto pursued, and have resolved to make from to-day moderate advances in proportion to the market value on the shares of chartered banks and of the principal land companies. On Commercial Bank shares, for instance, they will give as much as 50 per cent. premium, on Back Bay rupees 20,000 premium, on Elphinstones 1,000 premium, and so on. The risk incurred by the bank is very slight." I have no doubt that it attracted my notice at the time. Those articles in the Gazette were generally written with great ability, and I read them with great attention.

6825. Looking at it now, it appears on the very face of it that the resolution was very imprudent in authorizing the advance of such large sums on the premia of shares; and it is clear that as soon as the Secretary of State was informed of it, he saw how mischievous it was, and directed interference; and you at once seemed to see it then, and you said, "The expectation that the bank will not ultimately lose much on these shares of course does not remove the objections to such advances by the bank." Do you not think that the Government having become acquainted with the resolution almost as soon as it was passed, might have interfered before the mischief was done?—I am not certain, but I think I did interfere in the way of cautioning the Government directors. I think that I wrote to Mr. Chapman. I am not sure whether I can find the letter. That was in 1865, I think.

6826. In April 1865?—I find that I wrote on the 8th of May 1865, "I hear that the Bank of Bombay has been advancing on Back Bay shares to an amount far beyond their present market value. The figures given to me were that on 131 shares, on each of which 5,000 rupees had been paid up, the bank had advanced as though each was worth 25,000 rupees, which is far above their present market value. There may be a mistake as to the figures, and it may be very safe, but I tell you what I have heard, that you and Lushington may be on your guard, and take care that the advance on shares is not overdone. Hitherto, as far as the published returns show, the bank has been very circumspect"

6827. You said that you were directed by the Government of India to remove Colonel Marriott?—Yes.

6828. And I see that in the Confidential Appendix you put it still more strongly; and you say, referring to Colonel Marriott, I suppose, "The best man of all was removed by the Government of India in order to put in an officer of their own?"—That, I think, was speaking inaccurately.

6829. Neither statement appears altogether accurate, for the letter from the Governor-General in Council, of the 10th March 1866, says, "The Governor-General in Council accordingly requests that his Excellency the Governor may be moved to take the foregoing order, appointing Colonel Marriott and Mr. Norman, into his early reconsideration, in order that Mr. C. E. Chapman, the officiating accountant general, may be appointed a Government director in the place of one of those gentlemen." Was not it a pity that you removed Colonel Marriott and not Mr. Norman, who had no experience?—Colonel Marriott was then anxious to go home, and, having been ordered to remove one of them, I did not feel that I was justified in asking him to stay.

There are one or two points which the Commission have asked about, upon which I should like to observe. I am not sure whether I mentioned specifically the difficulty of ensuring secrecy.

6830. (President.) You mentioned that the other day. We shall be happy to hear anything which you think proper to tell us.—It is merely that we were asked to send telegrams regularly on the subject, and the telegraph department was at that time in a very disordered state.

6831. I believe it to have been utterly untrustworthy. And there were frequent losses of important papers sent by post; papers which could not be traced at all. I think that I could mention three or four instances in which, with respect to very important papers which had been sent, there was no trace of them afterwards; and that applies to some papers connected with this inquiry. I think you will find that it is stated that the papers were not traceable. Then there is another point regarding the additional share capital. I did not know what was the point to which the questions were directed regarding the previous consent of the Government.

6832. They were not directed to that point at all. Your consent was not required under the Act, and therefore there could be no point of that kind. We only wished to have your opinion upon that matter, as being a competent person to form an opinion.—Then there were two releases; Mr. Brown's release, and the release of Atmaram Madhowjee.

6833. You wrote a letter to the Government directors about Shapoorjee Dhunjeebhoy and Atmaram Madhowjee. It was received by the bank directors, and then it was said that it should stand over until Mr. F. S. Chapman returned. Did you ever get an answer?—Apparently not. But the point which I wished to mention was, that, as appears from these abstracts, the initiative in both these cases was taken by the Bombay Government; and I find on reference to them, that the impression which I mentioned to the Commission is borne out, as far as I can see; namely, that in the matter of Mr. Brown we had acted before the Governor-General noticed the matter, and that it was apparently the report which had gone in from our Government, sent by the Accountant-General to the Governor-General, which led to his addressing the question to us.

6834. I am aware of that.—In both these cases the inquiries were reported in these abstracts to the Secretary of State and the Governor-General.

6835. I shall be very much obliged to you if you can point out any answer to that letter with regard to Shapoorjee Dhunjeebhoy and Atmaram Madhowjee?—I can find none. I mention Mr. Brown's case because the Government of India have applied a very unusual term, namely, "scandalous proceeding," without mentioning whose conduct they considered "scandalous."

6836. I think that the words are, "the scandalous way in which the bank was managed."—The Commission will permit me to add that I have brought a copy of Colonel Marriott's pamphlet with regard to the share mania.

6837. I should like to see it?—I will leave it with the secretary to the Commission. Then there are the proceedings of the Legislative Council regarding Act 10 of 1863.

6838. We have all those proceedings.—They show the members who were present at the time (producing the same). Then there is a question, which I see very often comes up incidentally, regarding the Back Bay shares, as to whether they were at a speculative value or not.

6839. I do not remember putting any question about that. I am not sure whether it comes within the scope of the Commissioners' inquiries to go into that question.—I mean the excitement regarding the speculation caused by the action of the Government in their dealings with the Back Bay Company. It is made a very great point of, in all the published papers, by the shareholders.

6840. No doubt the Back Bay scheme was a great fillip to the mania at that time. It was one of the most important schemes brought forward at that period. I do not know that anybody would doubt that fact. The Government, I think, very soon refused to have anything to do with it?—It was that refusal which according to my judgment was the cause of the immense speculation.

6841. The Back Bay shares were then put up to auction, and were run up to that enormous price?—The concession, as it is called, to the Back Bay Company had been offered by Sir George Clerk to the railway company, and had been refused by them. It subsequently became necessary to carry the line of the railway to Colaba; and the company which was subsequently formed as the Back Bay Company came forward in conjunction with the engineer and officers of the railway company, and proposed to carry the line and to make the reclamation. There was no doubt that for the Government it was a very good scheme, because the Government, as a part of the price of the concession of the noxious foreshore of the island, were to receive land, which, with the approaches to it, saved them an outlay of probably a million of money, and they were to receive this large amount of land without any outlay on their own part. As the scheme was originally submitted to the Government of India, we proposed that it should be on the footing of a guaranteed railway company, and that the Government should be part shareholders and part managers of the company. I insisted very strongly upon the necessity of this connexion, because I considered that enterprises of such magnitude, affecting so many public and private interests, ought not to be undertaken by any private body without the Government having a potential voice in their management. The Government of India and the Secretary of State took a different view of the matter, and declined to take up the shares which had been reserved. They were sold by auction at, I believe, a sum very little short of two millions, the greater part of which was subsequently lost in the Asiatic Bank.

6842. We have heard that it was a million and a quarter?—That sum was paid over the auctioneer's table for the shares, with the liabilities upon them, and it always appeared to me that the absence of Government control in that matter was one of the most serious aggravations of the share mania.

6843. Mr. Cassels, who gave us some evidence upon that point, left us some books in which, I think, we shall find the whole history of that matter. I propose to read them very carefully.—Then there is another point which I should like to mention to the Commission, because it may to some extent affect their judgment on parts of the evidence, not affecting the Government, but regarding particular persons. I allude to the evidence taken before a Commission on Prices in 1863. It is a very curious collection of valuable papers, showing the enormous increase of prices in Bombay in a very short space of time, and the almost impossibility of the lower classes of Government servants living upon their salaries. If the Commission wishes I will send a copy of it.

6844. We should like to look at it, but we should not put it amongst the evidence.—It bears very much upon the morality of the case in two ways, because it shows how much greater the temptation to the poorer classes of Government servants was, and also how extremely difficult it was to get reliable agency at the ordinary rates of pay. There is another point, namely, regarding the encouragement which the memorializing shareholders state was held out by Government to speculation of all kinds. There were a vast number of schemes of reclamation and of public improvement of every kind, including the reclamation of almost the whole of the foreshore and the flats of the island, which were submitted, I think, to the number of fourteen large schemes, to a Commission who reported in 1865; and, without one exception, all those schemes were rejected. There is another point which has been referred to in parts of this business, namely, the delay in passing the Time Bargain Bill; which, in the opinion of Mr. Rustomjee Jamsetjee, and a great many other people, was one of the causes of the unnatural speculation. There was one crisis in July 1865, when many contracts were held in suspense for many weeks, and I believe months. I mention that now, because it seems to me that, with regard to the general policy on which the Commission may wish to express an opinion, that was a measure of very great importance.

With reference to my answer to Mr. Melvill, which has struck me as implying that there was a greater scarcity of honest or competent persons in Bombay than anywhere else, I should like to state that what I simply meant was, that at that time all those who were, from their character, and position, and experience, qualified to make such an inquiry into the affairs of the bank, were so absorbed in their own private business, that the Government would have found the greatest difficulty in obtaining the requisite agency.

ARCHIBALD D. ROBERTSON recalled and further examined.

6845. (President.) Were you present when Mr. Mangles was examined?—I happened to have left the room at that time.

6846. I will read to you what he said. (The President read from Mr. Mangles' evidence at page 89 suprà, from question and answer No. 1529 to question and answer 1537 inclusive.) Do you remember that transaction?—I have no recollection at this date of any reference being made to me by Mr. Mangles upon this matter, but as he states that he wrote to me upon it, I have no doubt that he did.

6847. The importance of the thing is this, that it would prove that on the 10th of May 1864, two days before you left the direction, you knew that the directors of the bank were lending money upon promissory notes only?—I knew that it was always the habit to lend on joint promissory notes without any further security; but whether Mr. Mangles put it to me that we were lending upon joint promissory notes, I cannot state without seeing his note. I certainly must have been misled as to his inquiry. I was not aware, until this inquiry was being prosecuted, that a promissory note in the name of one person was considered a negotiable security.

6848. Mr. Mangles says that you told him that you thought that it could be done under the charter?—I must have given the opinion under the impression that the note had two names to it.

6849. You do not recollect the transaction?—I do not.

6850. Do you still adhere to your opinion that before you left the direction you were not aware that the bank was in the habit of advancing money upon a single name on a promissory note?—Certainly.

6851. Notwithstanding this evidence of Mr. Mangles?—Certainly.

6852. When did you go on leave after you left the direction?—I went home on the 29th of September 1864, and I returned to India (I think) on the 12th of May 1866, and went almost at once to Scinde. I did not remain in Bombay.

With regard to allotments and shares which I had, I wish to state that not only has the Commission information as to what I had whilst I was a director, but subsequently to my being a director of the bank I have mentioned all the shares which I had up to my leaving India.

10 Dec. 1868.

ANTHONY MORRISON sworn and examined.

6853. (President.) You were the manager of the Asiatic Bank at Bombay?—I was from the commencement till its suspension.

6854. I believe that you knew Mr. Blair very well?—Yes.

6855. And Mr. Donald Robertson?—I did.

6856. You told us, in the letter which you wrote to us the other day, that you were prepared to give us some useful information concerning the Bank of Bombay and its practice. We shall now be happy to hear anything which you have to say; we believe that you had great means of knowledge.—I wish first, with your permission, to refer to the subject of some loans.

6857. You have come here, I suppose, to explain some observations which have been made regarding you, but we want chiefly to hear what will be useful to the object of this inquiry?—Of course I am ready to answer any questions, if you have any questions of that kind to ask.

6858. I understood from the terms of your letter that you had come here to volunteer some general information?—I said in my letter, I think, that I had some information which was important to this inquiry.

6859. What is that information?—On the subject which I have just mentioned; for instance, loans from the Bank of Bombay.

6860. I will just point out the loans which have been spoken to in the evidence before us. It was proved before us that on the 6th of December 1864, or thereabouts, you entered into a joint transaction with Mr. Tracey, Mr. Blair, and Premchund, in Elphinstone Land and Press Company's shares, in which there was a gain of 1,62,000 rupees.—I have no note of it, but there was such a transaction.

6861. Have you anything to explain with regard to that transaction?—No, only that no money was borrowed on my account from any bank whatever.

6862. That has nothing to do with the Bank of Bombay?—No, but of course I must look to the colour which has been given to the reports in the Bombay papers.

6863. The only object which we had was to show that Mr. Blair was engaged with others in a joint speculation, that is how your name has been brought in.—Yes; but indirectly my character, I consider, has been attacked. The transaction which you have just referred to was one which took place about the time that the Elphinstone Land Company was going to divide its stock into small shares, if I recollect rightly. I also got information with some others, that the shareholders were to be greatly benefited in that way. I was just leaving to go up to Central India at the time; and I did agree with Premchund Roychund and the others that I would take a share in it, making the provision that my interest in it should not extend beyond a fortnight, and that it should be closed up one way or the other. The transaction, as I understood, never involved any outlay whatever.

6864. You made 1,62,000 rupees by it?—Yes.

6865. The next transaction which has been spoken to is a transaction which commenced in April, and extended till August 1865, with Mr. Tracey, Mr. Hannay, and Premchund. Mr. Blair's name was not mentioned, but he was interested in your share in that transaction, that is, the Back Bay transaction, which extended from April to August 1865. That was a transaction to the extent of 12,59,860 rupees in Back Bay shares?—Yes.

6866. The only point which we care about is, whether Mr. Blair was interested to any extent in your share in that transaction?—Not in my share.

6867. In whose share was he interested?—Mr. Blair originally agreed to take an interest in five of those shares; it was a transaction of 25 Back Bay shares, not involving anything like the amount which you say. And I think it right to explain, with regard to that matter, that, whatever representations were made to the other parties interested, Mr. Hannay and myself went into that transaction specially upon what we considered public grounds. Premchund Roychund represented to us at that time that it would be a very great advantage to the Asiatic Bank, and also, I believe, represented to Mr. Hannay that it would be an advantage to the Bank of Bombay, if at that particular time we would allow him to buy 25 of those shares. He came to Mr. Hannay and myself. Not only was I the agent of the Asiatic Bank, but Mr. Hannay and I constituted at that time a sort of committee. I had more powers in that way than I should have had simply as agent; and we considered, on Premchund's representations, that the transaction ought to be entertained. He represented that the shares would otherwise be allowed to fall far below what we honestly considered their real value; and it was with no hope of making profit out of the transaction, but simply to counteract what we considered, as represented by Premchund, was an unfavourable run upon the shares.

6868. In fact, you wanted to bolster up the shares?—Not to bolster up the shares, but to restore them, or to keep them to what we considered the real value. These were our ideas at the time, and it was to be done in the name of Premchund's manager, Dossabhoy Dhunjeebhoy, in order to keep it entirely free from Premchund's own transactions. At the same time we gave Dossabhoy Dhunjeebhoy to understand that we would be personally responsible to him for the loss on five shares each. A very short time after this was entered upon, Premchund wanted us to buy another 25 shares, at a premium, I think, of 25,000 rupees. Mr. Hannay and I consulted about it, and we came to the conclusion that we would not do it on any account, and we would not do it. We were not satisfied that Premchund's first representations were correct; we were very uneasy about it, and we said to him that we thought that the object for which the first transaction was entered upon should by that time have had its effect. He pressed us very much to do this, and said that he had an order from independent men to buy 100 shares, mentioning, I think, the name of Cawasjee Jehangeer as a man of great influence; and he said that it would have great effect upon the shares; but we still declined to do this, and Mr. Hannay said to Premchund, "If you are going to buy those 100 shares, you should take over these 25 shares on your own account, because we do not wish to keep them on longer." From that time it was understood that he would be himself responsible for the thing one way or the other, either to sell the shares to those parties from whom he said that he had orders, or to take them over. Shortly after that he took them over into his own name, paying, I think, a considerable sum for the large loss upon them.

6869. Eventually he did take them into his own name. I am aware of that, and he wrote off the debt as against Mr. Tracey; that appears in the evidence. Do you mean to say that you never accepted the second batch of 25 Back Bay shares?—We did not.

6870. It is so entered in Premchund's book. Have you any books of account to confirm your statement?—No.

6871. Premchund's evidence of course will be open to observation, but his evidence is supported by books which had been out of his own custody for two years, and it is impossible for us to suppose that he could have concocted the entries in any way with a view to our inquiry. Therefore, if we should come to balance testimony upon any point of that sort, we should like to have your books and your testimony against Premchund's testimony and his books.—I have no books upon the subject, because Mr. Hannay and I were perfectly satisfied that he had not carried out the original intention, but had mixed up some of his own shares; and if Mr. Hannay were here I have no doubt that he would confirm it in this way, namely, that he wrote home some statement of it.

6872. What was Mr. Blair's object in taking five shares?—I believe that it was put in this way by Premchund at the time, namely, that we were all parties who had benefited by those shares in the original allotments, and also that Mr. Blair was a party interested in that way in the company; but I merely know what Premchund came and said when Mr. Hannay and I were together, and he may have given different versions of it to the different parties.

6873. As I understand you, you put the transaction in this way, namely, that it was entered into, not with the view of making any profit, but with a view to keeping up the price of Back Bay shares at that time. It is difficult to suppose that Mr. Blair, who at that time, I believe, had five shares, should be entering into that speculation with a view to keeping up the shares in the possession of the Bombay Bank?—I cannot say anything about what his object was, but I know that Premchund's statement to us was in these terms.

6874. The entries in his book show that it was a speculation in 50 Back Bay shares?—The second 25 shares I know that we would not consent to take, and that for those Premchund was entirely responsible. The second 25 shares were immediately after the first. The second 25 shares I know Premchund was allowed to invest in, entirely in his own interest and that of the bank. He was a responsible person at the time.

6875. As to the next transaction, evidence has been given to us of an account kept in the Asiatic Bank, in the name of Nusserwanjee Ruttonjee and Company, and that it was an account which was so entered by the influence of Premchund, and it is stated that you and Mr. Blair had an interest in that account?—That is entirely untrue. Nobody had an interest in that account, except Premchund, and Nusserwanjee and Company. When it happened I can positively declare that there was not a single name mentioned to me in connexion with that account.

6876. Have you a copy of that account?—No; but I have the date on which it was opened.

6877. Do you remember all the debits to that account, and that there were no credits?—Yes, I remember the debits; and I remember that a good deal of additional security was got afterwards, after it was transferred.

6878. There was a purchase of shares, and all the money for the purchase of those shares was carried to the debit of that account?—Yes.

6879. Who was interested in that account?—I can positively declare that Premchund came to me, and said that the shares were on account of Nusserwanjee and Company, and with their consent; and I believe that it is in evidence before you by Mr. Baker, that the shares were sent in on account of Nusserwanjee and Company.

6880. Do you know that Nusserwanjee and Company repudiated that account the moment that it was brought to their attention by Mr. Baker?—Yes, I believe they did.

6881. They said that they knew nothing at all about the account?—Yes, they said that they knew nothing at all about the account at that time.

6882. How can you account for a transaction of that kind being so entered under your management?—I account for it in this way, that Premchund Roychund held himself out as being a partner in the firm of Nusserwanjee and Company. I knew that he was not in the habit of signing the firm's name, but up to that very time he had been in the habit of conducting their business, and entering into transactions on their account to a very large extent.

I am also aware that the reason of the quarrel between Premchund Roychund and Nusserwanjee and Company at this time was, that he had got from them large amounts of their bills on China and Calcutta on the promise of a cover in opium and rice, if I recollect rightly; but being very much pressed at the time this cover was never shown to be in existence. Nusserwanjee and Company, I believe, were very much annoyed at this. I knew nothing of it until we pressed Nusserwanjee and Company to become personally responsible for this account.

I found out that the partnership of Premchund was questionable in the firm of Nusserwanjee and Company, and it was only then that they repudiated the account, and said that they had never authorized it.

6883. Who opened that account?—Premchund Roychund.

6884. What authority had he to open an account in the name of Nusserwanjee and Company?—He said that he had their authority.

6885. Did you allow anybody to open an account in another name who came in and asked you to do so?—No. I never opened an account in the same way before, but I have told you the special circumstances, namely, that Premchund Roychund was held out to be a partner.

6886. The real fact is, that Candass Narrondass was a partner, and he had supplied Candass Narrondass with funds?—I have found that out too, and I believe that the brother of Premchund was a partner.

6887. How did you let that account go on without having communication with Nusserwanjee and Company?—I had communication with them.

6888. Do you mean to say that Nusserwanjee and Company knew that the account was in existence?—It was only intended to be a temporary account. By this time Premchund was getting into deep water, and Mr. Baker was writing to them to pay up the account; they were at Premchund, and we were at Premchund, pressing him.

He told me that it was only one of the partners, namely, Hormusjee Nowrojee Saklatwalla, who objected to this account, but old Nusserwanjee, the original partner, was perfectly willing to accept it; the other partner, Hormusjee Nowrojee, had been making a quarrel with them on account of these transactions.

6889. Are you prepared to deny the statement of Hormusjee Nowrojee, a very respectable witness, that he had never heard of this account?—That statement of Hormusjee Nowrojee is quite consistent with mine.

6890. How is it consistent?—That they repudiated the account when it was brought to their notice, and that the account lay in that way, it being debated between them how it should be settled, as I was pressing both Premchund Roychund and Nusserwanjee and Company, and afterwards pressing for securities, which Premchund says in his evidence were merely formal securities, but which were valuable securities, and there was his own personal guarantee.

6891. Have you that guarantee?—No; but I have a telegram from Mr. Steel, the liquidator of the bank, saying that it is being sent on. (The witness here produced the telegram.)

6892. How was that account operated upon before the repudiation?—It was operated upon by Premchund.

6893. Was not it operated upon by slips which were sent down by you?—No; I distinctly deny that.

6894. Mr. Baker has said so.—Mr. Baker has repudiated slips to the very last. It was operated upon by a voucher from Premchund in every case, and it was sent in to the account of Nusserwanjee and Company. As the subject of slips has been mentioned I should like to say a few words. As a banker, I have looked upon that as one of the most damaging statements which have been made regarding me in this inquiry; and I consider that if I had been in the habit of using a customer's name in that way for my own purposes, or for any purposes in the way that Premchund alleged in the first place, I should have been unworthy of my position. He said that Mr. Blair and I operated upon his account by slips, debiting and crediting the account. This account of Nusserwanjee and Company having turned up afterwards, I think that you considered that there was some justification for his statement, although literally it was quite untrue.

6895. It is unimportant to us; we can only give you an opportunity of explaining the matter. I think that it is a very weak case against Mr. Blair; and you say that Mr. Blair had nothing to do with this particular transaction; if so, I have no interest in it whatever.—Mr. Blair, so far as I know, had nothing to do with it. There was no name mentioned to me, except Nusserwanjee and Company, and it was unwarranted. Then I should like to remark that you characterized those entries as fraudulent entries.

6896. Upon the evidence before us they appeared to be so.—I should wish to say, that if that remark applies to me, or to my subordinates in the Asiatic Bank, it is quite incorrect. Possibly the statement, as regards Premchund, to induce me to operate upon the account may be considered fraudulent. One of the partners of Nusserwanjee and Company came to me on two occasions, when I was in Bombay, and stated that a book had been presented to him by the Commissioners with a part of it covered up, showing him some pencil marks in that account, and I rather think that you spoke of those marks as hieroglyphics.

6897. No; if I recollect distinctly it was in very plain figures, and was sworn to be in your handwriting.—It is with reference to that that I wish to read out this letter to you. Hormusjee has certainly said that you were under the impression that my initials "A. M." appeared in my writing, indicating the impression of Premchund that I had something to do personally with this account. This letter is from Mr. Barker, the keeper of securities in the Asiatic Bank. This is to explain what those marks were.

6898. Mr. Barker was examined before us, and had a full opportunity of explaining the matter then. He was examined fully upon all these points; at least the whole question was before Mr. Baker, and he might have told Mr. Barker to give us the evidence. We cannot receive his letter without any cross-examination.—It is a very important thing. The marks were "31 shares, name A. M. Six in the name of the bank." He has not put down exactly what it is, but it was that; it was in blue pencil.

6899. The inference which we drew from that was that 31 of those shares were to be carried to A. M.'s account, and it was suggested that "A. M." was Anthony Morrison.—I said, "You surely do not believe that such a thing as that was put down in my handwriting;" and he said, "I believe that the Commissioners are under the impression that that is the explanation of it." I went to Mr. Steel, the liquidator of the bank, and he said, "It is some mare's nest." The day that I left Bombay I got hold of the book, and I got the proper explanation: and that one thing alone, I think, shows the reason of the inference which was drawn.

6900. Will you give your explanation of it; we cannot receive that letter?—My explanation is that 31 of the shares were standing in my personal name, and six of them in the name of the Asiatic Bank.

6901. This is a copy of the entry (showing the same to the witness). The original was sworn to be in your handwriting.—That is Mr. Barker's. That is the memorandum to which I have just referred.

6902. It certainly coincided with the rest of the evidence. What is your explanation at this moment of those 31 shares in your name?—That they were put in my name as the nominee of the bank. Most of the Back Bay shares stood in my name, and some of them were put into the name of the bank; but nearly all the shares which we held were put in my name.

6903. Then do you deny that you had any interest whatever in those 31 shares?—Entirely, or in any part of that account.

6904. And the "6 A. B. C." were Asiatic Bank Corporation?—Yes.

6905. Then when you were transferring, why did you not transfer the whole 37 to A. M., instead of 31 to A. M., and six to the Asiatic Bank Corporation?—Part of the shares stood in my name, and some of them in the name of the Asiatic Bank; some of them were in the name of Mr. Baker. I cannot explain it just now, but I have no doubt that I could explain it. I declare that it had nothing to do with me personally.

6906. Do you mean to swear positively that this account was never operated upon by slips?—Not without sufficient authority from Premchund; the slip would not be any authority; there would be a letter handing in so many shares, and saying, "Debit account for a certain amount." I cannot understand it otherwise. For every transaction in the books we have debit and credit slips.

6907. You would have cheques?—We have cheques for the debit.

6909. Do you mean to say that this was a regular account operated upon by slips?—The matter was not regular, inasmuch as Premchund stated that he had the authority of Nusserwanjee and Company, and it came out that they would not recognize it, whether they had given it or not; but I consider that the slip is not an irregular part of the transaction, if it was properly supported by the parties.

6910. I never had a strong belief that Mr. Blair was interested in that account to a very great extent, because it began several months after he left India. The only other point is the matter of the Asiatic Bank. Do you recollect the transactions with regard to the Asiatic Bank?—I am not quite sure that I understand what you refer to.

6911. I allude to the cash credit which the Asiatic Bank obtained from the Bank of Bombay. A cash credit was opened on the 14th of May, and you promised some Government paper, and then you gave some other security. That Government paper, it appears, was never received by the Bank of Bombay; Mr. Baker admits that.—I have no note about that, but I remember that there was a correspondence with the Calcutta agent.

6912. That is another transaction; but I am talking of the period when the first list of securities was made out. You promised to hand over to the bank some Government paper. Do you know why that Government paper was never received?—I cannot say. The first letter which I have is dated the 25th of May, but I have not a letter of the 14th of May.

6913. You are not able to explain why you never did send that Government paper?—I cannot do so from memory.

6914. Do you remember promising, on the 3rd of July 1866, that your Calcutta agent (who happened to be Mr. Steel) would send you a remittance, and that you would pay, on the arrival of the China mail at Calcutta, 5½ lacs?—I have no note of it, but there was some promise of the kind, and my explanation of it is that, instead of the remittance being sent on from China in bullion, they sent it on in English bills, and that the bills were unsaleable at the time. There was a great want of credit in Calcutta, and instead of placing the full produce of those 50,000*l.* worth of bills at my disposal, the Calcutta agent was only able to raise 20,000*l.* of the amount; I believe the Bank of Bombay got the two lacs. The other 30,000*l.* worth of bills, without consulting me, he sent on to London.

6915. The fact is that the Bank of Bombay never got that 5½ lacs?—I fancy that they did not get the whole of it.

6916. They got 26,000*l.* Do you remember what passed about that?—No; I can only refer to the various letters.

6917. How did Mr. Robertson take that?—It was not specially Mr. Robertson, because I had to go to the directors about it. I had frequent letters from Mr.

Robertson, and a great deal of trouble about this matter.

6918. You are not confusing it with some subsequent transaction, are you?—No; I think not.

6919. The Bank of Bombay very shortly afterwards opened a new cash credit with you, so that they could not have been very angry. What was the conduct of the Bombay Bank officials on that occasion? were they annoyed at not getting that 5½ lacs?—I cannot remember the circumstance so well as to say exactly. I know that they were once or twice very anxious about the account, and on the 13th of July 1866 I remember making a new arrangement.

6920. There was then a new cash credit which was extended up to the 1st of September?—Yes, to the extent, I think, of 20 lacs.

6921. You promised them then five lacs; two lacs lien on funds then on their way from Calcutta, and three lacs lien on Java guilders at Calcutta to be remitted to Bombay. Neither of those ever got to hand. Can you give any explanation of that circumstance?—Mr. Baker has marked opposite these two lacs from Calcutta "Received."

6922. From all the evidence which we have had, there is no doubt that those two sums never were received.—I can explain about the three lacs of guilders, at least I can show that there was a telegram which you saw at Bombay.

6924. That was the evidence of Mr. W. Steel, who was your own agent at Calcutta at the time. In short his evidence was this: he said, "There was no word in our cipher to represent 'dollars,' and therefore I put 'pounds' in the telegram, but Mr. Morrison ought not to have misunderstood that, because it had been previously arranged, and in previous telegrams, the word 'pounds' has been used for the word 'dollars,' and there never had been any mistake." And then Mr. Steel went on to say, "There could be no mistake, inasmuch as the latter part of the telegram expressly told him that he could only draw to the extent of a lac and a half."—That is what I wish to explain. I say that I did not wilfully, and intentionally, deceive the directors of the Bombay Bank as to the amount of securities which I could lodge on the part of the Asiatic Bank; and that I am guiltless of having done more than what I was bound to do, namely, to use every honourable exertion to obtain assistance for my own bank, on terms which I believed to be fair to the Bank of Bombay. The explanation of this telegram is, that it was not in my hands for two days after I wrote this letter of the 13th of July, and Mr. Steel, and Mr. Baker, in Bombay, did not refer to the real telegram under which I acted. I now produce it. (Exhibit marked T 8.) It is dated at Singapore, 13th July; it came into my hands on the 15th of July 1866. This is the cipher telegram and a translation with it.

6925. What does "dissipated" mean?—"Dissipated" means 70,000*l.* What is wanting in the code is something as applied to dollars. We have the word "assets," which means dollars, but then there is nothing to give the quantity of dollars unless it simply said "70,000." "Dissipated" means 70,000*l.* sterling, and the way in which Mr. Baker and I misunderstood it, at the time, was that the most of our telegrams in regard to bullion were from London.

6926. What would you imagine that the word "dollars" was put into that telegram for except for dollars?—The idea was that we had taken it for 70,000, and that the latter part of it is contradicted. Mr. Steel gave his evidence, which is very much against it, and I have his letter now contradicting it.

6927. We cannot receive letters, we have his evidence upon oath. How do you prove these telegrams?—There is the date at the foot when the telegram was received.

6928. This is not the original telegram, is it?—Yes; I got it from the Asiatic Bank at Bombay, and this is the translation of it.

6929. Are these papers certified in any way by the liquidator of the Asiatic Bank?—No. I now produce the telegram upon which I acted. (Exhibit marked T 9.) You will observe that the first telegram makes no mention of Java guilders. This (T 9) is the message which I acted upon; it is from Singapore, and dated the 2nd of July 1866, and it reached me on the 10th, three days before I wrote this letter to the Bank of Bombay; this says, "Hong Kong dollars 60,000*l.* to Calcutta."

6930. That is the same thing.—I fancy that that is the same thing, "Singapore lacs exhausted"—"exhausted" means three lacs.

6931. This telegram (T 9) is what you say that you acted upon?—Yes. I could not have acted upon the other; it has no mention of guilders, and was not in my hands until two days after I wrote the application to the Bank of Bombay.

6932. "Hong Kong dollars 60,000*l.* to Calcutta." What did you tell the directors that you understood that to convey?—I was very candid about it. I did not conceal it in any way. Mr. Baker has put the translation in blue ink, "three lacs of guilders." The "60,000*l.*" is not in his handwriting; that was merely a pencil memorandum made by Mr. Steel. I have apparently not included the dollars in my list of securities at that date. I have included the guilders, and not the dollars. After summing up the total of securities on that date, including the three lacs of guilders, I say, "At Calcutta, Mexican dollars, the amount indicated in cipher, and the message indicates six lacs, but I do not think that it can be so much." From what I knew of the position of the Singapore Bank at the time, I doubted whether it was so much, and I did not concur in the translation of it as 60,000*l.*

6933. "Dollars 60,000*l.*;" that meant 60,000 dollars?—I apprehend so, but it is not quite cleared up yet.

6934. 60,000 dollars was not three lacs?—60,000*l.* is the only thing which the word "credits" refers to; it only refers to sterling money.

6935. You explain that you had a word for "dollars"?—Yes, "assets."

6936. And the word "credits" would imply 60,000*l.*?—Yes, 60,000*l.* sterling.

6937. Your agent was forced to use the word "credits" to express 60,000, but he also put "assets," which means "dollars." It is impossible to account for the use of the word "assets" in the telegram, except upon the understanding that dollars were meant, and not pounds.—Our idea of it was 60,000*l.* worth of dollars.

6938. There is another item in which you failed. On the 23rd of August you gave additional security, thus described: "In Calcutta proceeds of Government paper, and Bank of Bengal shares sent there for sale." We have the evidence of Mr. Steel and Mr. Baker that that Government paper was pledged already, so that you actually held out these securities to the Bank of Bombay when you had not them to give.—From my advices from Mr. Steel, I think that I was justified in expecting that. I had not copies of the correspondence.

6939. Mr. Steel did not give such an account of it. He said that you had no reason whatever to say so. I understood him to say that you knew that it was only a margin which you could possibly have thought could have been made applicable to the bank debt.—So far as I remember, it was the result of a vague telegram from himself. We were misled in some way quite unintentionally by him. On the 23d of August I voluntarily gave the bank further security, that was in consequence of the securities falling through, and in my application of the 13th of July I asked for the accommodation to be upon certain securities, or others considered equally valuable. I can explain the amount which fell through in Bank of Bengal shares. It was not an imaginary amount, but it was some trust funds which were to be paid into the Asiatic Bank. The money I consider was owing to the bank, but from the position of the bank at the time, and the want of advices from Mr. Michael Scott, who had some authority over it, the money was never paid in, and we could not oblige it to be paid in, but there was a specific amount of about half a lac of rupees.

6940. That is not the evidence of your agent, Mr. Steel; he told us that this margin of 70,000 rupees, the proceeds of Government paper and Bank of Bengal shares sent to Calcutta, was so appropriated.—He has forgotten all about it. I should like to read letters of Mr. Baker and Mr. Steel.

6941. No; I cannot allow that.—They expressed to me great regret at having given that evidence.

6942. They were examined fully, and ought to have given the evidence at the time. We have allowed you to make this explanation, and it will be made public with the other statements which have been made. It is not necessary for us to express any opinion about it, and we do not do so.

I need not ask you how the cash credits were kept in the Bank of Bombay, because that of course you know nothing at all about; but did not you realize these securities from time to time?—Yes; the shares of the Apollo Press Company were realized.

6943. And you realized a good many of the others?—But I think that I took care to send in special letters showing that they applied to this cash credit.

6944. The end of it was that there was a balance of 19,66,000 rupees owing at the close of the cash credit.—Very probably.

6945. On the 1st of September there was about 16 lacs overdrawn; how came you to be allowed, when the cash credit was at an end, to draw up again to 20 lacs?—I was in constant communication with the directors.

6946. We should like to know who it was that gave you authority to draw after the cash credit was at an end?—I drew because we had requirements to meet.

6947. With whom did you make arrangements to allow you to draw in that way?—The last arrangement which I made was with the full board of directors.

6948. That was on the 23rd of August?—Yes.

6949. After the 1st of September I want to know who authorized you to draw upon that account?—That I do not know; I simply sent in my cheques to the bank, and the directors were then continually in the bank.

6950. Did you negotiate those overdrafts upon the cash credit?—No.

6951. Whom did you speak to about it; did you speak to Mr. Robertson or any director?—I do not know that I spoke to anyone. I had frequent letters from Mr. Robertson that the account was in that peculiar way, and it was very difficult to look after it, because some of my securities were in hand, and some were at sea.

6952. I want to know by what system, after the cash credit was at an end, you were allowed to draw four lacs?—I have nothing to show me that it was so.

6953. We can show you that by the account (handing the account to the witness). You will see that after the 1st of September 1866 you drew out four lacs.—Yes, so it seems by this account.

6954. How came you to be allowed to do that?—The directors, I suppose, gave me that credit. I am sure that no special influence was used in my case, for the directors asked me several times to go to the full board. I showed them my position as fully as I possibly could.

6955. But you were not there after the 23rd of August as far as I can make out?—I remember on that day being asked by Mr. Lidderdale, who I think was the chairman, whether I could positively say that the accommodation which I should get would carry me through. I of course did not say that it would not do it, but I certainly said that I could not give him a special promise of that kind, and the directors who were then present were satisfied with my general statement, which would assure them that I should do my utmost. I was very anxious to do all that I could for the bank.

6956. Then am I to understand that you believe that it was done inadvertently by the Bank of Bombay, namely, allowing you to go on overdrawing?—I do not like to express an opinion; I think that is more for the officials and directors of the Bank of Bombay.

6957. Are you able to give an explanation of it?—I am unable to give it.

6958. Did you at this time state that you would be able to get through your difficulties?—I never gave such an explanation after the 23rd of August.

6959. When you realized some of those securities, ought not your cash credit to have been reduced in proportion to the realization?—Yes, unless, any other security was substituted at the same time.

6960. That is the way in which you carried on this account; you left the account in balance, and then when fresh securities were called for, these inferior securities were given?—I cannot exactly agree to that.

6961. Was not that the case? For instance, on the 13th of July there was a balance of 12,45,000 rupees almost uncovered, there was a chartered mercantile bill of one lac, and there was the wretched security of McIndoe, Rogers, and Co., which has realized 63,000 rupees, so that there was 1,63,000 rupees worth of security to cover 12,45,000 rupees. That was the position in which the matter stood at the end of the first cash credit, and of course the bank was glad to get any security to cover that balance; but ought not the Asiatic Bank to have reduced the cash credit then?—There was some statement, I believe, made by Mr. Baker and Mr. Steel, but they were unable to satisfy you.

6962. I ask you for your opinion.—I have no materials for giving it; I have not had the books before me since about the period of the failure of the bank, and I really cannot give a categorical answer to that question.

6963. Ought not there to have been a separate cash credit account, and as these securities were realized, ought not so much of the cash credit to have been withdrawn?—Every bank has its own way of keeping its accounts; the Bank of Bombay does not seem to have adopted that system. It is possible that I might now agree with you that this is how the matter should have stood, but I do not know that it would have secured the Bank of Bombay more, because, at the time the last securities were given, they considered that they had more security than they wanted.

6964. If you had deposited the six and a half lacs they would have been in a very different position, but they never got it.

I will turn to another transaction. Do you remember you and Mr. Tracey selling some Back Bay shares to Mr. Macfarlane?—Yes.

6965. Why was Mr. Tracey's name concealed in that transaction?—It was not concealed, but the shares had been lodged, in the first place, for safe custody in the Asiatic Bank.

6966. The Asiatic Bank had a plan of taking shares for safe custody, had they?—Yes; the shares were then transferred into my name to be security for Mr. Tracey; my interest in them closed at that point before they were sold; they were sold to be delivered to Mr. Macfarlane at some delayed date, and the shares being in my name Mr. Tracey's name could not be introduced, because this sale bond was not a transferable document.

6967. You and Mr. Tracey both sold the shares?—I sold the shares for Mr. Tracey.

6968. The shares were in your name only?—The shares were in my name.

6969. Why were the shares in your name only, when Mr. Tracey had an interest in them ?—The shares were transferred into my name, because the proceeds had to go to the account of Mr. Tracey in the Asiatic Bank.

Mr. A. Morrison.

6970. They were lodged as security ?—Yes ; and they were afterwards put into my name, as far as I recollect ; they must have been in my name, because they were sold under this contract.

6971. Do you mean to say that you had no beneficial interest in them ?—Not at that time ; I had previously, but Mr. Tracey and I had some transactions together in which I squared it up.

6972. Had you not many joint transactions with Mr. Tracey ?—He had an interest in the Back Bay scheme.

6973. Were not there several transactions in which you were engaged with Mr. Tracey ?—Yes.

6974. Were there any other transactions in which you were engaged with Mr. Robertson ?—None.

6975. Or with Mr. Blair ?—You have had some evidence with regard to shares which were bought at auction, and you have had some difficulty, I think, in finding five shares ; those five shares were in Mr. Blair's other account ; I can give you the dates. Premchund's evidence was, that these ten shares were in a joint account between Mr. Blair and myself. I had no interest in the ten shares, but I had an interest in five other shares, and I transferred them to my account in the Central Bank, so as to separate my account from Mr. Blair and Premchund, and I paid in to Mr. Blair's credit the exact amount of interest. On the 25th of July 1864 Mr. Blair is debited 1,25,000 rupees, and on the 1st of September 1864 he is credited with 1,25,845 rupees, 14a. 2p. On the same day, namely, the 1st of September 1864, my account with the Central Bank is debited for the same amount, namely, 1,25,845 rupees, 14a. 2p., showing that I separated altogether my interest from Mr. Blair and from Premchund.

6976. (Major Innes.) How did you keep the loan account with the Bank of Bombay in the books of the Asiatic Bank ? I refer to the overdrawn account ?—It was just an ordinary account.

6977. Did you look at it when you overdrew it ?—I did not do so myself.

6978. Did you, or did you not, when you drew a cheque against that cash credit, look at the state of the account ?—No, I left that to Mr. Baker, principally ; he noticed details of that kind. I looked at it occasionally, when I was very anxious about the position of it, but not many times.

6979. In your account, when any sum was realized by the sale of securities, was that account credited in your own book with the sum so realized ?—Yes.

6980. Then how could you know the real state of your cash credit ?—That was, of course, the difficulty.

Mr. S. D. Birch.

Sylvester Douglas Birch further examined.

6981. (President.) You heard what I read to Mr. A. D. Robertson ?—Yes.

6982. Do you recollect Mr. Bevis's loan ?—I do not.

6983. Will you look at the entry in the book ; does it at all revive your recollection ?—No (after looking at the entry) ; I do not recollect it. If anything had been done it would, I suppose, have gone round, and my initials would have been put to it.

6984. Do you not remember Mr. Mangles coming to you, and asking you whether you were aware of it ?—No, I do not.

6985. You do not remember your saying anything about it ?—I do not remember it at all.

6986. Do you still remain of the same opinion, that you never knew at that time of these loans upon a single name, and without any other security ?—No ; I did not at that time.

6987. You never knew of any bills of that kind ?—No ; if I had known of them, the documents would have had my initials upon them.

May I be permitted to mention that Mr. Mangles was under the impression that I was in Bombay in April 1865 ; he happened to speak to me before I came in, and he said that I was one of the parties to the resolution of the 12th of April 1865. He was under the impression that he had left me at the board, but I told him that he was mistaken.

Mr. A. K. Corfield.

Arthur King Corfield sworn and examined.

6988. (President.) We hear that you wish to give us some information respecting the practice of the Government directors under the old Bank Act ?—The practice was never to advance money to any one, excepting the bank were fully secured by Government loan notes, or guaranteed railway shares.

6989. The fact is that the charter at that time only allowed such loans ?—Yes.

6990. But there was no such restriction under the new charter ?—No.

6991. Is there any other information which you wish to give us ?—There was a private discount list.

6992. That was discontinued during the year 1864. There is no doubt about the fact that there was such a discount list, and it was very useful, but it was discontinued during the year 1864.—The bank was in my day so conducted that there were never any losses at all. During the 20 years for which it had been established not more than 20,000 rupees was lost.

6993. That was because the old Act prescribed the proper course of procedure, was it not ?—Yes.

6994. Is there any other information which you can give us ?—I do not exactly know on what points you wish for information.

6995. I have read your letter, and there is one point (but it is no news to us) raised in the letter, namely, that you considered it your duty to point out to the Government every violation of the charter which might occur ?—Undoubtedly.

6996. Did you, in fact, during the whole time when you were a Government director, make any such report to the Government ?—Never.

6997. You did not think that anything was going wrong ?—No.

6998. Did you receive any instruction from the Government as to what your duties were to be ?—None whatever.

6999. Not during the whole time that you were a director ?—None, so far as I remember.

7000. Were there any rules laid down for Government directors ?—None that I ever saw.

7001. Did you consider that your duties were in any way different from those of the commercial directors ?—Not at all, with the exception that it was the duty of a Government director, if anything went wrong, to let the Government know of it.

7002. So that all the present evidence is consistent with that, namely, that the Government directors all felt that if they had known that anything was wrong, their bounden duty was to communicate with the Government ?—Yes, or with the Government of India. There was some alteration made in the finance department. I think that after I had been there for three years it was placed under the Government of India.

7003. Is there any other information which you would like to give us ?—No ; I have no other information to give.

7004. We are very anxious to get anything which is new, but these points are clearly upon the evidence before us. If there is anything else which you have to say we shall be glad to hear it.—I have nothing further to state.

Adjourned to the 11th December, at 11 o'clock, at the Grosvenor Hotel.

Friday, 11th December 1868.

PRESENT :

President.

Sir Charles Jackson.

Members.

Major McLeod Innes. | Maxwell Melvill, Esq.

Secretary.

F. D. Chauntrell, Esq.

1 Dec. 1868.

7003. (President.) I believe that you were a director of the Bank of Bombay in former years, with regard to which I do not wish to examine you; you were again elected a director in 1864, and sat at the board on the 15th of December 1864, did you not?—I think that, on the last occasion, I sat for the first time on the 5th of January 1865, but I have no record upon the point.

7004. I find in the minute book that your first sitting was on the 15th of December?—I think that I was elected on the 28th of December, and sat on the 5th of January, but I have no record of it.

7005. You were elected president on the 2nd of March 1865?—Yes.

7006. You resigned on the 3rd of April 1866?—On the 9th of April.

7007. Your last sitting was on the 3rd of April?—Yes; I was unable to attend to anything after that.

7008. You will see that you were present as a director on the 15th of December 1864; you were elected on the 12th?—I thought that it had been later.

7009. You were elected on the 12th of December, and your first sitting was on the 15th. You resigned on the 9th of April 1866?—Yes.

7010. I understand that you attended regularly at the bank, almost daily?—Yes, with the exception of the time that I was sick at Kirkee. I started for Kirkee on the 18th of August 1865, and returned to Bombay on the 6th of October 1865.

7011. You are well acquainted, no doubt, having been president as well as director, with the practice of the new bank?—I endeavoured after Mr. Birch's departure to make myself acquainted with it as well as I could.

7012. We will first of all ask you as to the discounts. When you came back to the bank at the end of December 1864 the discount list had been given up?—I heard it said by the directors then that it was impossible to state what a man was worth, and that a reliable discount list could not be made out.

7013. It was well known amongst the directors that it had been given up?—I should think so.

7014. What practice was substituted in its stead? From the time I joined in December, until March, I only attended on board days. My belief is that discounts were very much referred to the native director.

7015. Was any order passed within your knowledge advising a reference in all cases of discount to the native director?—Not to my knowledge; but it was tacitly understood, and it was expected, I believe, that they should be afterwards referred to the weekly committee.

7016. Do you not know as a matter of fact that during the course of the year 1864 the reference to the weekly committee was entirely given up, or that at least during the year 1864 there were only about fifteen cases of that sort?—Not of my own knowledge.

7017. You were not a director then?—I was not.

7018. But as a practice during the first three months that you were a director, used you to have discount minutes sent round to you?—I cannot remember that we had.

7019. Were you aware that at that time the bank was discounting promissory notes in one name without security?—To the best of my recollection it was not till the month of March 1865.

7020. How came you to be aware of it then?—Finding myself in the position of president, and not knowing so much about the bank as I found that it was necessary to know, I made inquiries as to many matters which I thought of.

7021. You found out in March 1865 that they were making those discounts in one name without further security; what steps did you take when you found that out?—I believe that I took no steps.

7022. Did you know that they had been in the habit of discounting bills (I do not think that there were any after 1864) on which more than three months were to run?—None were brought to my knowledge.

7023. Before you became president what was your belief as to the practice with regard to granting cash credits?—My belief was that a cash credit could never be a proper cash credit without two names. I have seen, in the evidence taken by you in Bombay, a paper on that subject, which I shall be very glad to see now.

7024. You were not aware that shortly after the passing of Act 10 of 1863 the bank begun to grant cash credits on a single name on a promissory note merely?—I was not.

7025. Were not you aware that on the 2nd of June 1864 the sanction of the board had been obtained for that practice before you became a director, and did you not know before you became president that the bank was granting cash credits in one name?—I was not aware of it.

7026. Do you recollect being consulted previously to June 1864 about an order which the board was going to pass allowing cash credits in a single name?—I have a recollection of Mr. Blair coming to me in Mr. Steel's absence, I think that Mr. Steel was at Matheran, and he asked me to jot down on paper what I considered was the Scotch system of cash credit; I did so, and he took it away with him, and I never heard more of it till I saw mention made of it in the evidence.

7027. Is that what you jotted down? Do not mind the alteration, but look at the original (handing Exhibit A 48 to the witness)?—It is not my handwriting.

7028. But just read the original. Is that what you jotted down as the real system of Scotch cash credits?—To the best of my knowledge and belief that is what I jotted down, with the exception of the alteration.

7029. Then you put down what was the real Scotch system?—I believe that I did.

7030. And this alteration, if you had been consulted, you would never have agreed to?—I could not have agreed to it.

7031. You therefore remained under the impression, at all events until you were president, that the cash credits were always granted upon the security of two names ?—I believe even after I was president.

7032. (Mr. Melvill.) Mr. Blair consulted you because you were a partner of Mr. Gavin Steel's, and he was a director ?—Yes ; I think that Mr. Steel was absent at the time.

7033. (President.) When did you first become acquainted with the fact that cash credits were granted on a single name ?—I have been trying to recollect, and so far as I recollect I was never aware of it.

7034. All such cash credits I suppose ought to have been entered in the application book ?—Certainly.

7035. You never saw a little blue book in which all cash credits on personal security only were entered ? —Never.

7036. I am now talking of the time before you were president?—To the best of my recollection I never knew it at any time.

7037. After the 12th of April 1865, everything was entered in the application book again regularly. Did you ever authorize in any way the omission of applications from the application book ?—Never.

7038. You were always under the impression that it contained all the applications for cash credits and loans ?—I was.

7039. And that the register of bills discounted would show all bills ?—I was under that impression.

7040. Was it the practice to lay those two books on the table before the board of directors ?—I believe that it was.

7041. Are you quite sure about it—just recollect ; it was the case after you had become president, but was it so during those first four months ?—I cannot remember ; I seldom looked at the application book until after I became president.

7042. What was the practice as to fixed loans ; what did you suppose to be the practice during the first four months before you were president, when you were merely a director ?—They rarely came before me.

7043. You did not know what the practice was ?— I could not say.

7045. I will now go to the resolution of the 12th of April 1865. When you became president, on the 2d of March 1865, you say that you began to make more inquiries as to the practice ?—I found it absolutely necessary, as we were entirely dependent upon the secretary for all our knowledge of what was going on. We were under the belief that he had always consulted Mr. Birch as to what was going on. I found myself in a manner at sea, when I became president.

7046. What was the result of your inquiries ?— The result was that I found that many loans had been granted ostensibly upon personal security, shares being taken at the same time for safe custody.

7047. Did you then find that advances had been made on a single name without other security, as well as on the deposit of shares for safe custody ?—I should think that I must have done so.

7048. What did you propose to do when you found that this was the practice ?—I did not like the practice as I did not understand it. I thought that it would be fair to advance, as we had authority by the charter to do, on shares, taking them as security.

7049. You thought, in fact, that you would sanction that practice of taking shares for safe custody by a regular resolution of the board, it being understood that the shares were to be a security ?—It was so.

7050. And I believe that you were the author of this resolution of the 12th of April 1865 ?—If you will allow me I will tell you how it was. I went over to the bank without any idea of making any such resolution. I had a conversation with Mr. Blair in the room, and whether I suggested it, or whether he suggested it, I am not aware, but when the other members came into the meeting, I talked to each one in succession, and they all thought that it was the best course that it should be put at the board and carried ; but I had no conversation with any director until I went into the board room.

7051. Had you any previous conversation with Mr. Blair ?—Never.

7052. Was the resolution drawn up in form when you arrived at the bank ?—No.

7053. Then who drew up the resolution ?—The resolution was, I think, drawn up by Mr. Donald Robertson, under Mr. Blair's directions ; that is to the best of my belief.

7054. That I suppose was before the directors came in ?—It was after the directors came in.

7055. Here is the scroll minute ; looking at that, does it revive your recollection ? (handing Exhibit A. 183 to the witness)—Yes ; that is how it was, to the best of my belief.

7056. That scroll minute, you see, says at the commencement, "With reference to the former board resolutions of the 6th of August and the 17th of September 1863, as regards advances on the securities of shares ;" it is a sort of recital, and is a much shorter recital than the resolution itself, as set out on the regular minutes.—To the best of my recollection I never heard of those two minutes before that day, not that I can charge my memory with.

7057. Do you not remember that they were inserted in the scroll minutes at the time that you saw them ?— I think not. I think that these resolutions were read out by Mr. Blair at the board.

7058. That is to say, the resolutions of the 6th of August and the 17th of September, prohibiting the advances on shares without their being brought before the full board ?—Yes.

7059. You think that they were read out ?—I am almost certain that they were.

7060. Every director whom we have examined has said that they were not brought to his knowledge.— To the best of my knowledge they were read out by Mr. Blair at the meeting.

7061. It looks so from that scroll minute at all events ; the scroll minute refers to them.—To the best of my recollection they were both read out at the meeting.

7062. That scroll minute was on the table ?—This must have been made at the table.

7063. Do you remember whether it was handed round ?—No, I think that it was read out.

7064. You think that the whole of it was read out ? —I think that the whole of it was read out.

7065. I want particularly to call your attention to the passage referring to the two previous orders.—I think that those were turned up in the middle of an old minute book, and read aloud at the meeting, so far as I can remember.

7066. You see that afterwards in the minute itself, when prepared formally, those resolutions which were referred to are set out at full length ; but you say that those resolutions were read out at the meeting ? —To the best of my recollection they were read out from a former minute book.

7067. I understand that you proposed this resolution with a view of sanctioning an irregular practice which you found had sprung up, namely, of taking the securities of these shares in contravention of the resolutions of the 6th of August and the 17th of September 1863 ?—I cannot say that that was my exact motive. I had never seen those resolutions until that day.

7068. Then what was your motive ?—My object at the time was, so far as possible, to relieve the money market, and I believe, as you have stated, also in a measure to sanction the transactions in which we had received shares.

7069. Did you carefully consider the terms of that resolution ?—It was somewhat hastily done.

7070. Were you aware that it authorized advances on shares the calls of which were not paid up?—I was.

11 Dec. 1868.

7071. Were you aware that it authorized advances on the premia of shares?—I was.

7072. Were you aware that it authorized the secretary to make those advances at his discretion?—I unfortunately was.

7073. It restricted those advances to first-class applicants, but who was to be the judge as to who were first-class applicants?—I may mention that at that particular time the directors were nearly all new directors; we were very much dependent upon the secretary and the native directors, and it was supposed that the secretary, having had charge of the bank so long, would best know who first-class applicants were.

7074. Why did you select these particular companies?—We implicitly believed, at least I myself did, in the two land companies.

7075. You mean the Back Bay and the Elphinstone companies?—Yes.

7076. The Elphinstone Company no doubt was a good company?—You were a director of the Back Bay Company, were you not?—I was.

7077. Were not you also in some way connected with the Asiatic Bank?—I was. The Asiatic Bank at that time, I believe, had 50 lacs with the Bank of Bombay, and I believed in it as firmly as I did in the Oriental Bank at that time.

7078. Mr. Brown, a director, was also the secretary of the Elphinstone Land and Press Company, was he not?—Yes.

7079. And Mr. Tracey, and Premchund Roychund, were also interested in the Back Bay Company and the Asiatic Bank?—Yes. I may also mention that we came to the conclusion that if we left out those two companies, we should probably bring about a panic altogether, and we wished to avert that.

7080. Can you explain to us why, having selected these particular companies upon which advances should be made, advances in point of fact were made upon the shares of other companies?—Those were the only authorized ones.

7081. Were you aware at any time subsequently that advances were made on United Victoria and Colaba companies' shares?—I cannot charge my memory at present, but I may state that I should have had no personal objection to those shares. I had sold all my shares which I intended to sell in the Back Bay Company. I afterwards purchased Asiatic Bank shares, and unfortunately held them, and do now.

7082. We will turn to another subject, namely, the powers of the secretary.

Do you remember a discussion with Mr. Lushington and Mr. F. Chapman, which took place shortly after Mr. Alexander Brown joined the board, with regard to the powers of the secretary?—I have an indistinct recollection of it.

7083. Do not you remember that Mr. Lushington on that occasion, which was the 4th of May 1865, proposed that there should be some restriction on the powers of the secretary?—I believe that he did.

7084. And the resolution really come to was this, "Resolved, that no new constituent of the bank be allowed credit beyond three lacs, without the special sanction of three directors?"—Yes.

7085. Is it your recollection that that really embodied the understanding which was come to at that meeting?—To the best of my recollection and belief it did.

7086. You do not recollect that there was any understanding at that time that from that moment all advances were to be brought before the board?—I do not remember such an understanding.

7087. If there had been any such understanding it must have appeared upon the minutes?—It must have done so.

7088. And you would have taken care that it did appear upon the minutes?—I hope that I should.

7089. I believe that in the course of that discussion you and Mr. Tracey strongly opposed any restrictions upon the powers of the secretary, except to that extent?—I may have done so.

7090. Do you remember whether Premchund was present on that occasion? He is not named on the minutes. Mr. Brown said that he was under a strong impression that Premchund was present?—I cannot say.

7091. That resolution, I suppose, was the result of a sort of compromise between the directors upon the discussion?—I cannot charge my memory with the discussion now.

7092. Does not it clearly appear from that resolution that you were aware that the secretary was in the habit of making advances above three lacs at that time?—It appears so. I should say that we felt very much inconvenienced after I became president from having no byelaws whatever.

7093. Is it not clear, from that resolution, that the only restriction which you then put upon the power of the secretary, was that of not granting above three lacs to new constituents?—It appears so.

7094. You say that you felt inconvenience from not having any byelaws, but whose fault was that?—I should say that it was the fault of the framers of the bill.

7096. Do you mean that no one could devote the time necessary for drawing up byelaws?—Partly that, and no one at the bank apparently knew what the byelaws should be.

7097. You were all rather young men there at that time, were you not?—We were all new directors.

7098. And the commercial directors were all rather young men, were they not?—They were.

7099. Was there any proposition at any time to make any byelaws?—Not until I came home.

7100. Did you not hear that in March 1866, shortly before you came home, the directors were even then to a great extent unaware of what the powers of the secretary were?—I had frequently talked with Mr. Robertson as to what he considered to be his powers; I was going to write a letter at home upon the subject, and in order to make myself certain as to what were his views I asked him.

7101. Shortly before you went home were not you asked by your brother directors to define what the powers of the secretary were?—I was. I had promised to do so before leaving, because I felt the inconvenience of my predecessor having left me no memorandum.

7102. Did not you, as the best mode which you could think of, at the time of ascertaining what the powers of the secretary were, write to the secretary himself?—I did.

7103. And I believe that this was his answer? (handing exhibit A. 35 to the witness)—This is his answer to me.

7104. Upon that you wrote to your brother directors the letter of the 15th of March? (Exhibit A. 34)—Yes.

7105. You did not contradict the statement by Mr. Robertson of his powers, but you then proposed some slight modification of them?—I did.

7106. And after you left I believe that your brother directors drew up some byelaws, dated 31st March, in accordance with your suggestion?—I think that they must have done so before I left.

7107. Do you remember how renewals of bills took place when you were first appointed a director of the bank before you became president?—They were entirely left to the secretary, so far as I know.

7108. After you became president, was the same practice continued?—I believe so, in a great measure. It was an unfortunate practice.

7109. Is it not a very dangerous practice to go on renewing bills time after time?—No doubt. We had adopted a policy which we thought was the best at the time.

7110. Were the questions of renewals ever referred to you?—I was very much at the bank, and I cannot say that they were never referred to me, but I think not often; many of them may have been referred to me. I cannot recollect.

7111. I must again ask you whether you remember at any time (because Mr. Blair has spoken to the practice) any distinct authority being given to Mr. Blair by you, or by anyone else, to be satisfied with the directions of a single native director as to advances?—To the best of my belief I was not aware of such instructions.

7112. If you had given any such order do you think you would have recollected it?—I think so. I think that no such order was ever given by me.

7114. That was just a few days before Mr. Blair went home?—Yes; he went home at the end of April 1865.

7115. Did you repeat that order to Mr. Robertson?—I may have written it, or I may have spoken it. I know that I mentioned it.

7116. The order which was given was never obeyed, and therefore I want to know whether it was ever conveyed to Mr. Robertson, who succeeded Mr. Blair?—At this moment I cannot say.

7117. Very shortly after that, no doubt, everything was brought before the board; the panic had set in.—There was a request that nearly everything should be brought before the board, with the exception of small loans to people who were known.

7118. You have been spoken of several times as a strong advocate for giving very enlarged powers to the secretary.—I unfortunately was so. I thought that with responsibility we should get good service.

7119. Mr. Brown in speaking of the discussion which took place at the board on the 4th of May 1865, said in his evidence, "Mr. Hannay was the spokesman, and said that unless the secretary was left unfettered, it would be impossible to make him feel his responsibility. I think Mr. Tracey joined him in that, and Mr. Hannay added that men of standing had too much self-respect to submit to have their applications scrutinized by the whole board, and that if we insisted the bank would lose much valuable business." Does that convey a right impression of the course which you took in that discussion?—I think that to the best of my belief it very nearly describes what took place.

7120. Do you remember, shortly after that, on the 11th of May, two discounts coming forward, one for the Alliance Bank and the other for Cursetjee Hormusjee Chinoy; and do you remember that an objection was taken by Mr. Lushington to such loans on personal security merely?—My recollection of the advance to the Alliance Bank is, that in consultation with Mr. Robertson we took good bills for the loans which we gave to them.

7121. There has been no loss upon the advance to the Alliance Bank.—It had nothing to do with personal securities.

7122. But there has been a loss upon the loan to Cursetjee Hormusjee Chinoy. You minuted upon it as follows: "I agree with our late president, Mr. Birch, that good personal security is far better than any other." What did you mean by that?—I meant that if a man was a man of good standing, I thought that the discounting of his bill was the best security which we could have.

7123. Was not it somewhat illogical? because, if it is good, of course one security is as good as another; but if you look to a security, is not personal security the worst that you can have?—It is better to have a good man than bad shares.

7124. Is it your opinion, as an abstract proposition, that personal security is better than any other?—That was then my opinion.

7125. Was it Mr. Birch's opinion?—I believe that it was.

7126. Do you adhere to that opinion still?—I do not.

7127. Do you recollect any of those large loans which took place on personal security, and on one name, during the time that you were a director of the bank?—I cannot charge my memory with any particular one.

7128. Do you remember the large loan to Mr. F. L. Brown on the 25th of February 1865 of 2,50,000 rupees?—I have no recollection of its being granted; of course I have heard much of it since.

7129. Are we to understand that that was done by the secretary himself, upon his own responsibility?—It must have been so.

7130. Do you remember whether that loan was renewed fourteen days afterwards?—I cannot charge my memory with knowing of it at the time.

7131. Were you, or were not, as president, ever consulted on such large transactions as that?—I think very rarely until the end of April 1865.

7132. You occasionally recommended, I find, some of these loans?—Yes, when I thought that I knew the men well.

7133. Do you recollect Kursondass Madhowdass' large loan?—That was before my time.

7134. Do you not remember its renewal on the 8th of December 1865, and the transfer of it from the partners of Kursondass Madhowdass' firm into the names of Premabhoy Hemabhoy, Premchund Roychund, and Kursondass Madhowdass?—To the best of my recollection the transfer was made by the secretary on his own reponsibility.

7135. I think that you will find that it was brought before the board?—I remember its being brought before the board, but I think that that was after it was done.

7136. Mr. A. Brown referred us to you for this transaction; he said in his evidence, "I sat for the last time on the 7th December, and for some weeks before had not been able to attend to business. I believe that Kursondass was right in saying that the transfer of the loan improved the position of the bank."—We all thought so.

7137. I have no doubt that you thought so. He adds, "Mr. Hannay knows most about that transaction. I believe that there was an understanding about the renewal of those loans, Kursondass was not to be pressed for payment."—I cannot say that I knew more about that loan than any other director in the bank, but my impression is, after having read Mr. Brown's evidence, that we were to get so much security from Cursetjee Furdoonjee in the event of his loan being carried on, and that this loan was to be carried on also.

7138. Had you entered into any understanding with Kursondass to renew that loan?—I had not, as an individual.

7139. Was there any understanding entered into about renewing those large loans?—The general policy which we adopted was a policy of renewal.

7140. But was it not a very imprudent thing, with so large a sum as 25 lacs, to enter into any agreement to renew when it had been already going on for eleven months?—At that particular time the committee were investigating the affairs of Cursetjee

Furdoonjee, and so far as I recollect the circumstances, they reported to us that he was worth 16 annas in the rupee.

7141. Then I am to understand that you do not recollect having given any promise, express or implied, to renew that loan to Kursondass?—I do not.

7142. The consequence has been that it has been renewed and renewed, and that there has been a very great loss upon it; you do not recollect at all having been a party to any such transaction?—I cannot recollect, nor do I think that I was a party to it, excepting that we adopted the policy which we thought was the right policy to adopt, namely, that of forbearance.

7143. On the 8th of December 1865, at the time of those transfers, there was no particular reason why you should adopt a policy of forbearance with men like Premchund, whose standing was then high, and Premabhoy Hemabhoy, who was then I think a member of the Legislative Council, and who was rich, and Kursondass Madhowdass, who had not failed then. Why did not you press for the repayment of the loan on the 8th of December 1865?—Knowing what we know now we should have done it; we believed that the policy was good at the time.

7144. This is a resolution of the board with respect to Kursondass' loans on the 3d of August 1865: "Resolved, that the loans be renewed for three months from the 1st of July on his (Kursondass Madhowdass) depositing the acknowledgment of his claim against Cursetjee Furdoonjee, and a guarantee bond signed by Messrs. Premchund Roychund and Premabhoy Hemabhoy, and it is understood that they will be renewed in part, or in full, for a further period if required, the rate of interest to be nine per cent., interest to be paid at the end of each three months." There is a regularly recorded resolution to renew that loan again?—Yes.

7145. Do you think that that was prudent banking?—I cannot think so now.

7146. Then you say that when it was brought before the board again on the 8th of December at the time of the transfer, the transfer had actually taken place?—My belief is that if it had not been arranged, it was all put down on paper.

7147. The date of the transfer is the 8th of December 1865.—If it was so, I believe that we were all of opinion that the secretary had acted wisely for the interests of the bank at the time.

7149. Did you get any security from those parties at the time of allowing that transfer of the 8th of December?—I cannot charge my memory.

7150. It appears that no security was then taken for such an enormous sum as 25 lacs. Twenty-three Back Bay shares were deposited on the 13th of February 1866, about two months afterwards. You trusted that sum of 25 lacs entirely upon the names of Premabhoy Hemabhoy, Premchund Roychund, and Kursondass Madhowdass?—I believe that we did so.

7151. As I understand, you do not now defend that transaction?—No.

7152. Do you recollect Mr. Campbell's loan; it was a loan to John Campbell with Sidney Smith; he was recommended by you in a discount minute on the 10th of February 1865. Do you know who those gentlemen were?—What was the amount of the loan?

7153. 50,000 rupees. There has been a loss of 40,000 rupees upon it.—I was not aware that I had recommended it; if it is in the minute of course I did. If I recommended it, I must have thought them good for the amount at the time.

7154. Do you recollect who Mr. John Campbell and Mr. Sidney Smith were?—Mr. John Campbell must have been a partner in the firm of Scott and McClelland, and Mr. Sidney Smith must have been a doctor; but I have no recollection of recommending them.

7155. You do not recollect the circumstances. Here is your name upon the document: "Dr. Smith has a little money, give them 50,000 rupees for a short period." I think that that is your handwriting? (handing Exhibit A. 137 to the witness.)—Yes; but I have no recollection of it.

7156. Do you recollect recommending Mr. Cooper for a discount on the 24th of February 1865?—I have no recollection of it. Mr. Cooper was at that time considered a wealthy man.

7157. Was not he a director of some of those ephemeral companies, the Deccan Cotton Cleaning Company, and other companies?—He may have been.

7158. I see that you recommended him in conjunction with some others. There are three names, and the loss upon that transaction has been exactly one half. You recommended him by a discount minute of the 24th of February 1865; do you recollect doing that?—I do not recollect having done so; but I may have done so. The other two parties were also considered wealthy.

7159. Were not all those persons great speculators; were not they directors of several of those ephemeral companies?—They may have been.

7160. Do you recollect recommending Cowasjee Rustomjee Pochajee jointly with Sorabjee and Nowrojee Nanabhoy for a discount?—I do not. The references to me at that time were almost interminable, and it is impossible for me to remember them.

7161. Do you recollect a loan to Cursetjee Merwanjee, Mr. Reid, and Mr. Wesché of 50,000 rupees?—I do not.

7162. Do you not recollect that you expressed yourself very strongly as to Wesché being a speculator? How was it that he got the loan? (handing Exhibit A. 138 to the witness.)—I am taken perfectly by surprise. I have no recollection of such a letter. I must have considered him worth the money at the time, if I recommended it. I do not recollect the transaction at all.

7163. Was not that bill renewed?—That I cannot say.

7164. It was I believe renewed over and over again, notwithstanding that you said that there should be no renewal. Mr. Wesché, was a bank manager, was not he?—I think that he was.

7165. What was Mr. Reid?—He was at one time an accountant in the Bank of Bombay, 7166. He had left that situation then?—Yes; he was, I think, in the Alliance Bank.

7167. Must you not all have known that that was a bill which was wanted for speculation?—Yes; it appears so now.

7168. Then there was another discount on the 20th of February 1865 to Dady Nasserwanjee Dady for one lac, on which there has been a very great loss.—He was a son of our old broker, and at that time a very wealthy young man. They had been our brokers for many years; we have sometimes trusted them with money of ours, to the extent of six lacs of rupees without security.

7169. You passed the loan. You wrote to Mr. Robertson, "Perfectly in order, he must be worth 12 lacs at least." (Exhibit A. 184.) You and Mr. Steel appear to have recommended him for this loan. Three months afterwards you wrote, "Dady Nasserwanjee Dady has one lac falling due on the 23d; he says that he can only afford you rupees 12,000 cash, and wishes you to renew, as he has plenty of property; I think you are safe in doing this. Yours sincerely, R. Hannay."—The property, belonging to him was where I lived, and for that property, a good while after that, they refused, I think, 15 lacs of rupees. That property belonged to himself and his brother.

7170. If that was the case, how is it that there was this enormous loss?—It must have been from the enormous depreciation of the property. I cannot make out why there should ever have been a loss on that young man's account.

7171. There was a loss of one third.—Nothing gave me greater surprise. I looked upon the loan to him as being perfectly safe.

7172. Is not the real explanation to be found in that vicious system of renewing?—It became a vicious system, but it was done for the best.

7173. Ought it not to have shown you that that man was speculating when he could only pay 12,000 rupees when the bill became due?—He was then expecting a sale of the property, and I believe that it was mortgaged to his friend, Cowasjee Jehangeer; he wanted more.

7174. Do you recollect Mr. Howard, the barrister, applying for a loan?—I know that he had a loan, but I do not remember the application.

7175. On the 6th of February 1865 he applied for a loan of 50,000 rupees, and you let him have it without any security; he was introduced by Mr. George Taylor, who recommended him for a lac. Here is his letter (A. 140), the 2d of February 1865. I see you recommended that 50,000 rupees should be lent to him. Do you recollect that transaction?—I see my own handwriting (looking at Exhibit A. 141).

7176. How came you to lend to Mr. Howard 50,000 rupees?—He was then considered to be a man of considerable property.

7177. What did you think he was going to do with that money; did you inquire?—No, I did not.

7178. Did not you think it necessary to inquire when you lent such large sums to people not in trade?—We unfortunately did not inquire.

7179. Did you not think that you would be bolstering up a system of speculation by allowing people who were not in trade to borrow money in this way; did it not strike you that they were going to invest it in shares?—I cannot remember at this time; no doubt it ought to have been better considered.

7180. You took no security whatever from Mr. Howard; can you account for that?—I cannot, except that we considered him good without security.

7181. Do you remember a loan to Hurst with Passmore, on the 27th of February 1865, without any security?—I do not remember the granting of it.

7182. It appears to have been recommended by you. Here is the original application for the loan (handing Exhibit A. 185 to the witness). You said that Mr. Hurst was good for two lacs. It was only a small transaction I admit, namely, 15,000 rupees.—I appear to have done so. I have no recollection of it.

7183. Then when the time came for renewal he could not pay?—I have no recollection of ever having said that he was worth two lacs.

7185. Do you recollect two cash credits to Homejee Cursetjee of 20,600 rupees on the 28th of March 1866, and 15,000 rupees on the 5th of April 1866?—I certainly would have trusted him to a very much greater extent.

7186. This is your letter strongly recommending him, is it not? (handing Exhibit A. 126 to the witness.) Is not that a letter strongly recommending that he should not be pressed for payment?—Yes; that is my letter.

7187. You took considerable responsibility upon yourself. These transactions of the 28th of March and the 5th of April 1866 are mere renewals of previous transactions, and the renewal was made in consequence of your recommending that this man should not be pressed, and in consequence of that recommendation he was not pressed, and there has been a very great loss; can you account for that? Who was he?—He had formerly been a partner of our own brokers. They were considered one of the most respectable firms in Bombay. We sometimes trusted them with six lacs of our own money at a time, and before they dissolved partnership they had a most splendid business.

7188. Do you recollect whether there was any payment made at that time?—I think that I would not authorize a renewal without a payment.

7189. There must have been a payment, because the original loan was two lacs.—I knew his means so well that I would not have authorized his having a renewal, unless he made a payment on account.

7190. Your explanation of this transaction is that you really did think that he would pay?—I did. I knew him intimately. He was an uncle of Cowasjee Jehangeer.

7191. Do you remember a resolution of the board of the 6th of July 1865, authorizing the secretary, at his discretion, to sign any trust deeds to which other bank managers might assent?—Yes, I remember the resolution.

7192. Do you think that that was a wise and prudent measure?—I thought that if all the other bank managers assented, in the multitude of councillors there would be wisdom, and that it would be right for us to assent also.

7193. But do you not think that it would have been wiser to reserve a little power in your own hands?—I think that very soon afterwards we did.

7194. Was not Mr. F. L. Brown's failure announced at the next board meeting after you passed that resolution, namely, on the 13th of July?—Very possibly it was.

7195. Did not Mr. Lidderdale then move that there should be some alteration of that resolution giving such powers to the secretary?—I think that he did, but that the whole of the rest of the board were in favour of it.

7196. Nobody would second his motion?—No.

7197. And when Mr. Robertson brought the resolution which had been passed at the meeting of the creditors before the board, and asked their sanction to the trust deed, Mr. Lidderdale again moved that their sanction should not be given?—I cannot charge my memory with that, but no doubt it is the case.

7198. You have, I suppose, read the evidence upon that point?—I have not been able to read it carefully.

7199. Mr. Lidderdale dissented. Do you recollect the grounds upon which the board determined to grant that release to Mr. Brown?—To the best of my recollection Mr. Lushington thought that it was of no use throwing good money after bad, and I agreed with him, and all the others were of the same opinion, except Mr. Lidderdale.

7200. Do you recollect whether there was any hesitation on the part of yourself and the other directors about allowing Mr. Brown to go through the Insolvent Court?—That I cannot remember.

7201. Do you recollect whether there was any feeling on your part, or on the part of the other directors, that it was undesirable that such a transaction should be made a matter of comment?—It was well known, I think, that there could be no such desire, and no idea of secrecy.

7202. Whose opinion was it, or was it the opinion of anybody on that occasion, that the board were not to make themselves the censors of the morals of the mercantile community?—I think that it was the general opinion of the board.

7203. Mr. Brown had failed for 43 lacs of rupees, had he not?—It was reported so.

7204. And it has been given in evidence before us, by his own trustee, that his estate realized 14,000 rupees. His failure took place early in July, and his trust deed was signed on the 15th. Do you think that the interests of the bank were protected by a hurried transaction of that sort?—What more could we have got?

7205. Would it not have been wiser to have tried to get a little more?—We were then all very much pressed with work, and depressed with the state of matters, and probably we did not consider it as we otherwise might have done.

7206. How do you think that you protected the interests of the bank?—I came to the conclusion that we were not likely to get anything more, and that the expenses of prosecution would be greater than any result which we could get.

7207. Adverting to another subject, do you recollect at any time about March or April 1865 a new book being made?—A book was originally made, I believe, at my own suggestion. When I entered into the bank in 1865 I felt that it was impossible for me to get acquainted with the affairs of the bank with any comfort, as there was no discount ledger, and no ledger of outstandings.

7208. We know about the discount ledger. A general ledger was made for the use of the directors?—It was supposed to contain everything.

7209. Will you describe what that ledger was? do you mean to say that it was a ledger showing all discounts, cash credits, and fixed and open loans?—It was so.

7210. How was it made? Were the items taken from the separate cash credit ledgers, fixed loan ledgers, and discount ledgers, and brought together in one book?—It was so.

7211. Did you give instructions for the preparation of that book?—To the best of my recollection I asked Mr. Blair why such a book was not in the office. It was difficult to get at the state of any man's account while a memorandum had to be sent to a ledger clerk, and another to some other person, and it was hours before we could arrive at the state of any account. I found that I could not get on at all without this book, and I think that it was not fully written up till about July 1865. There was one officer, Mr. Duncan, who looked specially after it; but it was a most laborious work, and it was some time before it was written up; it was July, or probably August, before it was written up.

7212. But still the book is a mystery to us; we never saw it.—That I cannot understand, for I directed the attention of all my brother directors to it.

7213. All the directors whom we have examined know nothing about that book except one. Had it a white cover?—I do not know that it had any cover. It lay in the director's room on a table by itself in a corner of the room. There can be no doubt about its existence. It cost me many weary thoughts going over it.

7214. How was it made up? Were the balances brought forward from the different ledgers into this book?—If a man had a loan it was brought forward, if he had bills with another they were brought forward, if he had discounts with an agency, Mr. Duncan had instructions to bring it forward; in fact everything was brought forward.

7215. A joint discount would have been put under both names?—Yes.

7216. Would it not have been much shorter for you, for that purpose, to have had a discount list made out, and altered from time to time, instead of having a huge ledger like that?—Possibly it might have been.

7217. It is a very difficult thing to refer to.—I saw no way of making myself acquainted with the state of matters without it.

7218. The first that we ever heard of it was from Mr. Blair, and he said that it was commenced in March, when he came back from Ajmere.—There was one man told off distinctly to keep it. I think that it was Mr. Duncan.

7219. Do you remember whether it was of much use?—I found that it facilitated my references, and I therefore recommended the other directors to look it up for themselves.

7220. Do you remember whether any other list was ever made from it, in order to show how much stood against one person?—I do not know that it was made from that ledger.

7221. There was a list made in July 1865, and as soon as Mr. Brown saw it, he says that he took it over to you, and that you both arranged that you would not make a dividend; do you recollect that?—I do not recollect it; Mr. Brown's memory would be fresher than mine, he took great interest in the bank.

7222. Was that list made from that book?—That I cannot say.

7223. It is strange that Mr. Brown did not know of the existence of that book.—I cannot account for it. I have looked into that book myself to the best of my recollection with all the directors. I have gone over it and have occasionally looked for a man's account.

7224. Did it include the branches?—Yes, it was to include everything; those were the instructions.

7225. (Mr. Melvill.) Did it show the securities?—No, I think not.

7226. (President.) Did you as president at all interfere with the management of the branches?—I could not do so; the bank gave me so much labour beyond my own business that I had not time to devote to the branches as I should have liked to have done. I had frequent communications with the inspector, and from time to time I always asked how each branch was getting on, and requested that any particular thing should be brought to my notice, but further than that I had not time to look after the branches, and I frequently asked my brother directors to take more interest in the branches than they did.

7227. There were discount lists with respect to those branches up to 1864, but there were no discount lists, I think, after you became a director, made up as to those branches. Discount lists made up then by Premchund Roychund would not have been of much use.

7228. But they had been previously made up by him?—Yes, and my impression was that they would have been of no use. None of us were in a position to make up discount lists at that time.

7229. Then what had the agents at the branches to guide them?—They were supposed to be guided by the secretary, with verbal or written instructions and circulars from time to time.

7230. We want to know, as a matter of fact, how advances were given at the branch agencies at the time when you were president; were they left entirely to the discretion of the agent?—They must have been so, probably with the recommendation of the native colleague.

7231. Did not you receive weekly returns from the branches?—We did.

7232. They showed the business done, but not the securities?—That I cannot remember.

7233. Used you to look over those returns?—Occasionally I did, but I had not time to go minutely into them.

7234. Were they laid before you and the directors at the board meetings?—I often asked to see them, but I cannot remember whether they were laid on the board table.

7235. There were also monthly returns?—Yes.

7236. They were rather fuller, were they not, and set out the securities on which the loans were made?—I do not recollect. It seemed to me that the agencies had been too rapidly increased, and that the system of management had never been properly considered.

7237. The agents were appointed by the board, were they not?—They were, at the secretary's suggestion.

7238. Were you always able to get competent men for such employment?—It put the office to very great inconvenience, because as soon as a man was of use there, he was drafted off to an agency.

7239. What did you understand to be the limit of the powers of an agent at a branch?—I cannot answer that question.

7240. Can you tell me whether there was any limit ever imposed on the powers of the agent of a branch?—To the best of my recollection I requested, in March 1865, Mr. Roberts on to impose a limit upon them.

7241. You almost stopped the proceedings of the branches in April 1865?—I remember being annoyed with a transaction at the Kalbadevi branch, and requesting the agent not to discount any more bills there without reference to the head office.

7242. In April you sent orders that he was not to discount any bills above 20,000 rupees?—I think so.

7243. And in May you sent orders to the agents to send up all their available cash to the head office, which of course put a stop to their business. I want to know what was your view as to the powers of the agents before that period, when you were a director?—I understood that my predecessor, Mr. Birch, had arranged with the secretary about the powers for the branches.

7244. In fact you had not made any rule yourself, and you were not aware of any rule, restricting or defining the powers of an agent at a branch?—I do not remember such a rule in my time.

7245. Did the inspector of branches receive any instructions from you as to his duties?—Not from me as an individual.

7246. By whom was he instructed?—I should think by my predecessors.

7247. Did you believe that the inspector was vigilantly superintending the branches?—We had unfortunately occasion to send him to inspect several of them.

7248. But did he go regularly round and inspect them?—In 1865 he had special inspections to make.

7249. That is, after the troubles began; but I mean before then?—I cannot say.

7250. We have been told by Mr. Fraser, who was afterwards inspector of branches, that all the time that he was agent at Kurrachee his branch never was inspected, and we have it in evidence that the branch at Hyderabad was never inspected?—That was a difficult branch to get at. When it was first opened I believe that Mr. Robertson was very nearly assassinated.

7251. You do not remember the establishment of the Kalbadevi branch?—I do not, except that Mr. Bullock was the agent.

7252. What was your opinion of Mr. Bullock?—I did not know him personally. Most of my knowledge of the Kalbadevi branch has been derived from your own records.

7253. The business there was put a stop to very shortly after you were president?—The moment that I heard that a bill, which had been refused at the head office, had been discounted there, I requested that it should be stopped.

7254. Do you recollect whose bill that was?—I think that it was Ardaseer Davur's; but I am not sure.

7255. Are you aware at all how the Kalbadevi branch was managed; did you institute any inquiries, and get information as to how it was managed?—I did not.

7256. Did you not make some inquiries as to how the agent got informed with regard to advances generally, whether upon discount, cash credit, or loan, and whom he consulted?—I have no doubt whom he did consult, but I was not aware of it.

7257. Were not you aware, from a report made by Mr. Fraser, that the agent chiefly consulted Premchund Roychund?—I cannot recollect, but I have no doubt that it was so.

7258. Was it ever brought to your knowledge that Mr. Bullock was in any way connected, either with Premchund Roychund or with Roychund Deepchund?—Never.

7259. Or that he was in any way mixed up with them in transactions of any sort?—Never.

7260. What was your opinion of Mr. Blair's capacity for business in the transaction of the duties of his office?—The bank had got on well under his management, but sometimes I wondered how it was that it had paid such good dividends.

7261. Under the old Act it was not possible to get very far wrong. Do you think that Mr. Blair was competent to carry on a general discount bank like that established by the new Act?—From my present knowledge I should say not at all.

7262. But was that your opinion then?—Mr. Birch considered him to be competent.

7263. Mr. Birch had a high opinion of him, had he?—He always expressed himself so.

7264. Was it true that any of the directors tried to get rid of Mr. Blair during the latter part of his career?—He applied for extra leave.

7265. That was some time afterwards; you then no doubt had your eyes open; but I refer to the time when he left.—I cannot remember. I remember having been requested to write such a letter to him as would make him resign.

7266. When he went home in April 1865 were the directors then satisfied with his conduct?—I do not remember any expression of dissatisfaction then, but I remember towards the end of 1865 thinking that I should not like to come in contact with him in the bank.

7267. What do you exactly mean by that expression?—I thought that I might possibly lose my temper with him.

7268. Had you any reason to suspect his conduct for honesty?—Never for one moment, but for want of discretion.

7269. Is it true to your knowledge that Mr. Scott tried to remove him; is that information which we have received correct, and that Mr. Birch always supported Mr. Blair as secretary?—I have a sort of indistinct recollection that such was the case, but I think that it must have been at an earlier period.

7270. Before you were in the direction?—Possibly when I was in the direction before, but I cannot recall it to my mind at this moment.

7271. When Mr. Blair went home in 1865, he went home with how much leave?—Six months, I think.

7272. Then he applied to you for further leave, did he not?—He did.

7273. What did the directors do upon that application?—I was requested by my brother directors to write him such a letter as should induce him to resign at the end of the leave.

7274. Is this a copy of your letter? (handing Exhibit A. 186 to the witness.)—That is a copy of it.

7275. It was the wish of the directors, I suppose, that you should recommend Mr. Blair to resign, in the kindest way that you could devise?—It was so. I may also say that to the best of my recollection, after I returned home to Europe in 1866, I received this draft letter, which is in Mr. Robertson's handwriting (Exhibit marked A. 187). I think that it came to me in a letter from Mr. Chapman, saying, that if Mr. Blair had not sent in his resignation by a certain time this letter was to be forwarded; he did send in his resignation, and I did not forward that letter to him.

7276. What was your opinion of Mr. Robertson as a secretary?—I consider that he was a hard-working man, very much over-worked, and who did the utmost in his power for the bank.

7277. Were you aware that Mr. Blair was at all engaged in transactions with Premchund Roychund or Roychund Deepchund?—Never, with the exception of one transaction in which I was engaged myself, and which was intended for the bank's benefit.

7278. That was a transaction in Back Bay shares?—It was.

7279. It began in April and ended in August 1865, did it not?—So far as I was concerned it must have ended in May or June; but I would have nothing to do with the loan, and it was taken over by Premchund Roychund.

11 Dec. 1868.

7280. It was a purchase of 50 Back Bay shares to the extent of 12,59,860 rs. ?—Certainly not ; never.

7281. What was the transaction according to your account. Our evidence is that Mr. Blair had a transaction to the extent of 12,59,860 rupees in 50 Back Bay shares with Mr. Tracey, Mr. Scott, Mr. Morrison, and you ?—Mr. Scott had nothing to do with it.

7283. What did he mean by "influences at work" ?—I fancy that it was something connected with time bargains, buyers, and sellers. I sent for Mr. Morrison, and we talked over the matter together, and we came to the conclusion that if by our taking five shares apiece and Premchund buying them it would steady the market, it might do good both to the Bank of Bombay and the Asiatic Bank ; it could not have been anything but a loss to us as individuals. This was agreed to. Premchund bought the shares, and at his suggestion the loan was granted in the name of Dossabhoy Dhunjeebhoy his manager. I think that about eight days afterwards he came and said that he had an order to buy 100 shares, and that he requested us to take other 25 shares. I said that I would have nothing to do with it, but that if he had an order to buy 100 shares he was to sell those 25 shares and close the transaction. I heard no more of it for a considerable time, and then I found that he had not done so, and I was very much annoyed at this. I found also that a number of the shares must have been his own, and I told him that he must either take over the loan in his own name or pay it off at once ; that I could have nothing to do with it. He agreed to take it over, and to the best of my recollection at that time he deposited security. I think that the bill was three lacs, but I believe that it yielded 2,40,000 rupees, and I never had anything more to do with the transaction.

7286. You knew that Mr. Blair was engaged in that transaction ?—We believed that it was represented to him, as it was to us, to be for the benefit of the banks. It could not possibly have been a matter of profit to anybody connected with it.

7287. Why not ?—Because the shares were purchased at a high value, without the idea of their ever being higher ; that certainly never entered into my mind, but it has been the source of ceaseless regret to me that I ever had anything to do with the transaction.

7287. Was not it somewhat inconsistent with your position to enter into such a transaction with Mr. Blair ?—I have often thought so since ; but at the time I thought that I was doing what was right, and that I was well advised. I have regretted it very much since. That is the only transaction of which I have any knowledge that Mr. Blair has had with Premchund Roychund.

7288. Were not you aware that Mr. Blair was very much mixed up with Premchund Roychund ?—No.

7289. Were not you aware that he was borrowing money from him and from Roychund Deepchund ?—Not at all. With your permission I will mention another circumstance, showing that, with this exception, I never had any connexion with any transaction with any person in Bombay. Premchund's books will show you that he owed me 3,198,000 rupees for the sale of shares, and he states in his evidence that I was a partner in a speculation in Port Canning shares. The fact was that, instead of being a partner, I received from him, instead of cash, payment in shares, because he said that it was not convenient for him to pay the money. He wanted me to become a partner in his speculations, and I said that I would not do it, and instead of that I took eighty Port Canning shares from him, and closed the transaction. These were sold at a loss, which was divided between Mr. Steel and myself. I state that, to show you that I had no joint transactions, when I was a director of the bank, with any person in Bombay.

7290. Had you any knowledge that Mr. Robertson was at all mixed up in such transactions ?—I had not. They would naturally be reticent as to their own affairs to me.

7291. You had no notion that he had ever entered into a speculation with Premchund ?—None whatever.

7292. Allotments of shares had ceased to be of any value when you became president. You are not aware of any of the bank officials being engaged in speculation whilst you were president ?—Not at all, further than having had the transaction with Mr. Blair, which I have mentioned. I have heard that they had allotments of shares. I knew nothing of my own knowledge.

7293. But you heard that they had had allotments of shares in 1864 ?—Possibly I may have given Mr. Robertson an allotment in the London, Asiatic, and American Company before I came away, but that was not a speculative company, the shares were not intended for sale.

7294. You remember that there was a tightness in the money market in May 1865, and that in the beginning of June there was a run upon the bank ?—I do.

7295. And you remember the telegram which was sent to the Governor General ?—Yes.

7296. And do you recollect that the Government directors were called upon to report ?—I think that it did not come before me.

7297. Did not they consult you with respect to the report which they made on the 30th of June 1865 ?—I cannot charge my memory with their having done so.

7298. Just look over that report and see.—I do not remember it.

7299. They never consulted you with regard to the preparation of that report ?—They may have done so, for I had many conversations with them, but I cannot say that they did so.

7300. Do you remark the statement there as to the 39 Back Bay shares ?—Yes.

7301. You were not a party to that statement, were you ?—Not at all. That would be intended to be under the resolution of the 12th of April.

7302. You say that you know nothing about this report ?—To the best of my recollection I do not, but they may have spoken to me.

7303. I will take you to the letter of the 9th of November 1865 ; do you recollect sending that letter to the Government ; it is in the board minute of the 9th of November 1865. I believe that you drafted that letter, did you not ?—That I cannot say.

7304. I believe that this is your minute upon the letter of the Secretary of State when it was sent round : "We must consider this most tyrannical communication on Thursday next, R.H."? (Exhibit A. 150.)—Yes ; that is in my handwriting.

7305. What do you mean by saying in the letter of 9th November 1865, "The Bank of Bombay has never advanced money directly on shares" ?—The meaning must have been that we always considered that we had the security of the applicant as well as the shares.

7306. But, supposing that you lend money on the security of the applicant and of the shares, do you not lend money as much on the shares as on the security of the applicant ?—We viewed it otherwise.

7307. I could have understood it if you had said that you had first of all lent on a promissory note, and that you had taken shares as a further security ;

you might then have said that you never lent directly on shares; but we find many transactions in which you lent money upon a promissory note and shares, and you lent the money just as directly on the shares as you did on the promissory note.—I cannot explain it. I have no recollection of having drafted the letter, but it is quite possible that I may have done so. This letter must have been circulated, and must have had the sanction of the directors, but I cannot see now how we all could have made use of that expression.

7308. The fact I suppose is, that you do not now defend it?—I cannot defend it, except as I say, that we considered in those days that we had both the bill and the collateral security.

7309. You observe that the draft letter is in Mr. Robertson's handwriting. Was it drawn up by him originally, or by you, or did he draw it up at your dictation?—I cannot say. I have no recollection of having dictated it, but I cannot be positive at this moment.

7310. Do you not recollect that there was a great increase in the value of shares in the months of September and October 1865?—That was so.

7311. It began in August, and culminated about the end of October when they began to go down again?—That was just the time when I was at Poona, from the 18th August to the 6th of October.

7312. Were you aware that Cowasjee Manockjee, one of the directors at that time, recommended Mr. Robertson to sell some of the securities?—I was afterwards aware of it.

7313. When did you first become aware of it?—It is impossible for me to say whether I was aware of it in Poona, or in Bombay, but it would have been almost impossible to have carried out his instructions then to any extent. The bank held so many shares, that if they had then come forward as a seller, there is no doubt that the market would have slipped away from them.

7314. Might it not have been tried to some degree?—It might have been.

7315. And do not you think that you would have realized some of your outstandings by that means?—Possibly, but I think not many of them.

7317. On the whole do you not think that it would have been more prudent at all events to have tried it to a certain extent?—Possibly the directors thought that if they had tried it the public would have said, "The Bank of Bombay is coming out as a seller, and we will not buy;" so that they possibly could not have realized to any extent; but that I cannot say, from its not having been tried.

7318. Does not it show the great importance of such people as secretaries and directors having nothing to do with shares; because if secretaries and directors have a large number of shares themselves, may it not very much influence their judgment in putting shares held by their bank upon the market?—I do not think that it would have influenced my own judgment.

7319. But do you not think that it is a good illustration of the danger of allowing secretaries to indulge in speculations in shares?—I was not aware that they had been so engaged at that time to any extent, with the one exception which I have mentioned, which was intended for the bank's benefit, and not for personal profit.

7320. I will now call your attention to the Government directors' report of the 31st of March 1866, at page 30 of the Blue Book. I daresay that you have seen it. I believe that you were consulted about this report?—I remember the report, but I cannot say whether I was consulted. I had many conversations with the Government directors when they were in the bank. I used to see them almost every day, and I most probably had conversation with them as to points in that report.

7321. You do not recollect being positively consulted by them about the figures in that report?—I do not.

7322. They have told us that they did go to you.—If I gave them figures, I got them from the secretary; but they had access to everything which I had access to, and they were quite as able to get the figures as I was.

7323. Were you a party to the statement there which says, "The bank was at this epoch in no difficulty as regards its own affairs"?—We did not think that we were in any difficulty; we thought that we were able to meet our deposits, and at that time there was a great call for rupees; we had a large amount of notes in hand, and we were in such a position that if we had not paid a good many rupees we should have been compelled to have made other parties bankrupt. We had no fear of any stoppage of our own.

7324. Does not it appear from a subsequent statement, in paragraph 7 of that report, that "the great bulk of the capital was locked up in loans and advances to parties from whom it was hopeless to expect punctual payment," and is it not stated in paragraph 14 that the bank was not able to render aid to Government "owing to the greater portion of its capital being unavailable in consequence of the imprudence that characterized the management prior to April 1865, and not in consequence of anything that subsequently took place;" and is it not clear, therefore, that the bank was then in considerable difficulty as regarded its capital?—Yes, as regarded the capital; but this, so far as I know, applied to its daily cash transactions.

7325. That statement in paragraph 4 merely referred to the daily cash balances?—I believe so.

7326. I will refer to a minute which you wrote upon that report.—It was a very hasty minute.

7327. Do you remember that Colonel Marriott's minute and the report of the Government director were placed before you, and that you then wrote a long minute yourself about it?—I remember that I wrote it under great difficulty. It came to me on the morning of the mail going out. I was then far from well, and I sat down and wrote a minute which I would not write now, if I had time to consider it better. I had not more, I think, than two hours or so in which to write it, and I had no time to go over it again. I daresay that many of the statements are more rash than they would have been if I had had more time to think over it.

7328. You say, "Colonel Marriott writes as if 321 lacs of outstandings were due on that day, which was of course very far from being the case."—Yes; that would be on the 30th of June. I have not sufficient recollection to explain it. I remember at the time considering that he was having verified, as I thought, my statement at the bank.

7329. Then you go on to say, "Had the policy of forbearance not been adopted there cannot be a doubt but that many men, from whom we now expect full payment and interest, would have had to have stopped payment, and the bank would thus have had at once to estimate, what we consider good debts now, as an immediate loss of 50 per cent. or more."—Yes; no doubt at the time it would have been so, that many people, who paid us afterwards, would have had to succumb.

7330. We do not find that.—It was our conviction at the time.

7331. I think that the shareholders would have been very glad to have compromised for 50 per cent. at that moment.—If I had to do it over again, although it would perhaps be one of the strongest courses ever pursued by man, I should do so, but we thought that the other course was the best.

7332. That policy of forbearance was adopted during the course of two or three months, during which prices rose?—Yes.

7333. Then you go on to say, "Colonel Marriott thinks that we should have collected more than 79 lacs before the 31st of December. My estimate in July was, that we could hardly expect to recover more than 50 lacs in the same period. He ignores the fact that upwards of 50 of the bank's old constituents had stopped payment, and that there was no prospect of our getting any dividends in these estates, or on loans to institutions winding up, within six months. He seems to be unaware of the difficulty attending the winding up of estates and companies. His idea also seems to be that the said 79 lacs should have been unprofitably kept in cash (I do not think that he said that). I fear the shareholders would have been of a different opinion." Then you go on to say: "The chief mistake was, in my opinion, the increase of capital at shareholders' request." What do you mean by that? What is your opinion with regard to the increase of capital?—That minute was written so hastily, and was so ill digested, that I am not very well able to explain it. I was then in very bad health. At the time, I considered the increase of capital a very proper measure. I perhaps might have considered it more prudent if they had stopped at one crore and 50 lacs, but I still thought that the great increase of trade warranted an increase of capital.

7334. There is no doubt about the first increase, or perhaps the second, but do you really think that the last increase was prudent?—I would have been inclined to have tried a crore and 50 lacs first, but at this distance of time I cannot say. I appeal to the circumstances under which my minute was written. I had no idea that that minute was ever to be printed and published, or I should have been at more pains in getting at the figures.

7335. Were you at all consulted with regard to the tabular statement at page 96 of the Blue Book and its preparation?—I think not. I could not have been, for I had left the country before that.

7336. I suppose that as a merchant in Bombay you were considerably mixed up with the share speculations of 1864 and 1865?—I had a good many allotments. I had nothing to do with a great many companies. I had nothing whatever to do with the financial associations with the exception of one, namely, the India, London, and China Association, shares in which were sent to me by Cowasjee Jehangeer; they were to be divided among some relatives, and those I sold the next day.

7337. What other allotments did you receive?—I had an allotment of Back Bay shares. I had also Port Canning shares. I was interested by my partner in the Mazagon Land Reclamation Company. My original allotment in the Asiatic Bank was a very small one, at least comparatively so. I think that it is down as 650 shares in the list, but of those I only had 275 in my own name, and many of those I gave away, so that I do not think that I had more than 180 shares of the Asiatic Bank.

7338. Have you not been held to be a contributory for a larger number?—Yes, upwards of 1,200.

7339. Had you any allotments besides those?—I had small allotments in little companies; in the Livery Stable Company I had 20 shares. So far as I recollect I had no other large allotments.

7340. You were a partner in the same firm as Mr. Gavin Steel, namely Grey and Company?—Yes.

7341. (Mr. Melvill.) I have the printed report of the speech which you made at a meeting of the shareholders. You said that, much for the benefit of the shareholders, the system of investing in Government paper was given up under the presidentship of Mr. Birch. Do you not think that when you had so much money that you did not know what to do with it, it would have been better to have invested in Government paper?—I did not think so.

7342. You were a director in 1862 and 1863; to what extent was the bank in the habit of investing at that time in Government paper?—I do not recollect.

7343. (President.) You said in your speech "that Mr. A. D. Robertson had been most blamed with reference to the new charter; but if the truth were told, it would be found that his brother directors considered him exceedingly obstructive, not only in objecting to some clauses then in the bill, but also to some others which possibly, but for him, might have been there." What did you mean by that?—I will endeavour to explain that. At a meeting which was held on the 4th of August 1862, the directors said that they expected that the new charter would have been ready at a previous meeting of the Legislative Council, and we were then under the impression that, had it not been for Mr. Robertson, it would have been got through.

7344. You thought that he did not exert himself to get the bill passed sooner?—That was the meaning of it. With regard to the other clauses which might have been there, I was a great advocate for being able to send home bills for the purpose of investing at home in Government securities. I was not then aware that Sir Charles Wood had put a veto upon it, and therefore I misrepresented Mr. Robertson, and thought that he was the person who had refused to let that clause pass. I, at a subsequent time, requested that we might be allowed to remit to our own constituents, and it was vetoed at once; therefore I was wrong in that respect.

7345. (President.) We do not intend to sit again for the purpose of taking evidence, but are about to prepare our report. It is possible that we may examine Mr. Blair again upon one or two points, but it will be almost useless to do so. If we do so, we shall give notice to Mr. Le Messurier, or Mr. Low.

Mr. Le Messurier. As far as I can see, sir, it will be no object to us, the shareholders, it will only be for your own satisfaction.

The Directors, Bank of Bombay.

Gentlemen, Bombay, 15th March 1868.

Having been asked by you before leaving to define what I consider should be the power of the secretary and treasurer, I thought it best in the first place to ask Mr. Robertson, the officiating secretary and treasurer, to address me familiarly, stating what he at present considered he had power to do. His letter is herewith, and I shall make remarks on each paragraph.

Before doing so, I would state that in my opinion no Bank can be successfully worked in times of difficulty unless the manager has the confidence of the directors. I consider that a direction should act chiefly as an indicating and controlling power over an efficient manager, and, if the manager has the confidence of the Board, in my opinion it is for the interest of the institution that he should be as little under control as possible, taking it for granted that the directors make themselves conversant with the current transactions of the Bank. It is important that the secretary should always have ready access to the Government members on matters relating to the Currency and Treasury Departments, and to the commercial members, so that he may in case of emergency at once consult with the president or other member on mercantile points.

I have had during the past year an excellent opportunity of judging of Mr. Robertson's capabilities; he has had to manage the Bank in a time of difficulty such as it has never before experienced, and I have no hesitation in saying that he has proved himself worthy of the confidence of the directors. He has devoted his best energies to the working of the Bank, has proved himself to be a man of ability, fertile in resource, and, what I consider an indispensable qualification, conciliatory in manner to constituents, and this often under circumstances very trying to the temper.

I will now proceed to make observations on what Mr. Robertson considers to be his power.

1. For the proper working of any institution, it is important that the head should have the control over the whole, subject to such restrictions as the directors may from time to time think fit to make. The appointment of European assistants over rs. 300 per mensem and that of head shroff should rest with directors, but the secretary should have power to appoint or remove officers of the Bank to agencies and accountantships as he may think advisable. The appointments of Deputy Secretary, Inspector of Branches, and Chief Accountant must, however, rest with directors.

2. The secretary should have power to discount the class of paper named at his discretion, without reference to the board; as a rule, he should not exceed the amount of three lacs on any firm without the sanction of the president or two members of the board. With bank bills, however, the interest of the shareholders demands that he should at discretion often far exceed this sum.

3. Here the secretary should be accorded a wide discretion. Banks are our best constituents, and it is often important that they should have temporary aid for a few days to a considerable extent. With well known institutions, I would recommend that five lacs should not be exceeded without the sanction of the president or two members, unless approved bills are deposited as security; and with well-known firms three lacs should be the maximum without security, unless with the sanction of two members not interested in the loan. A Bank like this must be prepared to grant loans in imaginary confidence; many excellent constituents would have no objections to have their temporary loans scrutinized by two members, although they would object to have their proposals submitted at the time to a full board. The books of the bank are of course at all times open for the inspection of any director.

4. In present exceptional times, until a new and careful list can be prepared, I think the secretary should grant no new loan of the nature contemplated over a lac without the sanction of the president or two members. Any loans under this amount he would of course only grant to well-known constituents.

5. Renewals should, as at present, be left to the discretion of the secretary; a renewal in full should only be agreed to under exceptional circumstances, and when the secretary is either satisfied that the principal is undoubted, or where, when in doubt, he has got the sanction of the president or two members.

6. These operations should be left entirely to the discretion of the secretary, in consultation with the inspector of branches.

7. This should also be left to the discretion of the secretary; it being understood that he is so to arrange as to be able to sell and provide himself with funds, say, to extent of half the total amount employed.

8. Operations over seven lacs should have the sanction of the weekly committee.

9. I would leave this for the present as it stands, with exception of the last paragraph, so as to give the secretary a proper status when meeting managers of other Banks. He will of course report to the board any agreements entered into during the week, and any trust deeds proposed to be signed. Of these last, however, none should be signed without your sanction.

In addition to what has been defined, I consider that the secretary should have power to open new accounts, and, at his discretion, to arrange to give 2% interest in balances not exceeding one lac, where he considers that such an arrangement would be conducive to the interests of the Bank.

Reference has frequently been made to the desirability of appointing a daily committee to look after the working of the Bank. I do not think that in Bombay such a committee would ever work satisfactorily. It is more than probable that the members would very rarely all find it convenient to meet at the same hour, and without regularity no advantages would be gained. I think, however, it is of importance that the president should, so far as possible, pay a regular daily visit to the Bank, if he be a commercial man. This would afford the secretary much assistance, as it almost daily happens that there are points which he would like to talk over. In some measure to compensate the president for his extra labour and loss of time, I would propose that my successor should receive double fees.

I am, Gentlemen,
Yours very faithfully,
R. HANNAY,
President.

Bank of Bombay,
My dear Hannay, Bombay, 7th March 1866.

I consider that according to the practice in the Bank for some years past, I, as officiating secretary, am empowered to act as follows:

1. To have the entire control of the establishment, head office, and branches (of course under the directors).
2. To discount bank bills and bills on good houses of a currency not exceeding 60 days. There is no limit, but I have hitherto seldem taken over three lacs of the paper of one house.
3. To grant temporary advances to banks, houses, and other constituents of the Bank.
4. To discount bills, and to grant loans and credits on personal security to well known men.
   N.B. Since I have been acting, the times have been so exceptional, that I granted very few advances without consulting at least one director.
5. The renewal of bills, loans, and credits, I consider is left to my own discretion, of course bearing in mind the order of the board, not to renew for the full amount if possible, but to get 25% in cash.
   Some bills, &c. for special reasons have been renewed in full.
6. To purchase hoondies for the purpose of providing branches with funds.
7. To purchase and sell bills on Calcutta and Madras.
8. To purchase and sell gold and silver bullion.
9. Power given in July last to attend meetings of creditors of parties indebted to the Bank; to agree to propositions made at such meetings; to sign trust deeds, &c. at my discretion.

To the Secretary,
Bank of Bombay. Eastern Financial Association,
Dear sir, Bombay, 17 October 1864.

The directors of the Eastern Financial Association have requested me to ask you, if they signed the promissory note for Rs. 10,00,000, and made it payable on demand, whether it would be agreeable to you, the understanding being that it is not called for until three months hence. The stamp on such a note would be one anna. If, however, you would prefer to have it expressly made payable three months after date, please let me have a blank form, and I will have it stamped with the proper stamp. It will greatly oblige if the transaction could be completed to-day.

Yours very truly,
J. CUNINGHAM,

Present obligations to the bank noted on the letter.

3. From Huthising Kesrowsing for Rs. 50,000 for 2 months on personal security.

2. I do not know the standing of the parties sufficiently well to give an opinion.

3. I would grant loan with security, the bank retaining money in part payment of Hoondies.

4. If 5 lacs would enable the Corpn. to pay the 50,00,000 due on Tuesday, considering the great benefit accruing to the public, I would grant the loan with security.—R. H.

Endorsement.—2. I think the parties are very respectable, and that 50,000 might be granted.
I agree with the other recommendations of Mr. Hannay.—R. L. T.

Endorsement.—I would grant Nos. 1 and 4 as recommended by our president, and decline Nos. 2 and 3.

It is respectfully suggested that the number of credit accounts might be greatly increased if the system practised in Scotland was intoduced, viz., on a bond for a certain amount being signed by the party requiring the or without accommodation, ~~together~~ with ~~two~~ good names as according to the credit of the party security. At present no person, in however good credit, can have a credit account with the Bank unless he can lodge Government paper as security, besides signing a Bond, which has to be renewed every three months. Whereas, if the above system was adopted, the account might run on from year to year, interest being charged at the current rates on the daily balance of the account, and added at the end of every six months, when the Books of the Bank are balanced. There should be a clause in the Bond, empowering the Bank to call up the credit at any time.

The Bond should also provide for full payment of credit with three years' interest at current rates.

Agreed to.

Herewith circulated letter from Mr. Crawford, solicitor, regarding the Alliance Financial Association. Mr. Rodgie's name being mentioned by Mr. Crawford, I would state that his opinion is that not more than 8 lacs of rupees could be recovered from the Contributories. He ascertained the addresses and occupation of the most of them. Many are insolvent, others are clerks on small salaries, menial servants, and police Sepoys.—D. R.

Mr. Crawford makes a mistake in saying that the Bank of Bombay is the only creditor that opposes the compromise. Mr. Prentis informed me that he would oppose any such compromise on behalf of his client, Nowrojee Motabhoy. If, as Mr. Rodgie says, the Contributories can pay about 8 lacs, and the Liquidator already has, besides this, 7½ lacs, the bank by pressing its claim will get far more than Mr. Crawford offers.

It must also be borne in mind that if we accept the compromise we lose all recourse against the directors individually. I personally think the bank, in the interests of its shareholders, is bound to push this matter, however hard, on the Alliance Financial Contributories.

A. Stewart.
G. Norman.

I think Mr. C. should be allowed an interview at Tuesday's board meeting.

G. M. Stewart.

I agree with Mr. Stewart, and see no reason for reconsidering the decision already arrived at after much consideration of all the circumstances of the case.

J. L. L.

I am surprised that Mr. Crawford should reopen a question that has been settled after full and careful deliberation. I am opposed to a compromise.

C. E. Chapman.

The decision of the Board in this case appears to have been given after mature deliberation, and I do not think it would benefit our shareholders by reconsidering the matter.

Henry Forman.

I see no reason why we should not hear what Mr. C. has to say on behalf of the directors against whom the bank has obtained judgment. If they come forward with any proposal which would give the bank a fair proportion of its claim, I am of opinion that, in the interest of all, we had better accept the conjoint compromise. I suggest our giving Mr. C. a hearing on Tuesday.

A. B.

I agree with Mr. Brown.—M. H. Scott.

I likewise agree with the foregoing minute, as the bank can lose nothing by hearing Mr. Crawford's statement.

Walter R. Cassels.

From the Offg. Accountant-General, Bombay, to the Chief Secretary to Government, Bombay.

Sir, Dated Bombay, 1st May 1866.

I have the honour to bring to the notice of Government that the sixth clause of the Articles of Agreement between Her Majesty's Government of Bombay and the Bank of Bombay, (vide page 386 of the Bombay Gazette, dated 28th February 1862,) which provides for a periodical audit and examination by an officer appointed by the Governor in Council of the general account and cash balances of the bank, has not, as far as I can ascertain, been enforced by Government up to this time.

2. I think that as in our other treasuries, so in this, the principal Treasury, there should be an occasional verification of the actual cash balance, both invested and uninvested, and would therefore suggest that Government avail themselves of this clause of their agreement, and depute a qualified officer to make the customary report on the cash balance.

I have the honour, &c.

11th May 1865.

The following letters are herewith circulated for instructions:—

1. From Mr. Premchund Roychund, regarding the loan applied for on behalf of the Hon. Premabhoy Hemabhoy.

2. Cursetjee Hormusjee Chinoy for Rs. 50,000, for three months, on personal security.

3. M. and M. Cursetjee Cama and Co. for two lacs for two months, on personal security.

4. From the manager of the Alliance Bank, regarding the loan applied for on behalf of that Bank.

Mr. Kelly, the chairman of the Alliance Bank, called here and supported the statements of Mr. Wesché as to the amount which they may expect to receive within the next two months. D. R.

5. Hurruckshund Nowchund offers, as the second name to the bill for Rs. 50,000, which he asked to be discounted, "Munmohundass Rugoonattijee." D. R.

Endorsement.

1. This is a falling off on the part of Premabhoy, but I would rather increase his liabilities three lacs, and decrease those of the Financial.

2. Cursetjee Hormusjee Chinoy is an old constituent, and has always been considered a good man. I would discount his draft.

3. M. and M. C. Cama & Co. I consider good for the amount.

4. Mr. Kelly, the chairman, seems to have gone carefully over the Alliance Bank books and seems to have no doubt but that the Rs. 450,000 loan will be paid on 30th June. The only other liability is said to be Rs. 200,000 in deposits. It might be well to consider whether we could not grant an open loan for four lacs; the manager paying money into credit as it comes to hand. R. H.

I think the above suggestion regarding the loan to the Alliance might be adopted, and that the other applications should be granted. R. A. T.

I agree with the President as to applications Nos. 1, 2, and 4. As to No. 3, I should not be disposed to grant the full amount. A lac at the outside would be enough to give.

A. B.

I agree with Mr. Brown. P. R.

I also think that application 5 is good also. P. R.

1st. If we grant this loan, it appears to me that the Bank will be in a worse position than at present.

2nd and 3rd. I would grant no loans on personal security only.

4th. I think the Alliance Bank has quite sufficient already. They hope to realize by July Rs. 10 lakhs, but we have no guarantee that we shall get a portion of it.

I think we should take into consideration the amount really available for loans, not forgetting the large amount of our deposits, and that the Government balance is rapidly decreasing. J. L. L.

1. Not quite so. We get the name of the wealthiest man on this side for three lacs, instead of having that sum due by a Financial.

2d, 3d. I agree with our late President, Mr. Birch, that good personal security is far better than any other.

4. I think we are bound to help the Alliance upon obtaining guarantee from chairman that monies will be paid in as received.

I think the present is a time when we should work rather bare when supporting good men; money paid away in discounts for the most part comes back to us.

R. H.
P. R.

1. With regard to this application, I think it most desirable the arrangement be carried out. Premabhoy's security is unquestionable; not so that of the Elphinstone Financial, whose debt of Rs. 500,000 will probably otherwise remain undiminished.

2 and 3. It is true that credit is for the time severely shaken in Bombay, but I cannot agree with Mr. Lushington that on this account all loans on personal security should be refused. Such a policy would surely precipitate a panic, and recoil tenfold on the Bank itself.

4. Respecting the Alliance Bank, it might be well that an extraordinary meeting of directors be held to meet the secretary and chairman of that Bank, who, as it would seem to be a matter of grave importance to them, should lay their affairs fully before the directors. If they can satisfy us that they are solvent, and are in a position to carry out what they promise, then I think the Bank will not only consult its own but the public interest, which is in an important sense committed to it, by supporting it through a period of temporary pressure.

Regarding the last paragraph of Mr. Lushington's remarks, I take it to be as Mr. Hannay says, that most of the money we give away in loans, &c., finds its way back to the Bank's coffers. Some of the banks are said to be hoarding, but this I should think quite exceptional.

Application 5 has been appended since I last saw the paper. I do not know the latter name, and would be inclined to doubt if it be such as the Bank can accept.

12-5-1865.

I agree with the President in cases Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and would adopt the course suggested by Mr. Brown in case No. 4.

F. S. C.

I would discount No. 5; the man is a very old constituent, has always been a very good constituent.

As regards No. 1, I don't exactly understand the President's remark that "we get the name of the wealthiest man on this side, instead of having that sum due by a Financial." I understood Mr. Premabhoy's name was attached to the existing loan. As regards Nos. 2 and 3 I have no further remark to make. I hold to my former opinion. No. 4. I have no objection to the course proposed by Mr. Brown; as matters stand at present I cannot assent to grant the loan.

Loans on personal security are strongly advocated by our President, and the late President; but I would ask whether it is not upon such loans that our greatest losses are likely to occur.

(Private.)

My dear Lidderdale,

Mr. Khuttow Khemjee is a respectable merchant. He has got a draft on the Bank of Bombay for 150,000 against about 860 Asiatic Bank shares. First of all the loan was for two lacs. These shares were purchased in joint account with him by me, when, the price going down, he told me to keep all the shares on my account, seeing he lost all his money in cotton and shares. I promised to see the loan paid off. I paid the interest and 50,000 in cash three months ago, now the bill is past due, and he has no money, and he is not worth a penny. I offered land which I have got at Ahmedabad as a security to the bank on his promissory note, if the bank will renew or keep the bill standing; but now this man says he can't it settled that way with the bank, and I see no reason why the bank should press such an honest man. He is ready to show his fair statement, and he agrees, as well as I agree together, that as soon as there is a change is taken place the bank's money will be paid in full; but no use of pulling down a man when they know that nothing could be had out of him; so please ask Mr. Robertson to do what is proper and fair.

Yours truly,
PREMCHUND ROYCHUND.

No. 6645.

To the Agent of the Bank of Bombay, Hydrabad, Deccan.
Dear Sir,

In returning revised the List of Names of Bankers and others at Hydrabad and elsewhere, I am to point out that the information we have been able to obtain here is, to a certain extent, uncertain, and that the directors consider that the agents have better opportunities of ascertaining the means of persons in their neighbourhood.

Persons who have been stated to be worth "any amount" have been fixed at a maximum of three lakhs, that being, in the opinion of the directors, sufficient credit at one time for any person, except in special cases in which the agents are at liberty to exercise their discretion.

I am, &c.
(Signed) J. H. RYLAND,
Officiating Secretary.

Copy letter No. 5751, dated 1st December 1864, entered in Letter Book No. 4 of the Bombay Bank.

No. 5751.

To the Agent,
Bank of Bombay, Kalbadevi.
Dear Sir,

I beg to call your attention to the large balance of cash which has been for a considerable period lying at your branch.

You are aware that it is of much importance to have the funds of the bank circulating throughout the country at remunerative rates, and to this end I have to request that you will cultivate a good understanding with the other agents, so that there may be no hindrance to the bank in receiving the full advantage of its money.

You will please keep the agents, especially those having a business connexion with your city, well informed of your rates.

It must be remembered that, however much you may remit to a branch, you are not at liberty, without permission of the agent, to draw upon it.

Instead of passing your transactions with branches through the bank's account, you may now open a general ledger account in their names, which will render any advice of such transactions to head office unnecessary; transactions with sub-branches will be placed to account of the branch to which they are sub.

I am, &c.
(Signed) D. ROBERTSON,
Officiating Secretary.

Please close your books in time for us to receive your returns at the latest on the 24th instant.

The weekly state should be written up to the date you close up your books, in the usual (weekly) manner, and all the balance entries ought to be shown in the balance sheet.

Money market becoming tighter here.

Dear Sir,

We are informed that if at any time you should require information regarding the standing of parties who may wish to discount or have advances from you, Mr. Abbaichund Cullianchund will be happy to render you every assistance.

He is agent for Premchund Roychund, and his information should consequently be trustworthy, and I would recommend you to apply to him whenever you may be in doubt.

Yours truly,

Would you recommend me to give him the loan? If he is a respectable man I think we ought to give it. We must lay out our money some way, and we will be perfectly safe in this case. My dear Robertson, 28th August 1865.

I think now is the time to go out of the secured bills that are already overdue. Please take the opinion of the full board at once, as to what measures should be adopted to recover our money from the property which the bank holds on account of such bills. I am of opinion that if the value of any of the secured bills comes nearer to the amount advanced, they should at once be sold. For instance, the loan of two lakhs of rupees granted to Pestonjee Cursetjee Shroff on the security of the Commercial Bank shares can, if I am not mistaken, be recovered by selling the property. I do not see any reason why we should wait longer if we can recover now the full amount advanced. You will will find many more instances like this, if you will kindly refer to the lists at the Head Office, and at the Kalbadevi Branch. I shall be obliged by your furnishing me with a copy of the list of the secured bills, in order to enable me to inform you from time to time what bills are sure to realize the amount granted. Please circulate this among my co-directors for their opinion, and oblige

Yours, &c.
(Signed) COWASJEE MANOCKJEE.

Bank of Bombay,
My dear Cowasjee, Bombay, 28th August 1865.

Prices of shares are not yet up to what will let us out. We advanced on Commercial Bank shares at 50 per cent. premium, Asiatic at 75 per cent. premium. I think it would be a pity to sell just now, unless it is supposed that this rise in shares is only temporary. I do not think it is so, and I dare say we may soon see Commercial and Asiatics up to our rate.

You may rest assured that I shall realize securities held for past due bills whenever they reach such a price as to cover the debt.

I think it would be better to leave the matter over until Thursday, as I fear the directors might not understand your note, but the question is one which ought to be discussed at the first meeting. I shall get a list of secured debts from Kalbadevi, and also a list of secured debts here prepared. If you are passing this afternoon perhaps you will kindly look in, and we shall talk the matter over.

Yours sincerely,

We do not, as a rule, advance upon any shares; but in some instances we have granted loans on personal security, and have received Back Bay and Elphinstone shares from the parties for deposit in the bank for safe custody. Of course the parties consider that these shares are lodged as collateral security.

My dear Robertson,

I would strongly recommend that you renew loan to Homjee Cursetjee Dady. His securities are good for all his debts, and his land will remain intact. All that he needs is time. Part of the property will most probably be sold in about a month, and if so, the proceeds in which he is interested will go to reduce loans. In case of need you may tell my brother directors that I have known Mr. Homjee intimately ever since arriving in Bombay, and I look upon his loan as being perfectly safe. All that I recommend is in this case do not press.

Yours sincerely,

LETTER from J. STUART, Esq., Secretary and Treasurer, to the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

(No. 714, dated 1st February 1867).

I have had the honour to submit to the Directors of the Bank your letter No. 68, dated 7th ultimo, with the various enclosures from the Government of India, intimating their willingness to renew, under certain conditions, the present agreement with the Bank for a further period of one year.

2. In reply I am instructed to state, that the Directors accept the terms therein proposed for the renewal of the Government account with the Bank for the period of one year, during which time the working can be fully tested both by the Government and the Bank, and any modifications which may hereafter appear desirable may be taken into consideration.

3. Referring to paragraph 5 of the letter from the Government of India, I am further desired to state that the resolution to reduce the nominal capital of the Bank by one half was duly confirmed at the meeting of shareholders on the 15th ultimo, and that steps are now being taken to carry it out by legislative enactment.

4. The Directors have every desire to afford Government all the information in their power with regard to the actual state of the Bank, but from the fact that a very large proportion of outstanding claims is against estates now being wound up under Trustees, they find it almost impossible to form an absolutely reliable valuation of probable recoveries. They have applied for information to all of these Trustees with the view of preparing a reliable estimate for Government, but have not succeeded in eliciting fresh material upon which to base it.

5. I am desired, however, to point out certain facts bearing upon this important question which Government may consider satisfactory. It may be remembered that in September last a Committee was appointed, partly by the Bombay Government and partly by the Directors, to inquire into the state of the Bank, and they estimated that at that time Rs. 1,24,50,500 of the capital of the Bank was intact. No fresh disasters have since then occurred to increase the doubtful outstandings of the Bank, but the securities, which were valued for the above estimate at a moment of great depression, have now materially increased in value, as may be observed in the following comparative quotations.

	Valuation per Share by Revising Committee in September 1866.	Prices in January, 1867.
	Rs.	Rs.
Bombay Reclamation Company	1,500	3,000
Elphinstone Land Company (Old)	600	630
United Victoria and Colaba Company	1,000	1,250
Magazon Reclamation Company	700	800
Bombay and Bengal Steam Shipping Company	465	1,000
Bombay Shipping Company	250	1,200
Royal Bank of India	36	70
Iron Shipping Company	No valuation.	750

Sales of those are now being made with all prudent despatch, and the Directors trust in a very short time to have disposed of the whole.

6. On the other hand, the possible liabilities of the Bank on these securities, estimated in September last at Rs. 30,75,200, are now reduced within very narrow limits. The largest of these is in connexion with the Commercial Banking Corporation, upon which, according to the report of Mr. Holyland, the Official Liquidator appointed by the Court of Chancery, there will not be any call. But should there unfortunately arise the necessity for a small call, the Directors have been informed by the Liquidators in Bombay that it would in all probability be eventually refunded. Beyond this the only other liability of this nature amounts to Rs. 69,000, should the utmost call be made by the Asiatic Banking Corporation against the shares held by the Bank.

7. The difficulty of revising the last estimate must be apparent to Government when I state that at the time when the Revising Committee's valuation was made no less than 245 accounts, aggregating Rs. 2,16,80,000, were claims against estates being wound up under Trust. The claims of this nature still outstanding amount to Rs. 2,11,30,000, and regarding these the Directors have not yet been able to obtain further reliable information. Earnestly desirous, however, of meeting the desire of Government in this respect, and above all of not misleading them by any mere hasty guesses, the Directors have, with long and laborious care, examined the state of every outstanding debt, and although, for the reasons already given, they submit it is impossible to give any closely reliable estimate, they at least feel able to express their belief, after rigorous valuation, that one half of the Bank's capital remains intact.

8. The Directors earnestly trust that with the former estimate before them,—an estimate, it will be remembered, not formed by the Board themselves, but by an independent Committee partly appointed by the Government of Bombay, and which, while not affected by the addition of further failures, has assumed a more favourable aspect, at least in the improved value of securities and the diminution of liabilities upon them, —Government may consider the present scrupulous statement, which the Directors make with confidence, as sufficient, and may not hesitate to renew their agreement with the Bank at least for the short period proposed, by the end of which time the Directors trust that a detailed and satisfactory statement of the Bank's position may be ready for the inspection of Government.

9. Assuming even the above low estimate, the Directors respectfully draw the attention of Government to the fact that the capital of the Bank would then be double what it was when the agreement of Government with the Bank was first effected, and a reference to the weekly Statement published in the Government Gazette will show that the Bank is now in a much stronger position than it was on the 30th of June last. The large amount of deposits in the Bank testifies to the restoration of public confidence as under:—

	30th June 1866. Rs.	January 1867. Rs.
Government Deposits	- 1,15,76,000	81,60,000
Deposit at Head Office	- 1,81,89,000	2,55,94,000
Deposit at Branches	- 37,79,000	31,34,300
Total Deposits	- 3,35,44,000	3,68,88,000
Cash Balance	- 1,71,08,200	2,35,54,400

10. The Directors are quite ready to adopt the bye-laws of the Bank of Bengal; in fact, until within the last few years, they were generally the rules in force here.

11. The revised Rules and Regulations, determining the powers and responsibility of the Secretary and Treasurer have also the approval of the Directors, except in some minor points of detail. A copy of the Rules to be adopted by the Bank will be prepared and submitted with as little delay as possible.

14th September 1863.

With reference to board resolution of 6th ultimo, that "for the present, and until further orders, any "application for advances on any Bank shares or other "public company, other than Government Banks, be "submitted to the board, and not made by the secre- "tary," I respectfully submit that an early settlement of this question is desirable, as some applications have been made to know whether the Bank would advance on colonial bank shares and railway (guaranteed) stock without the same being transferred into the name of the Bank.

With the sanction of the directors, a resolution somewhat in this form might be passed on Thursday:—

"With reference to board resolution of 6th ultimo, it is now resolved that the secretary may exercise his discretion in making advances to persons of undoubted respectability, on their signing a promissory note for the amount advanced, payable on demand, and depositing with the Bank shares in railway companies guaranteed by Government, or shares in the following institutions: the Oriental Bank; the Chartered Mercantile Bank; the Agra Bank; the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China; the Commercial Bank; the Central Bank of Western India, the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris; such shares not to be transferred into the Bank's name, but to be held simply as collateral security. The margin to be advanced on such shares to be also left to the discretion of the secretary.

Transcript of day book. J. H. R.

I would suggest that shares in the Bank of Madras (many of which are held here) be added, and with that addition, that the resolution be formally proposed on Thursday; if all the directors agree, the secretary may act on it in anticipation. The depositor of shares, I understand, signs a blank transfer paper, and signs a letter stating that they are deposited as collateral security.

R. M. I.

The mere possession of share certificates without transfer is no security at all, neither is a blank transfer paper until it has been filled up and registered. I think there can be no objection to lending money to "persons of undoubted respectability" on the proposed system, but our security will be in the respectability, and not in the share paper.

G. Steel.

I decidedly protest against advancing on any other bank shares, on the following ground:

No security of registry of shares to our Bank, because the opposite bank has lien on its own share.

Respectability is of no use if pledger is a poor man.

All the banks' shares are now got up, by one artifice or other, in value; fluctuate by 20 per to 25 per cent. in every few weeks.

How the margin is to be settled on these shares; it is utterly impossible to do so under present circumstances, and our Bank lead in a bad example, first of this kind, and introduce into Bombay as yet practice considered so dangerous that none of our joint-stock bank does advance on other Bank shares.

Lastly, such practice will induce greatly more gaming in shares.

I ask my colleagues, for instance, how they keep faith on other Bank shares value when each one increased by 100 and 200 per cent. advanced abruptly.

I would wait and never to have this sort of dangerous business for the present.

COWASJEE JEHANGEER.

If I am not in order, my colleagues must forgive me when I say that if this dangerous practice introduced now, I as proprietor would lay bare fact before my co-proprietors in a general meeting to be called for the purpose.

C. JEHANGEER.

P.S.—We are only following the example set by the Bank of Bengal, but we must not follow them.—Their gross mismanagement of this kind, brought Union Bank of Calcutta to total ruin, whose board was composed of highly, more than highly, respectable gentlemen; two baronets, one gone to jail and other run away to England, and other three ruined for life. Bombay supplied dozen bank now to them, but they dare not get up one of their own.

C. JEHANGEER.

My minute to be re-circulated to those who signed before me.

C. JEHANGEER.

I think it is very difficult to form a perfect opinion on this subject, but in some points of fact I agree with Mr. Cowasjee Jehangeer.

LIMJEE MANOCKJEE.

Sec. XXXII. cl. 1. gives us authority—supposing the banks mentioned are public companies. If they are not public companies, there is no use of further discussion; and of this I presume due inquiry has already been made, and that most of these banks are public companies has been determined. At present we have more money than the manager seems to know what to do with, and it is most desirable an outlet should be secured. I, therefore, see no objection to Mr. Ryland's draft proposition being discussed with view to being passed on Thursday. When the parties are of undoubted respectability and known means,—and the Secretary should be held responsible if he advances to those who are otherwise,—the danger in respect to short periods, to which I would limit such loans, is very little more than in the case of ordinary discounts. But the Central Bank is not a public company, and I doubt whether the "Comptoir" is. The Commercial Bank has not yet received its charter, I believe, and these three should be excluded.

I do object to large balances being allowed to lie in the Bank perfectly idle, as has been the case all this monsoon: and if the new charter allows us to deal as above disclosed, we should not be doing our duty to the proprietors did we not avail ourselves of the latitude and field allowed.

The Bank loans would be in proportion to the par value of the stock placed with us, not according to the market value, as apparently supposed by Mr. C. Jehangeer.

G. I.

Sept. 14, /63.

MEMORANDUM.

Since writing my minute of this date on Mr. Ryland's draft proposition, I have referred to Section XXXII. of our charter, and do not think the Mercantile, Agra, Oriental, and Chartered Banks can be described as coming within the term "public companies in India." They are public companies in England, with their branches only in India.

I do not, therefore, consider that the Bank can act without further and full information in this respect from its legal advisers; to whom I would suggest this point be submitted.

I request the favour of the secretary circulating this amongst the directors.

GEO. INVERARITY.

15th Sept. 1863.

Yesterday's minutes are circulated with Mr. Inverarity's second minute, and the solicitor's letters of 12th and 18th ultimo on the subject for reference.

J. H. R.

I still think the business, as conducted by the Bank of Bengal, quite safe, and in the present state of the Bank's resources desirable; of course I would act strictly in accordance with the advice of our legal advisers.

R. MCILWRAITH.

Another argument for to-morrow meeting consideration, I submit, is, the shares are not easily realizable, and consequently against sound banking principle.

Memorandum.

For the accommodation either of Messrs. Ritchie, Stewart, & Co., or their broker, Mr. Premchund Roychund, applications were made to the Bank for temporary advances for a fortnight or so, on the promissory note of Ritchie, Stewart, & Co. to Premchund.

Mr. Tracey being averse to the Firm's promissory notes being held by the Bank and passing through its books, asked as a favour that such advances should be granted on Premchund's name, he (Mr. Tracey) giving a letter of guarantee, which I would keep privately in my bill case. I acceded to his request, as both Ritchie, Stewart, & Co. and Premchund were then considered undoubted, (Premchund without any security was often allowed to overdraw for a much larger amount), and several advances of this nature were made to Premchund, and all except the one in question regularly paid off. I always considered, although the letters of guarantee were not signed "Ritchie, Stewart, & Co.," that the Bank held the guarantee of the Firm, not simply that of Mr. Tracey, which I would not expect him to give, and which, if offered, I should most certainly not have accepted.

I shall be very much astonished if Mr. Tracey will now come forward and say that for all the advances granted to Premchund in this way the Bank only had his own personal guarantee. As further proof that Mr. Tracey meant and understood he had given the Firm's guarantee for the advance now outstanding, I would mention that when on my way to Mr. Lidderdale's bungalow to meet the Directors on the morning it was decided to grant Premchund the loan of 25 lacs, I asked Mr. Tracey, in Premchund's presence, if he did not wish the 3 lacs (the amount guaranteed) to be paid out of the 25 lacs. He replied, "No, as he hoped to be in funds within a fortnight," Premchund having assigned to them (the Firm) a sum of about 18 lacs, due to him by cotton dealers in Dhollera. I believe this money, nor any part of it, did not come to hand. Mr. Tracey trusted to the 18 lacs, and I, thinking the Bank had the guarantee of the Firm, did not press for the money then.

When I was informed by Mr. Tracey that he was going home, I suggested to him that he should give a formal letter of guarantee by the Firm, and take up the informal note I held signed by himself. I did not get any definite reply then, and on the day before the mail left I wrote him again, asking for the formal guarantee of the Firm, but got no reply. I went on board the mail steamer next morning, when he told me that Mr. Scott knew all the circumstances, and that he had left with him two letters for me. I left the steamer, satisfied that the letter I wanted would be sent me in course of that day. The letters came in, but neither referred to the matter in question, and next day I learned further that Mr. Scott knew nothing whatever of the guarantee.

I wrote to Mr. Tracey shortly afterwards, but my letter still remains unanswered. Mr. Scott also wrote, and like myself he is without an answer.

Mr. Scott, before he left for England, assured me that he would do what he could to get the matter settled whenever he reached home and saw Mr. Tracey.

Draft of letter from the officiating Secretary and Treasurer, Bank of Bombay, to the Secretary to Government.

Financial Department, Bombay,
8th November 1865.

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge your endorsement No. 922 of 26th October, enclosing copy of a communication from Sir Charles Wood. I am requested by the Directors to say in reply, that it appears to them the Secretary of State has either been much misinformed relative to the transactions of the Bank of Bombay, or else that he has quite misunderstood the information supplied.

The Bank of Bombay has never advanced money directly on shares, but during the trying crisis that occurred in the early part of this year the times were so exceptional that the Directors considered it prudent, seeing so much money was lent on personal security only, to obtain as much collateral security as possible when granting loans. This was done, and it enabled the bank to assist many of their constituents who possessed shares in sound undertakings and of undoubted value, but required money.

Upon calmly looking at the circumstances of the past, the Directors are of opinion that had any other course been adopted the result would have been most disastrous, and had the Government Directors not given their consent to the course commented on, they would have been responsible for ruin probably more general and wide spread than was ever before seen in any city or commercial community.

With reference to alteration of charter, this is a matter over which the Directors have no control; but, seeing that the clause referred to has never been taken advantage of, the Directors do not see that any change is either necessary or desirable.

I have the honour to be,

My dear Robertson,

The policy of the Bank at present is to support its constituents, I mean individuals. I would lend to no one on shares for three months, and I would feel very much inclined to let Financials lean upon themselves, and, where necessary, go to the wall.

I would not feel inclined to support the Union.

Yours sincerely,

22/4/65. R. Hannay.

My dear Robertson,

If money continues to increase upon us, we should do something with it, else we won't be able to pay anything like a dividend at the end of the year. Now were men like Candass Narrondass or Sir Jamsetjee in former times wanting a loan of five lacs, we would have given it them on personal security and been right. Should these men want such a loan this month, and agree to deposit with you, say Back Bay shares for the equivalent at about par, I would grant the loan for three months at once. My opinion is that we should keep as much of our money employed as we can, and taking our present cash and liabilities as a standard, I think we have no need for more than 120 lacs in cash.

I suppose the Poona Agent will give me what money I require.

Yours sincerely,

13 August 1865. R. Hannay.

Please send me one or two copies of the Report when ready.

My dear Robertson,

Thanks for your note of 2nd, enclosing one from Mr. Lushington. I wish we had been of one opinion, but this cannot be helped; if the matter was fairly decided at a meeting, and those in favour of prosecution do not wish the matter to be re-opened, then I have nothing more to say. No decision of this kind was ever come to at any meeting where I was present, and I fail to see what advantage can be gained by proceeding against these men. I hold that the Bank, as I said before, have nothing to do with what Ballard calls the commercial immorality. The Bank advanced the money, and so condoned the offence. My reason for asking to see the circular was because the decision, in my opinion, in a measure reversed the policy of the Bank. I must maintain that the duty of Directors is, as far as lies in their power, to look after the interests of shareholders, and not to set themselves up as public censors at the expense of the proprietors. The men have been severely punished by losing all they had in the world, and Diver is not likely to have much credit in India again.

It would never do to send all circulars to absent Directors, therefore there is nothing to be said on this head, except that occasionally in August and September in each year it is expedient to break the rule, and to give the majority an opportunity of stating their views on important questions.

Yours sincerely,

R. Hannay.

P.S.—You are now so full of money that, in my opinion, you ought to lend as much as you can to safe applicants.

To the Secretary and Treasurer,
Bank of Bombay.

No. 922 of 1865,
Financial Department,
Bombay Castle,
26th October, 1865.

Sir,

I am directed by his Excellency the Governor in Council to forward, for the information of the Directors of the Bank of Bombay, the accompanying copy of a Despatch from Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for India, No. 71, dated the 8th ultimo, regarding the advances made by the Bank on shares of certain Joint Stock Companies not guaranteed by Government, and to inquire whether the Directors have any objection to the change in the charter of the Bombay Bank proposed by Sir C. Wood.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
(Signed) H. Birdwood,
Under Secretary to Government.

Financial, India Office, London.
No. 71. 8th September 1865.

To His Excellency the Honourable the Governor in Council, Bombay.

Sir,

Para. 1. I have considered in Council your Financial Letter, dated the 8th July last, No. 12, which forwarded, in reply to the inquiry contained in my Financial Despatch of the 2d June last, information regarding the advances made by the Bank of Bombay on shares of certain Joint Stock Companies not guaranteed by Government.

2. From the explanation of the Government Directors of the Bank it appears that on the 12th April last, when the cash and currency notes at the head office and branches amounted to rupees 2,91,09,603, and "there "was much demand for what then appeared to be only "temporary accommodation," the directors authorized the Secretary of the Bank, at his discretion, to make advances on shares of the under-mentioned companies at the rates specified.

	Paid up.	Market Rate, 12th April.	Authorized to advance on each Share.
	Rs.	Rs.	Rs.
Bank of Bengal	8,000	16,000 premium	6,500.
„ Madras	1,000	123 per cent. premium	75 per cent. premium.
Agra Bank	500	160 „ „	100 „ „
Asiatic Bank	200	105 „ „	75 „ „
Oriental Bank Corporation	250	170 „ „	125 „ „
Commercial Bank Company	250	75 „ „	50 „ „
Bombay Reclamation Company	5,000	30,000 „ „	20,000 premium.
Elphinstone Land Company	1,000	1,450 „ „	1,000 „

3. A total sum of rupees 41,70,800 was accordingly advanced on the security of the following shares:—

	Value at Par.
39 Back Bay shares	Rs. 1,95,000
936 Elphinstone Land shares	9,36,000
905 Asiatic Bank shares	2,26,550
3,580 Commercial Bank shares	8,95,000
	Rupees 22,52,550

The amount advanced on those shares was therefore nearly double the value of the shares at par, and at the date of your Despatch the Back Bay shares were at a premium of only Rs. 7,000, the Elphinstone Land Company of Rupees 700, and the Asiatic Bank of Rs. 5 to Rs. 10 per cent. premium, while the Commercial Bank shares were at 5 per cent. discount.

4. I am sorry to learn that the proceedings of the bank were concurred in by Messrs. Chapman and Lushington the Government Directors. In regard to their conduct you observe, that they only joined the bank direction on the 8th March 1865, that they were naturally at first obliged to rely on the judgment and experience of their elected colleagues, but that they took an early opportunity of giving the weight of their influence to support the more prudent proceedings which have lately characterized the management of the bank. This explanation in some degree accounts for the apparent want of caution on the part of the Government Directors.

5. The mere statement of these proceedings of the bank is sufficient to show how unjustifiable they were, and you very properly remark that the expectation expressed, that the bank will not ultimately lose much on the advances in question, even if it should be realized, does not in the least remove the objections to the course which was pursued.

6. It is quite clear that if any connexion is to be maintained in future between the Government and the Bank of Bombay, effective measures must be taken for guarding against any similar proceedings, and against any call being hereafter made for aid from Government.

7. Since the transfer of the Government Balances at Bombay to the custody of the bank, the only monies at the command of the Government are the balances at the other Treasuries in your Presidency; and they could hardly be of sufficient amount, or be so readily available, as to be adequate for giving assistance to the bank. It follows, therefore, that the only direct and immediate aid which your Government could give would be by applying for such purpose part of the currency reserve, and it was from this source that you proposed to the Government of India to render aid to the bank.

8. The objections to using any portion of that reserve for any such purpose can scarcely be exaggerated. It would, in the first place, be illegal; and, even if this were not the case, the same state of things which led to the pressure on the bank might not improbably lead to a demand upon the Currency Department for coin for notes, and the means of meeting that demand would have been taken away by the advances to the bank.

9. It is impossible to sanction for the future any proceeding which might lead to such a result, and it is necessary therefore to consider the best means of guarding against the recurrence of a similar emergency.

10. To some extent this object may be effected by such an alteration of the charter of the Bank of Bombay as will preclude their making advances on the security of public companies not guaranteed by Government. The Banks of Bengal and Madras are at present precluded from making such advances, and that power ought not to have been conceded in the new charter of the Bank of Bombay. You will therefore take measures for making the necessary change in the powers of the bank.

11. But, as mismanagement may take place in other modes, the best security, after all, must be in the discretion of the Directors of the Bank, and they must be made clearly to understand that they are not in future to reckon on any extraordinary assistance or support from the Government. It will be necessary, therefore, to impress on them generally the necessity of prudence in the management of the concerns of the bank, in which the Government is interested to so large an extent. But, above all, it should be the care of the Government Directors to watch very closely the proceedings of the bank, in order, so far as their influence extends, to prevent any repetition of imprudent management; and any disposition on the part of their colleagues to depart from sound principles should be forthwith communicated to you, in order that you may take such measures as may seem to you to be necessary in reference thereto.

12. It is obviously of the greatest importance to have Government Directors of sound judgment and with a general acquaintance with matters of this kind; and as you state that the existing restriction as to the Government Directors holding shares in the bank materially narrows your field of selection, I shall not object to a change being made in the regulation in this respect, so as to allow of their holding shares to a limited amount.

The same rule must of course be made applicable to Government Directors of the Banks of Bengal and Madras, and the amount of shares to be allowed to be held must be determined in correspondence with the Government of India to whom I shall make a communication on the subject.

I have the honour to be,
(Signed) C. Wood.

Matheran,
My dear Sir Bartle Frere, 10th May, 1865.

Your informant must, I think, be in error. To the best of my belief up to last Thursday the bank had hardly advanced at all on Back Bays, and in the few instances where they had done so the shares had been taken as collateral security. The other day Lushington and I spent some time in looking over the books, and have directed a statement to be prepared showing the number of individuals, or firms, to whom advances above one lac have been made, and the security by which they are covered. This statement will be ready by to-morrow, and I shall then be able to send your Excellency precise figures as regards Back Bays.

There can be no doubt that advances were, in the days of prosperity, very recklessly made on personal security. It would be suicidal to press for payment now, and the policy of the bank for some time past has been to decline all fresh applications, and to renew in cases where it would be hopeless to expect immediate payment.

Believe me,
Yours very respectfully and sincerely,
F. S. Chapman.

Bombay,
My dear Sir Bartle Frere, 11th May 1865.

In all Rs 6,94,750 has been advanced on 35 Back Bays, or on an average rather less than Rs 20,000 per share. The following will show how much has in all has been advanced on shares:

Back Bays 35 shares - -	Rs 6,94,750
Elphinstone Land 324 do. -	Rs 6,40,000
Asiatic Bank 890 do. - -	Rs 3,04,250
Commercial do. 3580 do. -	Rs 12,99,800

The above sums represent the total amount that has been advanced solely on shares. The bank holds a number of Back Bay and other shares which they have thought it prudent to take into safe custody from men to whom large loans have been made on personal security. Pray pardon this hurried note, and believe me,

Very respectfully and sincerely,
F. S. Chapman.

Bank of Bombay,
My dear Mr. Chapman, 11th May 1865.

Since the resolution was passed to advance on shares, the following shows how much has been given out in that way:

Back Bays - -	35 shares	Rs 6,94,750
Elphinstone Land Company - -	324 ,,	Rs 6,40,000
Asiatic Bank -	890 ,,	Rs 3,04,250
Commercial Bank -	3,580 ,,	Rs 12,99,800

Besides the above, we hold a considerable number of Back Bay shares, which we took into safe custody from those names who have long loans from the bank on personal security, men such as B. H. Cama, Cursetjee Furdoonjee, and Kursondass Madhowdass. These loans were not nominally granted on shares, but it was thought well to have some security collaterally independent of their personal standing. Several of these large loans Premchund tells me will be paid up very soon.

Yours sincerely,
D. Robertson.

Bombay,
My dear Sir Bartle Frere, 8th June 1865.

I have just returned from the bank meeting. From what I can learn matters are looking as black as they well can.

The first thing that came before our notice was some correspondence that took place yesterday between the manager of the Mercantile Bank and our secretary. It resulted in the former sending a cheque for the whole of the deposits in our hands amounting to 25 lacs. The affair originated in silly pique, and, on two of the directors calling this morning on the manager, was satisfactorily settled.

I have instanced this fact to show the great jeopardy in which the bank is apparently placed. There is such an entire absence of all confidence that a run may take place any day.

If this should extend to the large depositors (the Commercial Bank, for example, has forty lacs in our hands) we should have to suspend payment. There is, I hope, little chance of the contingency I have alluded to ever taking place, but there is no use disguising the fact that it is on the cards. At all events there can be no harm in anticipating and preparing for the worst. To this end I have asked Mr. Hannay and the other directors to prepare and submit any feasible scheme that may occur to them by which Government could assist them if they were placed in the straits I have referred to. When they have done so I will lose no time in laying it before your Excellency. I hope I shan't be considered an alarmist for having written in this style. On paper we are in a very satisfactory state, but the list of overdue bills is not a pleasant sight. The list too of debtors where bills have still to run presents a very different aspect to what it would have done six months ago. Men who were then supposed to be good for crores are now either insolvent or else on the verge of bankruptcy. In the days of prosperity our management was characterized by what now appears to have been the most reckless conduct. It is a satisfaction to me personally to feel that the mischief was done before I had any connection with the bank. I don't for a moment mean to imply that one would have acted otherwise than the former directors did. It is easy enough to be wise after the event.

Yours very respectfully and sincerely,
F. S. Chapman.

Bombay,
My dear Sir Bartle Frere, 9th June 1865.

I enclose a note just received from Mr. Hannay, and would suggest the advisability of a telegram being despatched to the Governor General, asking him to depute to your Excellency the authority referred to to the extent of a crore and a half.

I was at the bank this morning with Lushington, and we both urged on the secretary the necessity of taking legal proceedings against the parties whose bills are overdue. It is difficult to get the lawyers to act, as they are all overworked winding up bankrupts' estates.

The actual crisis is expected early in July.

I propose remaining here until I receive your Excellency's instructions as to whether you wish me to proceed to Poona. I would beg to suggest that Colonel Ballard be appointed a Government director in lieu of Mr. Mangles, whose place has not yet been filled up.

Yours very respectfully and sincerely,
F. S. CHAPMAN.

My dear Chapman, 9th June 1865.

I have seen Kelly who has gone carefully over the different acts. He says that no power to make use of currency reserve in the hands of mintmasters is left with local governments. Clause X. of Act XIX. (1861), however, gives power to the Governor General and Secretary of State to use this money to the extent of 4 crores.

Matters here are so serious that we might be in difficulties any day, and it is time to think how best to face and meet them. I firmly believe that if the Governor had power in case of need to lend the bank, say, a crore to a crore and a half, that hardly any of this money would be needed. As soon as it was known that there was assistance at hand in case of need, the necessity for it would in all probability die away.

Yours sincerely,
R. HANNAY.

P.S.—Your Excellency will observe that the letters are dated yesterday.

My dear Chapman,

Any word from his Excellency. Cash is running away like smoke; we will not be able to go on much longer without assistance I fear; at this rate Monday might bring us to a stop.

Yours sincerely,
R. HANNAY.

F. Chapman, Esq.,
Chief Secretary to Government.

My dear Chapman, Bombay, 13th June 1865.

Things do not look pleasant to-day. Balance is, as you saw, down last night to 98 lacs, exactly one-third of liabilities. To-day Mercantile draws 5 lacs, and there are hosts of other cheques coming in. I may mention that for the requirements of next mail much cash will also be withdrawn. Natives seem determined not to pay, so that the banks have nothing coming in, and unless we get assistance (say, power to pay away one crore and a half of currency notes from Treasury balance,) I fear we shall have to close the doors on Monday.

As I said before (and all with whom I have spoken agree with me), did the public know that the bank would be supported, I believe the natives would take courage and again pay in money. We have, however, now had an opportunity of seeing them in their true colors, and very nasty ones they are. They have ruined their credit for ever.

Yours sincerely,
R. HANNAY.

My dear Chapman, 13th June 1865.

The enclosed from Grant will in some measure tend to show you what outside views are. The remark about the conduct of Government you may pass over; this refers to that unfortunate 18 lacs which Lushington has had to kick backward and foward. To-night people seem very anxious indeed, and declare on all hands that unless Government aid us it will be a case of general ruin.

This, as you are aware, has long been my opinion, and I think that His Excellency would be more than justified by the opinion of the world were he to accept the responsibility of permitting us to use part of the currency balance. If we have to stop the ruin would not be confined to Bombay, it is now the pivot of exchange for the whole east, and the havoc would be terrible.

If anything is decided upon, kindly telegraph, as people are terribly anxious.

Yours sincerely,
R. HANNAY.

My dear Hannay, 13th June 1865.

I am sorry to see the Bank of Bombay statement for the past week, which looks as if things were going from bad to worse. The conduct of the Government seems strange, and is making people anxious.

Several people have been to me asking whether it is possible to induce the Government to increase the issue of notes for a few months to some extent over and above their usual proportion to the coin and securities on hand, so as to increase the circulation temporarily and give accommodation, and it is said the bank directors have taken some steps in this direction. I don't know whether this may be true or not; there are a great many difficulties connected with such a course; but it really seems as if some such measure is imperative to save us all from ruin. What do you think of it yourself? Of course any request for such relief ought to be made by a large body representing the whole monetary interests of the place in order to have weight with the Supreme Government. Even then I doubt if the Simla folks would admit the gravity of the crisis, or the necessity for the step.

Yours sincerely,
ANDREW GRANT.

My dear Chapman, Bombay, 16th June 1865.

The Governor takes a correct view of the case; if the Governor General did not uphold his action, the effect would assuredly be ten times worse than if the remedy had not been tried. I was in hopes, however, that under present pressing need we might have felt assured of his sanction. I hope reply may be favourable, and that we may have it speedily. It would be just like an open loan, the bank would only draw for what was really necessary.

I got your telegram at 11 p.m., and this morning at 6 a.m. sent you one as per copy enclosed.

With reference to Ballard, you are aware that 23 lacs of bar gold is counted as cash as usual; this in ordinary times being readily convertible, but at present can only be sold in small lots. Yesterday Ballard declined to grant us notes for it (would that we had more gold and fewer past due bills); now these are not times for too strict readings of acts. I hope therefore His Excellency will authorize him to advance notes on it. He can sell at leisure on account of the bank. Surely this is not asking very much.

The next part of my telegram we could act on at once, by instructing agents to pay money into local treasuries, in consideration of receiving collector's telegrams, the Mint to give us credit at once, the Bank guaranteeing any expenses that may be incurred.

With exception of Oriential and Asiatic, local banks (old) have behaved very badly. The Mercantile should not have forgotten that the Bank of Bombay saved it from closing its doors during a sickness in its infancy.

No money is coming in, nor will it come till after 1st July, I fear.

Yours sincerely,
R. HANNAY.

P.S. 2.30.—Our best thanks to Sir Bartle for his prompt action re Ballard; your telegram was a great relief; there was a considerable withdrawal in the morning, but few cheques have been presented these last two hours.

If it was known that Government would support us in case of need I daresay we would have a crore paid in within ten days. We have asked Bank of Bengal to give us a credit to extent of 50 lacs.

R. H.

Bombay,
My dear Sir Bartle Frere, 20th June 1865.

A very marked amount of confidence was established directly it became known that Government were prepared to assist the bank in case of need.

From what I can learn there is little chance of aid being now required. I have taken care to tell the directors very plainly that Government would not consider themselves justified in adopting so extreme a measure unless the bank was actually in articulo, and that therefore they should not relax their efforts to help themselves. They are in treaty for an open loan with the Bank of Bengal.

The Mercantile and Agra treated us shamefully, and I hope you approve of our proceedings in returning them the wretched pittance they had left in our hands, and declining all further dealings with them.

I communicated Sir C. Wood's objections regarding the advances on shares to the directors. I fear the measure cannot be justified. In palliation of it it can only be said that the shares were taken in a great measure as collateral security; that the amount actually advanced was comparatively small; that the bank had at the time upwards of two crores lying idle; and that the demand for accommodation on what then appeared excellent security was very urgent. The bank will gladly assimilate their charter to that of Bengal and Madras.

Mangles never formally resigned. I take blame to myself for not having brought to your Excellency's notice the circumstance of the vacancy having occurred. If I remember right I did so verbally some time ago. Ballard is, I think, on the whole the best person to appoint. Marriott is so much away from Bombay.

Our cash balance last evening was 97 lacs, and yesterday the receipts were 3 lacs in excess of the withdrawals. Our liabilities payable on demand amount to 2 crores and some 30 lacs, and unfixed deposits to about half a crore.

The following is the latest state of the Currency Account:

Notes in circulation				4,00,00,000	0 0
Deduct—
Government Securities	1,86,78,199	1	3
Sovereigns	19,00,000	0	0
Deposited in collrs. treasuries	30,00,000	0	0
Bullion could be at once coined	10,00,000	0	0
				2,45,98,199	1 3
Cash available				1,54,01,800	14 9

I have telegraphed to Madras, and requested them to send what money they can spare by the steamer of the 24th.

Lushington sent up to Poona a statement of the probable balances in the different treasuries at the end of June and July respectively, after all expenses have been provided for. The directors ought (and I believe do) to feel very grateful to your Excellency for the prompt and decisive action that has been adopted. There is no chance, I fear, of Lushington and myself getting the requisite information to enable us to submit an official report before the mail.

Believe me
Yours very respectfully and sincerely,
F. S. CHAPMAN.

My dear Sir Bartle Frere, 21st June 1865.

My letter of yesterday will have informed your Excellency that I lost no time in disabusing the directors of the idea that they need take no steps to help themselves. The scheme started by Mr. Brice was, I am told, quite an impracticable one. The Bank of Bengal have promised to accommodate us to the extent of twenty lacs on the ordinary terms, but state that we must furnish special security if we require more. I don't know whether we shall accept their liberal offer on these terms. Madras has promised to send the large sum of ten lacs by the steamer of the 24th.

I am very vexed about that telegram; but doubt whether the public received their first intimation from it. It is commonly asserted that the fact of the Gomment of India having vested this Government with discretionary power was known in the bazaar on the Friday night, and that the intelligence came from Calcutta.

I have just returned from the bank. We have decided upon consulting the solicitor regarding that utterly false statement in to-day's Gazette. Under any circumstances it seems to me most desirable that it should be publicly contradicted. Goodness knows our sins have been heavy enough to merit any amount of abuse, but no good can possibly result from these malicious attacks. There is a great deal of personal and party feeling at the bottom of these attacks. The impression is that Hannay and Tracey are tools in Premchund's hands. My own conviction is that these two men are thoroughly honest and upright. As far as I can learn, they have not directly or indirectly received the slightest assistance from the bank. On the contrary, the Asiatic is one of our best supporters.

I enclose an amended statement of the probable cash balances at the end of the current and of the next month.

Kindly pardon this hurried note. It is just post time. I hope to be in Poona to-morrow evening.

Yours very respectfully and sincerely,
F. S. CHAPMAN.

My dear Sir Bartle Frere, 21st June 1865.

After I wrote this morning Lushington assured me that the contents of the telegram were not divulged by any of the directors. As I mentioned in my letter, the news is said to have been known in the bazaar the previous evening. It was certainly known long before the telegram was opened.

Lushington hopes that the new director will be a resident of Bombay. Foggo's appointment would be a very distasteful one to the other directors, but perhaps their feelings are not entitled to much consideration.

On the whole I am inclined to think Ballard would be the best man, and in this opinion Lushington concurs.

Believe me,
Yours very respectfully and sincerely,
F. S. CHAPMAN.

June 16, 1865.

My dear Chapman,

I was unable to answer question No. 2 by the special messenger, as the Bank did not furnish me with the required information until past 4 o'clock; I now send it you herein. From this statement you will observe that 14½ lakhs of bills are set down as dishonoured at the branches. Of this Hannay tells me that they hope to realise at least one third. Hannay has just brought me your telegram to him intimating the interruption along the line to Simla. He now proposes to ask the Governor to allow the Bank to open a loan with the Currency Department for a sum to be limited by the Government, upon the distinct understanding that not one anna will be taken unless the Bank is severely pressed. If this pressure does take place, the 44 lakhs belonging to Government will of course be absorbed, and Government as well as the Bank will have to suspend payment. Should the Governor hesitate to accord the loan to the Bank, I beg you will obtain his permission for my drawing from the Currency Department such sums as may be required to meet demands against Government should suspension of payments by the Bank take place.

I am, &c.

To A. D. Robertson, Esq., Financial Secretary to Government.

Sir,

I beg to bring to your notice the extremely critical state of financial matters in Bombay at the present moment, and to express my conviction that, unless Government interferes in some manner so as to grant relief, something approaching to a general bankruptcy must take place within the next few days.

2. The mint is working in a more dilatory manner than it ever was known to do before when such an amount of bullion had been tendered to it for coinage, and it is reported that the orders at the mint are that the Assay Department shall not work in excess of the Coinage Department. At present, I believe, the out-turn is only about two lacs a day. Last year, when the pressure was not half so severe as now, the mint worked night and day, and the out-turn was double what it is at present.

3. I would respectfully suggest, as the most obvious mode to me of granting the relief that has become indispensible to the mercantile community, that the mint master should be authorized to issue certificates for an amount approximating to the value of the silver bullion tendered to the mint for coinage. By this mode relief would be granted at once, and I have already stated my conviction that the greatest danger is to be apprehended during the next two or three days; but any other method which to the wisdom of Government may be more expedient would be a boon to the public.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Manager Commercial Bank of India.

To the Honorable A. D. Robertson, Esq, Financial Secretary to Government, Bombay.

Sir,

I have the honor to bring to your notice the present unexampled state of commercial affairs in Bombay. You are doubtless aware of the critical state of the money market, and the great difficulty the public have in procuring money on any security whatever. Should no relief be afforded, and any alarm arise in the bazaar, it is difficult to predict what the consequences might be.

2. In these circumstances I would respectfully suggest that the present time is one when the Government have it in their power to relieve considerably, and probably effectually, the present pressure, by causing to be granted certificates to the public on approximate amounts of silver now lying at the mint. I understand that a very large amount of coined rupees are at the mint, and as the present arrangements there are now incompatible with the wants of the public at this Presidency, the Government would confer a boon on the public by issuing certificates of payment at once, and might possibly be the means of averting a crisis.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 1190 of 1863.

Financial Department,
Bombay Castle, November 20, 1863.

From A. D. ROBERTSON, Esq., Officiating Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay, to E. H. LUSHINGTON, Esq., Secretary to the Government of India.

Sir,

I am directed to bring to the notice of the Government of India the critical position in which the money market of Bombay is at present placed.

2. The Bank of Bombay raised its rates on the 29th ultimo 11 per cent. on Government bills, and 13 per cent. on private bills, and has during the last three weeks been obliged to refuse all accommodation to the public for want of available funds at its command; and so low had the bank's balance fallen that on the 14th instant it stood only as follows:

	Rupees.
Cash - - -	4,13,753
Notes - - -	5,77,580
Total - - -	9,91,333

3. The other banks, it is believed, are also in a similar position; and the managers of two of them,* copies of whose letters are annexed, have addressed Government on the subject, requesting that the Mint-master be authorized to issue mint certificates for amounts approximating to the value of the silver bullion tendered to the mint for coinage.

4. This state of matters, which it was believed would have been relieved after the Dewallee (at which time there is always a temporary pressure, owing to the practice of the native merchants of accumulating all their available money in their houses for luck's sake), is, I am to observe, prevailing, while there is no want of bullion in the hands of the Banks and European firms, and if this bullion could be converted into coin the immense pressure on the market would at once be removed.

5. His Excellency the Governor in Council has informed the agents of the banks above referred to, that the issue of mint certificates, as suggested by them, is out of the question, as it would merely transfer the pressure from them to Government; but instructions have, I am to state, been issued, directing the Mint-master to expedite, as far as the power of the establishment will admit, the assay of the silver bullion already tendered to the mint;† and, with a view to provide for the payment of the certificates when ready, the Deputy Auditor and Accountant-General has been authorized to transfer 60 lacs of rupees from the currency department to the mint, in exchange for an equivalent in bullion, in addition to the transfer of the 20 lacs of rupees previously reported to have been made in my letter of the 13th instant, No. 1155.

6. But as there is no indication of any relaxation in the importation of bullion, and as no portion of the machinery of the new mint will be in operation until the beginning of January next, (when the engines, and the rolling mill, adjusting mill, and cutting-out room, are all expected to be ready,) I am instructed to request that the Government of India will, at their earliest convenience, order, as an additional measure of relief, a remittance of coined rupees to be made to this Presidency to any extent possible.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Letter from the Bank of Bombay, No. 3278, dated the 8th May 1862, requesting that an extraordinary meeting of the local Legislative Council may be called for the purpose of passing the bill for the re-incorporation and re-constitution of the bank, and urging the importance of the Government treasuries at Poona, Ahmedabad, and Surat being made over to them.

Minute by his Excellency the Governor, dated the 26th May 1862.

A copy of the draft of the new charter goes home by this mail to the Secretary of State, for his consideration. The bank might be informed in reply to their letter that the Government has referred on the subject of the bill to the Secretary of State, and that it is not likely the bill can be passed before the next ordinary meeting of the Legislative Council. But no delay, which it is in the power of this Government to avoid, shall be allowed to interfere with the passing of the Act.

Does the transfer of the treasury business depend on the Act? If not, we may consider that separately.

Letter from the Secretary to the Bank of Bombay, dated 13th June 1862, No. 3905, protesting against the delay in passing the Charter Bill, and in transferring to the bank the treasury business at Poona, Ahmedabad, and Surat.

Minute by his Excellency the Governor, dated 1st July 1862.

In reply to para. 2, the bank may be informed that the letter from the Government of India was not received in Bombay until the 29th or 30th April, and not till long after the sessions of the Legislative Department had been brought to a close (this will be sufficient as to delay), add that the Governor in Council would gladly have complied with the request to lay the Charter Bill before our extraordinary session of council, but that in the interim doubts had arisen as to how far its provisions were in accordance with the views of the Secretary of State, and these doubts could not be resolved without a reference to England, in making which no time was lost.

The bank cannot be more anxious than the Governor in Council for the passing of the bill, but until assured as to the views of the Secretary of State it cannot be proceeded with. The whole correspondence has gone home to the Secretary of State.

Chief Secretary's Memo. Para. 7.

"With respect to para. 7 of the letter, I beg to explain that the agreement referred to is the one which has been executed between the bank and the Government, in the 20th Article of which provision has been made for the establishment of branch banks, and that we are awaiting a reply to the letter to the Government of India, No. 783, dated 7th instant, to enable us to decide the terms on which the Government treasuries at the stations at which branch banks have been re-established by the bank are to be made over to it."

Inform the bank that this the case.

Letter from the Government of India, No. 6280, dated 17th December 1863, remarking that on the 14th November 1863 the balance of the Bombay Bank was Rs. 9,91,333, while its liabilities payable on demand were on the same date Rupees 1,56,71,745, and requesting information as to what explanation the Government directors give of a bank in the proper management of which Government are so much concerned having been allowed to fall into this state.

Minute by S. D. Birch, Esq., Government director of the Bank of Bombay, dated 27th January 1864, concurred in by the Honourable A. D. Robertson, giving explanations on the above subject.

Resolution.—Resolved that the following letter be addressed to the Secretary to the Government of India:—

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, No. 6280, dated 17th December 1863, relative to the state of the balances of the Bank of Bombay in November last, and to forward herewith copy of a minute by Mr. S. D. Birch, Government director of the bank, concurred in by the Honourable A. D. Robertson, together with a copy of memorandum with which your letter and the above minute were placed before the Honorable the Governor in Council.

2. I am instructed to state that this Government do not see any grounds for holding the Government directors, who are only three out of nine members of the board of directors of the bank, in any way responsible for the general management of the bank. That management, I am to observe, was freely criticised at the period to which your letter refers, by the public press and the commercial community, but Government find that the pressure then experienced by the Bank of Bombay was shared by every one of the numerous banking institutions in Bombay.

3. This Government are not in a position to judge to what extent a different system of management might have enabled the Bank of Bombay to hold a better position. His Excellency in Council would, however, have gladly gone further into this question, but for a conviction that Government themselves are not in a position to censure the bank's administration, for the reasons noticed in Mr. Birch's minute.

Letter No. 621, dated 22d June 1863.
Letter No. 958, dated 19th September 1863.
Letter No. 1,102, dated 28th October 1863.

4. The balances in the district treasuries have not been made over to the bank, owing to the non-receipt of the authority asked in my letters noted in the margin, and I am further to state that the unexpectedly heavy drafts from the Secretary of State have led to the Government balances being overdrawn.

5. Since the pressure above adverted to took place, the capital of the bank has been doubled, and a proposition has since been agreed to by the shareholders for a further increase; but I am desired to submit it is not the less desirable that this Government should be enabled to fulfil their engagements to the bank by handing over to it the balances in the district treasuries.

Financial Department.

To

A. D. Robertson, Esq.,
Offg. Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

Sir,

In your letter to me, dated the 20th November, you stated that so low had the balance of the Bank of Bombay fallen, that on the 14th of that month it stood only as follows:

Cash	- - -	Rs. 4,13,753
Notes	- - -	5,77,580
	Total Rs.	9,91,333

2. According to the statement of the affairs of the bank published in the Gazette, the liabilities of the bank payable on demand were on the same date Rupees 1,56,71,745.

3. The Governor General in Council requests to be informed what explanation the Government directors give of the affairs of a bank in the proper management of which the Government is so much concerned having been allowed to fall into this state.

4. The bank is at liberty, under its agreement with the Government, to employ the Government balance in ordinary business of the bank to the extent of 40 lacs of rupees, the rest of the Government balance being reserved in coin. As the 40 lacs of rupees in question were included in the liabilities of the bank on the 14th of November, whilst the bank's reserve in cash and notes amounted only to less than 10 lacs, it is obvious that the bank could not have paid any orders that might have been made upon this portion of the Government balance to a greater extent than one fourth of the whole amount.

5. Great efforts are being made to strengthen the Government balance at Bombay with supplies of coin, but if the affairs of the bank which is intrusted with the Government balances are conducted in this manner, the amount at which that balance can be maintained must be considered to be always minus 40 lacs of rupees, or £400,000, and in order to secure the same available sum the balance must be permanently increased to a corresponding amount.

6. The Governor General in Council requests to be informed what remedy the Governor in Council proposes to apply to this state of things.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Extracts from a Minute by Mr. Birch, Government director of the Bank of Bombay.

Para. 5. During only the first eight months of the arrangement with Government, the balance at its credit with the Bank of Bombay was generally in excess of the maximum. Since then the fluctuations have been so great, and the amount has so often been below the 30 lacs, that the Government business has been one of much anxiety, and but of little benefit to the bank.

6. If this statement of facts is accepted, the consideration of the last paragraph of the letter under reference would seem to be unnecessary, except in so far as it may be expedient for a proper carrying out of the agreement with the bank that the Government balance should be materially and permanently increased.

* * * *

14. In considering this question it must be borne in mind that the immediate contraction of the bank's business had been rendered more difficult by the necessity that had been forced upon it of supplying the branches with funds. When it was decided by the directors to establish branch banks, the measure passed on the understanding that the Government would be prepared at once to make over the Government business and the treasuries, on certain conditions, wherever a branch might, with its sanction, be opened. The course that had been pursued with the Bank of Bengal led the board to the conclusion that no delay would take place in this arrangement; but, although several branches have now existed upwards of 22 months, not one of the Government treasuries has as yet been made over. The result has been, that instead of the branches having funds at their disposal from sources the directors conceived they were justified in relying upon, the head office has been compelled to keep them supplied; instead of being feeders to it, as it was expected they would be, they have been a continuous drain.

Minute by the Honorable Mr. Robertson, Government director of the Bank of Bombay.

I concur in the foregoing, and have nothing additional to suggest.

Letter from the officiating deputy secretary, Bank of Bombay, No. 1921, dated 11th May 1864, forwarding copy of a letter addressed by the directors of the bank to the Honorable Sir Charles Trevelyan, complaining of the delay which has taken place in transferring Government treasury business at certain up-country stations to the branches established by the bank.

Resolution recorded.

Copy of Exhibit marked A 178.

To the Honorable Sir C. E. Trevelyan, K.C.B.

From James Blair, Secretary and Treasurer of the Bank of Bombay.

Sir, Bombay, ———

1. In accordance with the instructions of the directors of the Bank of Bombay, I beg to address you on the subject of the present position of the bank with regard to the local Government treasuries at certain places in this Presidency.

2. You are aware that on the 28th of February 1862 an agreement was entered into between the Government and the Bank of Bombay, by which the latter were to take over the management of the Government treasury in Bombay, and whereby provision was made for handing over to the bank, under certain circumstances, the Government treasuries at those places at which the bank might establish branches.

3. Before this agreement was executed there had been some negotiation between the Government and the directors, and it was upon the clear understanding that the treasuries would be handed over at those places at which the bank should establish branches that the directors entered into the agreement of February 1862. Immediately after that agreement was executed the directors proceeded to establish branches, and they now have branches at Ahmedabad, Belgaum, Broach, Baroda, Bhownuggur, Dharwar, Hydrabad, Deccan, Indore, Kurrachee, Oomrawuttee, Poona, Surat, and Sholapoor, but at not one of such places has the treasury been handed over to the bank.

4. The directors wrote to Sir Charles Wood on the subject, and I beg to annex a copy of the letter of the 10th of October 1862, which contains a statement of the facts of the case. In reply to this letter the bank were informed that instructions had been sent out to the Government of India. Subsequently the directors wrote to his Excellency the Governor General of India, and annexed is a copy of the letter, dated the 25th June 1863.

5. In the month of January last a deputation on behalf of the bank, consisting of Mr. Tristram and Mr. Hannay, waited upon Sir Charles Wood, in London, and after some conversation with him he stated that you were in possession of his views on the subject, and that he would write to you again, and that any further communication from the bank should be addressed to you.

6. Under these circumstances, I am instructed to apply to you, and to request that the Government will, without any further delay, perform its part of the agreement, and hand over to the bank the management of the treasuries at the several places at which the bank has established branches.

7. The delay hitherto has been of serious injury to the bank. In full faith that the Government would perform the agreement, and would place at their disposal the several balances at the local treasuries, the directors at once proceeded to establish branches, but they have not received these balances, and have been obliged to supply the funds necessary for carrying on the business at the branches. The result is that the arrangement, which should have been a beneficial one, has tended to increase, instead of relieve, the monetary pressure which was recently felt in Bombay. Had the arrangement been carried out, it is not too much to say that the great pressure which existed in Bombay would not have been nearly so severe as it was.

8. The delay, moreover, has had a tendency to damage the reputation of the bank. When a branch was established at any place it was stated, and publicly believed, that the local treasury would be handed over to the bank. That we were justified in making such a statement is evident from the Government notification, in which the agreement of February 1862 was published, and wherein it was stated that the bank was prepared to establish branches at the several places therein mentioned. As the Government have not as yet handed over the treasuries the native merchants doubt the bonâ fides and stability of the bank, and generally abstain from making any deposits at the branches, though they in some cases express their willingness to make fixed deposits of large amount if the Government business is in the hands of the bank.

I have the honor to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) J. Blair,
Secretary and Treasurer of the
Bank of Bombay.

Copy of Exhibit marked A 17.

To his Excellency the Governor General of India in Council.

From James Blair, Esq., Secretary and Treasurer of the Bank of Bombay.

My Lord, Bombay, 25th June 1863.

1. Under instructions from the directors of the Bank of Bombay, I have the honor to address your Excellency under the following circumstances:

2. In 1861, the terms of an agreement between the Government of Bombay and the Bank of Bombay with reference to the Treasury business were arranged, but down to this time the same have not been fully carried out, and the new Act for the re-incorporation of the bank has not yet received the sanction of your Excellency.

3. The directors, in agreeing to take over the Treasury business, clearly understood that if they should establish branches at unoccupied places the Treasury business there would be handed over to them. They accordingly executed an agreement, dated the 28th of February 1862, for taking over the Treasury business in Bombay, and for issuing the currency notes; and at once proceeded to establish branches at various places. The Treasury business in Bombay has been handed over to the bank, but at none of the branches has the local Treasury business been handed over.

4. Several applications were made to the Government of Bombay for the transfer of these treasuries, but without success; and the directors therefore, on the 10th of October 1862, addressed Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India on the subject. I beg to annex a copy of the letter which was so sent, in which the circumstances of the case are fully set out.

5. In reply to this letter, the directors have been favoured with a letter dated the 14th of November last (a copy of which is also hereunto annexed), from which it appears that Sir Charles Wood had declared the principles upon which the Treasury business was to be handed over to the bank, and that it rested with the Governments of India and Bombay to carry the arrangement into effect.

6. Since the receipt of that letter, the directors have been anxiously waiting to receive from the Government of Bombay an intimation that the local treasuries would at once be handed over to them, and they have frequently applied to Government on the subject, but they regret to say that they have not as yet received any such intimation, and they are now informed that the subject is under the consideration of the Government of India.

7. The Bank of Bombay has established branches at Poona, Ahmedabad, Surat, Sholapoor, Dharwar, and Kurrachee, and has incurred great expense in so doing; but though upwards of a year has elapsed, none of the Treasuries at any of the above places have been transferred to the bank. This delay affects the bank not only in a pecuniary manner but also in its reputation, as a false impression may be formed that the arrangement between the Government and the bank cannot be carried out. I am therefore instructed to draw your Excellency's attention to the position of the matter, and respectfully to request that the necessary instructions may at once be given for carrying into effect the arrangement between the bank and the Government of Bombay.

8. I am further instructed to address your Excellency with reference to the new Act for the re-incorporation of the bank. It is not necessary that I should here mention the several steps which were taken at first for obtaining this Act, as they are set forth in the letter of the 10th October, hereunto annexed, and it will be sufficient if I state that the bill was introduced at the last session of the Bombay Legislative Council, and was passed on the 11th March last, and that it has not yet received the sanction of your Excellency.

9. I am instructed to say that the directors in now addressing your Excellency do so with great reluctance, and from the belief that the importance of the matters above alluded to compels them to take this step. At the last annual meeting of the proprietors, in August 1862, the directors reported that they were then in communication with Government with reference to the transfer of the local treasuries, and the passing of the new Act. They are now about to meet again the proprietors, and they find that matters are in much the same state as they were last year, and they fear that from the fact that the correspondence has been so protracted the interests of the bank will suffer.

10. Under these circumstances, as the directors are informed that these matters are now under the consideration of the Government of India, I am instructed respectfully to request that they may receive the early attention of your Excellency, in order that at the annual general meeting on the 3d of August next the directors may be able to report the completion of the arrangements.

I have the honor to be,
My Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient and humble servant,

Secretary and Treasurer of the Bank of Bombay.

Minute by His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, dated 28th October 1864.

There can, I think, be no doubt that the anticipations of evil resulting from unrestrained speculation by Government Officers in shares, &c. to which Sir George Clerk gave expression in his Minutes commencing with that of the 15th November 1861, are likely to be, if they have not already been realized, and that the good name and efficiency of the Government Service is exposed to immediate risk of injury in the precise manner expected by him.

2. As remarked when this subject was discussed in 1861 and 1862, it is much easier to see the evil than to devise any remedy which may not do much more harm than good. Positive restrictions which would substitute fixed rules for a high tone of general feeling would certainly have this effect, and I have in vain attempted to suggest any such rule which would not be easy of evasion, if the moral sense of the services were once impaired, in such a time of speculative mania as that through which we have just past, and of which a second season seems now impending over us.

3. I can think of nothing more effectual than to recall attention to the general principles to which Sir George Clerk's Minutes give such forcible expression, point out to the Service the extreme importance of obedience to the spirit of those just remarks rather than to the letter of the law, and intimate that in future Government will be guided in its action in accordance with the principles laid down by Sir George Clerk, and concurred in by the Govermnent of India and the Secretary of State.

4. I would further note that no one connected with the Government as a Member of the Secretariat, or as a head or part of the Establishment of a Department, or of any Office at or near the Presidency, in which the affairs of any Company are likely to form matter of official discussion, can with propriety become interested, even as a shareholder, in such Company.

5. Officers must judge for themselves whether the nature of their official connexion is likely to be such as to require that they should dispose of any shares they may have possessed before coming into any official relation with the scheme.

6. But it is a safe rule that no such officer should undertake fresh liabilities as a shareholder in any scheme with which he, or the head of his office, can, however remotely, be so connected. I would therefore propose that the following Circular, addressed to all heads of Departments under Government, be published in the Government Gazette, and communicated to the Secretary of State and the Government of India.

28th October 1864. H. B. E. Frere.

CIRCULAR.*

In forwarding, for communication to all Officers under your control, the annexed Extracts† from the Proceedings of Government in 1861 to 1863, the Governor in Council considers it necessary to recall to the recollection of all Departments of the Government service that so recently as the 31st May 1862 the Right Honourable the Secretary of State recorded for publication that, although as a general rule he saw no objection to the servants of Government holding shares in Joint Stock Companies, having for their object the development of the resources of the country, still it was necessary to impose the restriction that public servants should take no part in the management of such Institutions, and should not be employed within the districts where the operations of the Company might be carried on.

† Extract (paragraphs 2 to 10) of a Minute by Sir George Clerk, dated 15th November 1861.
Extract (paragraphs 1, 4, 5, and 6) of a Minute by Sir George Clerk, dated 26th December 1861.
Letter from the Government of India, No. 1421, dated 11th March 1862.
Extract from the Proceedings of the Government of India, No. 453, dated 16th January 1863.

2. The Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India likewise concurred in the view held by Sir George Clerk that, in order to discourage speculation in the public funds and undue connexion with Joint Stock Companies, supercession in promotion was the proper and practicable course for enforcing the orders of Government.

Vide notification of the Government of India, No. 383, of the Home Department, Revenue, dated Fort William, 16th January 1863, republished in Government Gazette of Bombay, under date February 4th, 1863.

3. His Excellency the Governor in Council now desires to point out to all public servants of Government at this particular period, when there is so strong a tendency to speculation in Bombay, the extreme importance of obedience to the spirit of all the previous orders above alluded to, rather than to the mere letter of the law, and to repeat that Government will be guided in its action in strict accordance with the principles laid down by Sir George Clerk, concurred in by the Government of India, and BY already promulgated in this Presidency under the orders of the Right Honourable the Secretary of State.

4. The Governor in Council has no wish to go further than is absolutely necessary in defining, by specific restrictions, limitations easily recognized by that high-toned sense of public duty which has always stood out as one of the strong characteristics of the Indian services; and he believes it to be only necessary † to remind all Public Servants of the great importance of avoiding any connexion, however remote, with any undertaking which might tend, under any contingency, to fetter their action, or divert them from the numerous and important responsibilities imposed by the public service upon them.

5. Without, therefore, attempting to lay down stringent rules on the subject, the CAUTION EVERY Governor in Council would ^ point out generally that it is very clear that no one connected with the Government as members of the Secretariat Establishment, or as belonging to a Department or Office at or near the Presidency, in which the affairs of AS TO THE EXTREME RISK HE RUNS any Company are in anywise likely to form a matter of official reference or discussion, ‡ ^ IN BECOMING can with propriety, more especially during the present period of excitement, § ^ become a shareholder, even in a non-trading sense, in Joint Stock Companies, without incurring the risk of having his motives misconstrued.

§ should he become a shareholder in any such Company.

6. Where any officer has held shares, under the general permission accorded by Government previous to his appointment to such an office as has been above described, and he wishes to retain them as an investment, the case is materially altered, and His Excellency in Council confidently leaves such cases to be dealt with according to each officer's sense of the proper course to be followed in the spirit of the instructions now laid down.

Minute by the Honourable W. E. Frere, dated 29th October 1864.

I agree generally with His Excellency the President, as I did in 1861 with Sir George Clerk, on this subject, and am quite prepared, under the present state of things, to publish a notification on the subject; and if His Excellency will consent to the alterations I have suggested in pencil * in the last paragraph but one of the notification, and to omit the last paragraph, the notification will have my full concurrence.

29*th October* 1864. W. E. Frere.

Minute by His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, dated 2d November 1864.

These papers should be re-circulated after we have had the benefit of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief's views on the subject.

2. It may save time, and prevent discussion diverging into needless generalities, if I briefly recapitulate the evils we have to correct, and the mode whereby I propose, as far as lies in our power, to correct them.

1*stly*.—The evils are that our Government Officers have their attention diverted from their own proper official business, for which they are paid, and are thereby tempted to give an undue portion of their time and attention to the private business of investing any money they have to spare.

2*ndly*.—That the acquisition of shares, or any application for shares, or hope of obtaining them in any scheme which can come before a Government Officer officially, or with the promoters or managers of which he can be brought into official contact, must, to some extent, interfere with such Officer doing his official duty towards the undertaking,—not necessarily by inducing him unduly to favour the undertaking, but very often by making him hesitate to promote the undertaking in the same manner he would have done had he possessed no private or personal interest in it.

3*rdly*.—That by the operation of the causes above alluded to the good name or efficiency of the Government Service suffers, and the high feeling which ought to actuate the Service is impaired.

3. What I propose to do towards remedying these evils is—

1*stly*.—To state explicitly, and more publicly than has hitherto been done, the views held by Government on the subject, not merely with the object of warning the Service as to the letter and spirit of the law, and the intention of Government to enforce it, but also to recall to a sense of their duty to the Public Service those servants who may have been inclined to forget them. A Public Servant must necessarily often be debarred by a sense of public duty from doing that which, if he were a private individual, would be perfectly unobjectionable.

2*ndly*.—Having done this, which does not appear to me to have been effectually done by anything hitherto made public, I would act on the rule that Government will not permit its servants to become shareholders in Joint Stock Companies whose operations are carried on within the sphere, territorial or departmental, of such Officer's official duties, and that whenever Government becomes aware that this rule has been infringed it will notice the infringement, in any manner which may seem most advisable, in connection with such Officer's appointment or promotion.

2*d November* 1864. H. B. E. Frere.

Minute by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, dated 5th November 1864.

In treating the very difficult question raised by His Excellency the President, we have to bear in mind some considerations to omit attention to which might not impossibly defeat the object we have in view.

2. In the first place I think we should be careful not to go beyond the limit laid down by the Government of India—Vide 2nd and 3rd paragraphs of letter No. 1421.

3. Investment proper is in no manner forbidden to Her Majesty's Civil and Military Servants in India, but the latter are prohibited from directing companies or taking a direct part in trading. I call attention to the word "direct," because indirectly trading on their part is not contrary to regulation, for any shareholder in a bank or other trading or industrial company is a trader in the eye of the law, and liable accordingly.

4. The Government of India considers, however, that which is called "stock-jobbing," i.e. gambling in shares and exchanges, should be stopped by the rigorous intimation of the displeasure of Government toward those of their servants who engage in the practice. It appears to me that the injunction for the discouragement of such "jobbing" should be enforced, and that on occasion we should be guided in this matter by our general information. A Civil or Military Servant, Covenanted or Uncovenanted, on being passed over for such cause, should be informed of the reason why he has been so treated, and I would then leave the onus of exculpation to him, actual proof only being accepted that the general and apparently well-founded report was false.

5. The points stated in Mr. Anderson's memoranda open a wide field. So far as he is personally concerned, his defence appears to be thoroughly and completely effective.

6. It is doubtless a matter of feeling, rather than of duty which can be enforced, as to whether a public servant should or should not take shares, either by allotment or purchase, in a given undertaking.

7. It is clear that no officer who is in the position of an adviser to Government on the proposed scheme, or who is habitually employed in giving counsel or as an arbitrator in cognate matters, should permit himself to contract interests which interfere with the independence of his judgment. But this may happen in various modes even without his interesting himself in the particular undertaking the revision of which may come within his own Department.

8. Thus A, a Secretary of the Public Works Department, may reject, we will say, an allotment of Back Bay shares because of the Government connection with the Back Bay concession, while he may be receiving an allotment of Bank shares originating from the same promoters as those who started the Back Bay scheme. The premium in a rising and excited market, as our experience of the last two years tells us, is as certain in one as in the other, and the favour done to A is as great as that secured to B, who, being, we will say, in the Judicial Department, took his Back Bay shares without compunction, because he was not personally concerned as an adviser to Government with respect to the Back Bay concession.

9. The same thing in another form may be said even with regard to the Bombay Bank. It would have been easy for A to get intelligence from those who might wish to secure him that there was an intention to propose the successive increases of capital which have taken place in that institution, ensuring much benefit to those who were shareholders before the increases were ordered. Such intelligence is conveyed by a wink or casual observation, and without any tangible official breach of confidence. It is acted on, and an immense obligation is conferred on the man who has benefited by it. Guaranteed Railways are not much sought after now-a-days. But it is easy to conceive a case of a Government servant who is in the position to advise on the expediency of adopting a given line making use of his knowledge to take up shares with the hope of securing premiums hereafter. This would doubtless have occurred before Railways were "found out."

10. I have mentioned these illustrations to show the enormous difficulty by which the subject is surrounded, and what appears to me the danger of drawing any distinctions with respect to the character of speculations or investments in any Resolution we may propose to publish.

11. It cannot escape us that whatever may be so published will be subjected to a very searching criticism, and will have to stand the fire of interested depreciation in every possible form, including that of ridicule.

12. This latter circumstance may possibly do away with the benefit we hope to effect. But I am not on that account inclined to forego the effort. I am led to this by the consideration that many estimable men may be induced to pause before they get the habit of "stock-jobbing," or before they yield to the temptations around, and make their premier coup d'essai.

13. After giving the matter the most attentive consideration, I submit with much deference that our Resolution might be in some such form as the following:—

"The Honorable the Governor in Council considers it advisable to republish the letter from the Government of India, dated 11th March 1862, No. 1421.

"The Governor in Council feels it his duty to warn Officers of all ranks in the employ of Government that the injunctions conveyed in the foregoing letter will be acted up to in any instances of violation of the rule contained in it—vide paragraph 3—which may be brought to the notice of Government.

"The Governor in Council takes this opportunity of inviting the attention of Government Officers of every rank to the fact that to transgress the rules laid down by the Government of India in the matter cannot fail to interfere with their efficiency, and probably, in many instances, to incapacitate them for the performance of their duties with that honorable conscientiousness which has hitherto been the distinction of the Public Service in this country.

"The effect of such engrossing employment as that of the Stock Exchange is, of course, various with different men. But that which may be comparatively innocuous in the case of one is absolutely fatal to another. According to the most favorable view, we must admit that it is impossible for any man who is absorbed in the gambling of the Stock Market to remain with his mind and time free for the service of his employer, whom he is bound to serve according to his bond.

"It is probable that amidst the excitement of an extraordinary time this consideration may occasionally escape notice. But the Honorable the Governor in Council feels it requires but to be mentioned to produce its full effect.

"One point in connection with the above deserves grave reflection.

"Every Public Officer, whether immediately connected with Government or not, who is in a position rendering it likely that he may be called on to advise or to arbitrate between Government and the promoters of industrial or commercial schemes should take the most special care to keep himself free from any investment or engagement which might tend to interfere with the independence of his judgment, or in any manner to cause a conflict between his private interests and his public duties.

"It is obviously impossible to lay down exact definition in such matters. They must be in great measure left to the honour and discretion of the members of the Service. But the caution here given cannot fail to be held by all sensible men to be an ordinary rule of business, and any disregard of it, if satisfactorily established in the eyes of the Government, must of necessity be treated accordingly."

W. R. Mansfield.

5th November 1864.

Minute by His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, dated 11th November 1864.

I did not intend to impose any restriction beyond what was imposed before, nor do I see that the last paragraph of my draft goes at all beyond what the Government of India and the Secretary of State authorize; my object is to make the views of those authorities better known, and to keep them more constantly present to the recollection of our servants.

2. The last paragraph of the draft might certainly have the effect anticipated by the Honourable Mr. Frere of much limiting the field of investments of men who aspire to the highest offices in India, and I think that on reconsideration Mr. Frere will agree with me that it is desirable it should have such effect.

3. As long as a man is content to finish his service with a Mofussil appointment there can be no objection to his investing his savings or fortune in any Presidency scheme which has nothing directly to do with his own District.

4. But if he aspires to higher office, say to the head of a Department at the Presidency, he would, I think, wisely consider, when disposed to take shares in such a project, whether he could consistently with his duty keep them if he got into high office at the Presidency, when he or his fellow servants would have frequent occasion to deal officially with the Company.

5. If he had got the shares as an investment without thinking of the future, and subsequently found himself in a position of official relation with the Company, he ought, I think, as suggested in the draft, to consider whether he can without risk of misconception of his motives continue to hold his shares. It is quite possible he might be able to do so, but it is equally possible that his being a shareholder might cause a great scandal. It is impossible to lay down any rule: each case must depend on the Officer's position, the extent of his stake in the Company, and many other circumstances which no one can well judge of but himself. He can easily do so if he considers, not the qualities of the stock as an investment, but the probable result of the investment on his own character and on that of the service to which he belongs.

6. This is all I propose to suggest, and all, I think, that can be inferred from the paragraph.

7. These proceedings should be reported to the Secretary of State and to the Government of India, the notification, as concurred in by a majority of the Board, being meantime issued.

Secretary and Treasurer,

My dear Sir,

Your Directors have this day granted you an extension of 6 months leave after much discussion, and chiefly upon my stating that I believed were you granted an extension for six months that you would most probably not return to India. I would most strongly urge you, nay entreat you, not to come back. Circumstances have much altered the position of affairs since you were here. The out-standings of the Bank in the business of 1864 are enormous, and as the Direction will soon be entirely changed, I cannot see that you would have any comfort in returning to your old post. Mr. Robertson, who has worked most zealously, has been made trustee on numerous estates, and were his position in the Bank lowered this would lessen his prestige and do injury to the institution.

As a friend, I strongly advise you to resign before your leave expires; this you can now do with much more credit than if no extra leave had been granted.

Believe me,
Yours very truly,

BANK OF BOMBAY.

As regards the past there is much which is full of instruction, but which I do not find on record in these papers.* With the exception of a very few papers, mostly telegrams, the Viceroy does not seem to have recorded what I addressed to him direct, though I begged his Excellency (vide P.S. to my letter of 15th June 1865 and 7th July 1865), to make what use he thought proper of my letters, and gave my reasons for not writing to him in the ordinary official form.

Some of the information which I thus forwarded is almost essential to a clear understanding of the position, and I therefore submit copies of such letters as I have by me; and I would leave it to the Secretary of State to circulate or record them, or deal with them as he thinks best for the public interest.

It will be seen that the past history of the bank divides itself into three clearly marked periods,— 1stly. A period of good management under the original Secretary, Mr. Stuart, and under the old rules and byelaws, which were very similar to those of the Banks of Bengal and Madras.

I believe that all these rules and checks were in operation up to 1862, at least up to the time when Mr. Ellis ceased to be, as Financial Secretary to Government, an ex officio Director.

2dly. A period of very reckless mismanagement, nearly coincident with the excitement in the cotton trade consequent on the civil war in America (say from 1862 to 1865). During the greater part of this period, Mr. Birch, the Government Accountant General, appointed by and only accountable to the Government of India, was Chairman, and Mr. Blair, Secretary.

Most of the old rules and byelaws were relaxed or disregarded, and many formally set aside, without, as far as I am aware, any intimation to the local Government.

The capital was doubled with, I believe, the general consent, not only of the shareholders, but of the great body of the local mercantile community. A new charter was granted in which one of the few legislative checks on unsafe advances was removed. I do not recollect that, either by writers in the public press or by any branch of the local commercial community, was any opposition offered to either measure before its adoption, which was in both cases, very deliberate, including preliminary references to the Secretary of State, in, I think, both instances.

It was during this period that the increased capital of the Bank was lent out in a very reckless manner, and the foundation laid of all its subsequent misfortunes.

It is worthy of note, that the first warning we had of anything wrong came from the Secretary of State. I have not Sir Charles Wood's letter at hand, and cannot just now give the exact date, but it must have been just before the crash in April 1865, for I communicated what Sir C. Wood had told me to Mr. Chapman, who had then recently joined as Revenue Secretary, and ex officio a Government Director of the Bank.

3dly. A period of almost unvarying pressure and misfortune, commencing with the collapse in the price of cotton which followed the sudden cessation of the war in America in April 1865.

The price of cotton then fell in one fortnight from 20*d.* and 24*d.* to 9*d.* per pound; and when it is considered that the Indian cotton trade of the year previous was valued at 38 millions sterling, and that almost every large firm in Bombay was directly concerned in that trade, the extent of the distress caused by the sudden fall in the price of this great staple may be imagined.

This pressure was expected to relax after the settling day for time bargains in cotton, which then stood for July 1865, but with the exception of a delusive appearance of returning high prices of cotton on two or three subsequent occasions, there has since been no prospect of the Bank being for 12 months together in a position to be really independent of Government support, nor, I believe, of the forbearance of its other principal constituents.

I do not think that inquiry will show that when all the circumstances are taken into consideration, there is much fault to be found with the Bank management during this last period, i.e. since April 1865.

The mischief had all been done before that time.

The Chairmen, Directors, and Secretary have been, with few exceptions, different persons from those who mismanaged the Bank between 1862 and 1865, and of whom the most influential had left India just before the crash came in April 1865.

The bank has been much blamed for the policy of forbearance which has been pursued since 1865, and the Government of India has expressed strong opinions that the Government of Bombay should have enforced a more rigorous mode of proceeding with all the Bank's debtors.

It is quite possible that had the Bank then pursued a sterner system, the total amount of ultimate loss and suffering would have been lessened.

But I am quite sure that nothing could have induced a Board of local directors, composed partly of Government officials, inexperienced in commerce, and partly of merchants deeply interested in the import and export trade, and all untrained to real banking, to follow out such a policy, with the knowledge that it must involve extensive immediate ruin, the whole of which would of course be naturally set down to the harshness of the Bank.

Nor have I ever been able to understand in what manner the Government of India would have had the local Government interfere to make the Bank "gather up its resources," which simply meant to press for immediate payment from a body of debtors who were at the time clearly insolvent, and unable to meet their liabilities. We put in the best men we could find as Government Directors, and the best of all, the man on whom I should mainly have relied, both to discover what was faulty in the past and to carry out strictly what was for the ultimate good of the Bank in the future, was removed by the Government of India, in order to put in an officer of their own.

We gave the Government Directors every support in pressing on the Board the necessity for the strictest possible discharge of their duties, and I do not see what more could have been done, without undertaking the entire management of the Bank, a task for which, I venture to say, no Government that ever existed in India is or was ever fitted.

It must be borne in mind that there have been three distinct crises in the misfortunes of the Bank.

The first, between April and July 1865, was clearly due almost exclusively to the Bank's own mismanagement during a previous period of very exceptional trial and temptation.

The next, in December 1865, was almost equally due to the mismanagement of the Government Financial and Currency Departments in Calcutta, which, by reducing cash balances too low, almost produced a momentary State Bankruptcy.

The Bank was then unable to help Government, but it had little to do with creating the necessity for help.

The third crisis, in June 1866, was the natural result of having a weak State Bank, which did not possess the confidence of the community at a time when the financial pressure all over the world rendered the existence of a strong State Bank of peculiar importance to such an emporium as Bombay.

The difficulties of the Bank, like those of all similar institutions in India, have been greatly aggravated by the very unsatisfactory state of the law regarding bankruptcies, and the liabilities of joint stock companies. A well meant attempt which was made at the suggestion of Chief Justice Sir Matthew Sausse, to effect a temporary and local amendment of the law, did not answer, and in the opinion of many mercantile men and lawyers only made matters worse.

I see that the shareholders have lately proposed to memorialize Government to aid in an inquiry into the past history of the Bank. I have not much hope that any very substantial good will result from any such inquiry, in the shape of any fresh information regarding transactions which the managers of past years may wish to conceal. But there is some chance of important information being elicited, if the shareholders and directors join with Government in making a thorough inquiry, and if nothing new is elicited, even such a negative result will not be worthless.

I would therefore suggest that a telegram be sent to the Governor of Bombay, informing him that if such an application comes before him, the Secretary of State wishes him to give every aid to the inquiry. Unless assured of the support of the Secretary of State in such an inquiry, it is possible the Governor of Bombay may doubt whether any adequate result is likely to follow.

The Government of India wished to make some sort of inquiry at Simla, and directed the Governor of Bombay to send particulars of accounts, &c. thither by post. I pointed out to Sir J. Lawrence the serious objections to any attempt to make such an inquiry in such a manner, and suggested his sending an agency of his own selection, unconnected with Bombay, to make an inquiry on the spot.*

But I had very great doubts whether any such Government inquiry would elicit more than was already known, or fix on any one man or set of men more responsibility for what had occurred than was already apparent in the reckless extravagance of which we had only too ample evidence. I conclude that the same view must ultimately have been taken by the Viceroy himself, for I do not see that any further inquiry by any officer deputed by the Government of India was ordered.

The case is, however, widely different when the shareholders and Directors join in the demand for inquiry; and if anything more than the most culpable carelessness on the part of those who managed the Bank can be now discovered, it is quite possible that such an inquiry may bring it to light.

I think the Bombay Government should also be requested, if possible, to retain Mr. John Stuart in India, pending the conclusion of any such inquiry.

He was the Secretary and Manager of the Bank in the days of its prosperity, and only returned to Bombay last year, in the hope of being able to restore the Bank to its former position. He is better able than any other man to aid an inquiry into the causes, which in his absence, have ruined a bank, which a few years ago he left in a most prosperous condition. I may remark, in passing, that it would be very desirable, as I have often pointed out to the Viceroy, that Mr. Massey should visit Bombay on his way from Simla to Calcutta, and I would strongly advise an expression of the Secretary of State's desire that he should do so this season, and that his successor should go to India, vid Bombay, and stay there long enough to make himself acquainted with its peculiar mercantile and financial features.

I observe that several expressions in Sir Wm. Mansfield's most able minute imply an opinion that the Bombay Government ought to have done something to correct the mismanagement of the Bank. I wish his Excellency had been more specific as to the kind of interference on the part of Government, and the time for it which he thought desirable, for I had an impression, derived from very full and frequent discussion of the subject with him till he left us early in 1865, just before the cotton collapse, that he went at least as far as I do in holding that Government can very rarely do more to secure the proper working of a Bank than by appointing the best Directors who can be selected from among its own responsible servants, and that when the Government attempts more, it is very liable to do mischief.

This, in fact, seems to me the cardinal difficulty in all Indian Bank direction. It is not always easy to secure careful and conscientious Bank Directors, and, in some respects, Government servants, though not practically acquainted with banking, make valuable Directors in their capacity as checks upon reckless and irregular management.

But when the Government Director fails in his duty it is difficult to see what can be done, except to remove him, and, if necessary, to punish him.

In the present case the directors, who are possibly culpable, had left the Bank before it was discovered that anything had gone wrong. Some of them had left the service, and those who still remain have suffered, and will suffer to the end of their service, by the loss of credit and promotion consequent on the discovery of their neglect. It is not easy to see what more could be done where there is no suspicion of anything worse than carelessness and a perfunctory discharge of duties which, in most cases, did not essentially appertain to the substantive offices which the Directors filled in the Government service. Of course, if anything worse can be proved against them, they should suffer accordingly; but I have not hitherto heard anything worse imputed to them.

After all that has passed, I still think that any active direct participation by Government in ordinary times in the ordinary management of a Bank, and in any other form than the quasi independent action of Government Directors, must do more harm than good, and I have stated in my letters to the Viceroy many of the reasons which induce me to think so.

The Members and Secretaries of an Indian Government are often most valuable, as quasi trustees, as checks upon irregularities and innovations; they are rarely qualified to take an active part in the management of a bank, while discharging their regular official duties under Government; and I am quite sure that a Bank, the affairs of which formed a regular part of the discussions at the Government Council table, and in which the Government was perpetually interfering, would in these days have a very small share of the business or the confidence of the general public.

But the papers before us relate more especially to the future; whether the Bank of Bombay shall be resuscitated, and on what terms the Government shall join in its reconstruction.

After very careful reflecting on what has passed, and on the very able minutes before us, I feel inclined to revert to the opinion which I formerly held very strongly, that the best possible plan for a Government Bank would be one general Bank for all India. At one time I thought that such a Bank might be established, with its head quarters in India; but I confess that the manner in which the propositions of the Bank of Bengal for an amalgamation with that of Bombay have been discussed on both sides of India prove to my mind that any attempt to maintain an Imperial Bank, with a Direction in India, would be abortive, if from no other reasons, from the strong and irreconcileable local jealousies which the selection of the head quarters for such a Bank would evoke.

But I do not think that this would be the case with a Bank having its direction in London and Branches in India.

At each of the Presidency towns the agent's proceedings might be checked by a local committee of three or four Directors, representing the Government and local community of shareholders, and the consent of one Government Director might be made legally necessary to the validity of important acts.

The head office in London would be in immediate communication with the Secretary of State.

This is the only device I can think of to obviate the evils which I have pointed out to Sir John Lawrence (vide my letter of 22d June 1866 to the Viceroy), as sure, sooner or later, to follow the present system of uncertainty and multiplicity of authorities who have more or less power to interfere with the Bank's proceedings.

But this plan can hardly be adopted during the currency of the present charters of the Bengal and Madras Banks. I think, however, it should be now considered, and, if it seem desirable, our present proceedings might be shaped accordingly.

It would be quite possible to fix a limit now to the term during which the existing arrangement with the three Indian Banks should continue in force, and to enact that, after the expiration of that term, the Government business should everywhere be intrusted to the Imperial Bank or to its branches having its head quarters in London.

The shareholders of the present Banks might be allowed the option of joining the Imperial Bank on the most favourable terms; and as the existing Banks, when their connexion with Government is severed, would be able to extend their operations in several profitable directions from which they are now debarred, the change might be made a beneficial one for all parties.

Meantime, I see no alternative, as long as the present agreements with the Bengal and Madras Banks continue, but to reconstruct the Bombay Bank on the old model, taking such additional precautions as can be desired against such mismanagement as has wrecked its predecessor.

I think the arguments of Sir J. Lawrence and Sir W. Mansfield in favour of Government holding shares far outweigh those of Mr. Massey against the practice.

I am not aware of any great commercial country, except America, where the views advocated by Mr. Massey have been tried, and I doubt whether commercial men here would consider the American experiment by any means conclusive. Here in England the connexion between the Government and the National

* Vide my letter of 10th December 1866.

Bank is very intimate, and without that connexion the Bank of England could not perform the part it does perform in the commercial economy of the empire.

For India such a connexion is at least equally important, and where consistency and uniformity of action are of primary importance I know of nothing but connexion with the Government which can in India effect what is desired in a great establishment or undertaking of any kind.

I do not see how, without representing shares, the Government Directors can exercise a legitimate control in a Bank. There will always be a tendency on the part of the commercial Directors to consider their own interests as separate from those of the Government, unless the latter is also a shareholder; and this feeling will operate very strongly in times of difficulty; so that I have no doubt, in such times, any Government official who was merely charged with the delation of irregularities would be powerless to prevent, however speedily he might detect and report, intentional deviation from prescribed rule.

September 23d, 1867. H. B. E. FREERE.

Letter from Sir BARTLE FRERE to the Governor General of India.

Near Waee Sattara Districts,
10th June 1865.

I was just starting for Sattara, with the intention of passing a few days there before going on to Poona, when I received a letter from Mr. Chapman, our Revenue and Financial Secretary, which has made me change my route for Poona and Bombay.

Chapman wrote after the weekly meeting of the Bank, of which he is one of the Government Directors. He says nothing can be gloomier than the aspect of the money market, and he expresses serious fears for the Bank itself.

It had long, I am told, been a weak feature in the management of the Bombay Bank that they had at calls large deposits of other Banks, which, though they made a good show in the balance sheet, were in reality a source of weakness, as being liable to sudden withdrawal in very large sums at one time. On the day Chapman wrote, they had just escaped having to meet a cheque of 25 lacs, and some of the Banks might draw without notice for even larger amounts; one, the Commercial, has 40 lacs at call, and in the present state of the market the withdrawal of such amounts might lead to a suspension of payments.

Chapman adds:—"On paper we are in a very satisfactory state, but the list of overdue bills is not a pleasant sight. The list too of debtors whose bills have still to run presents a very different aspect to what it would have done six months ago. Men who were then supposed to be good for crores are now either insolvent or on the verge of bankruptcy. In the days of prosperit your management was characterized by what now appears to have been most reckless conduct. It is a satisfaction to me personally to know that the mischief was done before I had any connexion with the Bank. I don't for a moment mean to imply that any one would have acted otherwise than the former Directors did. It is easy enough to be wise after the event."

From all I hear from other quarters, I do not go so far as Chapman in acquitting his predecessors of blame; and the Government ought to have been warned long ago of many things which have only lately come to light. I had indeed no notion that anything worse than slowness and ordinary bad management could be imputed to our Bank till my attention was directed to the subject two or three months ago by Sir C. Wood. I then begged Mr. Chapman, who had just joined the Secretariat, and through him Mr. Lushington, who had come here to succeed Mr. Birch as Deputy Auditor and Accountant General, to look closely after the working of the Bank, and it is only since then that we have known anything of how things have been managed.

I think it right to tell you how matters stand, though I hope there may be no necessity for any action of Government. We were severely censured, just before you came out, by Lord Elgin and Trevelyan, for doing what I believe averted a crisis in November 1863; and I will be careful to refer, if possible, before anything of importance is done or refused to be done; but you know that in cases of this sort previous reference, except by telegram, is often difficult.

It would be useful, I think, if the Financial Department of the Government of India made the local Governments more parties to the financial correspondence with the local account departments, at least on all matters of importance. At present we hear very accidentally and irregularly, and this, of course, begets indifference in all local officers and departments to the subject of finance generally, and "the Government of "India look after that" becomes a very common excuse for neglect.

We shall have, I think, to ask your support in applying again to Sir C. Wood to cancel an order of the Court of Directors, which forbids us to appoint as Government Directors of the Bank men who would hold shares on their own account. Of course there are some advantages in having as Government Director a man whose judgment cannot be biassed by his private interests as a shareholder. But this advantage is apt to be overbalanced by the ignorance or indifference of the non-shareholding community. Banking is not a complicated or difficult business, but it is not in itself very interesting, and few men will master or attend to its details as a pure matter of official duty, and that not a main or principal duty, but one merely accidental and contingent.

I doubt whether our Bank would have been so ill-managed but for the operation of this rule. It forced us to exclude Mr. George Inverarity, who happened to be the only Civil servant in the Presidency Town who was really competent for the duty, but he had shares of his own, and after an ineffectual attempt to get the prohibition removed, we were forced to remove him, and his place was filled by men who knew nothing whatever of banking when they joined as Directors.

Letter from Sir BARTLE FRERE to the Governor General of India.

Poona, 15th June 1865.

I wrote to you on the 10th regarding the state of the Bombay money market, and was sorry to find on my arrival here on the 12th that matters had not improved, as you will see by this weekly statement of the Bank's affairs.

From Mr. Chapman, who arrived next day, I received a still gloomier account of affairs. He brought me notes from the Chairman, intimating that the run on the Bank was imminent, that the cash was being rapidly drawn, and that without assistance from Government Monday next might bring the Bank to a stop.

In three days, from 10th to 13th, the Cash and Currency Note Balance had fallen from 120½ lacs to 98. This was exactly one third the Bank's Liabilities for deposits; in ordinary times a safe amount; but, as the Chairman (Mr. Hannay) wrote, the Mercantile Bank was that day drawing 5 lacs, other cheques for large amounts were coming in, and there was a certainty of much cash being required for next mail.

The list of bills overdue was 40 lacs, but though the Bank had taken all usual proceedings to recover these debts, owing to the tedious law process, and the utter paralysis of the money market, the proceeds were practically nil. Other Banks had nothing coming in, and were looking with much anxiety to the result of the application which it was generally surmised the Government Bank must make to Government for extraordinary aid.

The state of things in Bombay is graphically described in a letter I have just received from Mr. Rustomjee Jamsetjhee Jeejeebhoy, of which I enclose a copy. His great wealth, and high reputation for sagacity, which has been well proved by his present reputed freedom from all personal embarrassment or concern in unsound speculation, give his opinion great weight, and I have no doubt, from other communications received from men of very different views, that the step he recommends is that which the representatives of the momentary interests of Bombay generally, if we could consult them, would concur in asking for. It is exactly what the Bank, through the Chairman, asks for; viz., power to draw on Government for a crore and a half, in case of need, the money to be advanced from the Currency Reserve.

On asking Mr. Hannay how he would reconcile doing this with the provisions of the Currency Act XIX. of 1861, he referred to Sec. 10, but admitted what he wanted done would be a straining of the Act.

By the latest return we have (10th April), you have issued and have now out in circulation about 743 lacs of Currency Notes, and, as I read the last two columns of the return, about 357½ lacs of Government Securities are held in your reserve. This is within 48½ lacs of the extreme limit of the amount (four crores) of the reserve which the Act, Sec. 10, allows to be held in Government Securities; so that, as the Act stands, you could not advance the Bank more than some 42½ lacs of Currency Notes, even if they offered to deposit Government paper, and just now Government paper is as difficult to get at in Bombay as cash.

Supposing you are willing to assist the Bank in case of need, the only legal mode I can think of is to let them have the money in currency notes, and to transfer them, from out of your cash balances to the credit of the Currency Department, the sum so advanced. It is not, I conclude, legally necessary that this cash should be in the Bombay Mint, nor even in any treasury of the Bombay Circle of Issue; as I read the Act, it may be in any of your treasuries, provided it be bonâ fide set aside as Currency Reserve, so that it may not be used for the general purposes of Government.

Thus, for example, if the Bank wants a crore, it would be given in notes, and if we had a crore of rupees to spare in our Bombay treasuries it would be set aside to the credit of the Currency Department, and sent to the Mint, to the Currency Commissioner, when opportunity offers; or, if we had no spare cash in our Bombay treasuries, the cash might be at Agra, Calcutta, or Madras, and be treated in like manner—and be sent to Bombay as may seem advisable to meet demands of cash in exchange for notes, should the latter be presented to the Currency Department for payment.

In former days the Government treasuries used everywhere to be full at this time of year, and there would have been no difficulty as to the amount. Whether this is so still I cannot tell; but however much Trevelyan's measures may have reduced the general cash balances, there must be so much more in hand in June than at other times that I hardly anticipate any difficulty from want of means.

There remains the question whether you think Government ought to aid the Bank? But when you consider what large interests are at stake besides those of Government and the Bank shareholders, I cannot doubt your thinking that everything which can be done by Government ought to be done to prevent the Bank from stopping payment, however much their misfortunes may be the result of the Directors' own bad management. I believe that at the present moment a suspension of payment by the Government Bank would be as great a calamity as could befall Western India.

I fear there can be no doubt that the present precarious position of the Bank is mainly due to bad management. Who are to blame will, I hope, be more clear when we get a report on the subject which I have asked the Government Directors to prepare; but from all I can learn, the Secretary, Mr. Blair, now in England, was a very unfit man for his post, and was far too much trusted by the Directors.

I am told that a standing rule of the Direction limiting to a moderate fixed sum the Secretary's powers of making advances to any one person or firm without the consent of the Board of Directors, was abrogated some time ago, and he was left practically uncontrolled. He seems to have used his power in the most reckless manner, by making advances to junior partners, and to men of no substance, on their personal security, without requiring the security of the firms to which they belonged. Much of this money may be ultimately recoverable, but it ought never to have been lent.

Among the Government Directors, Mr. Birch, the Accountant and Auditor-General, who has just returned to England and retired from the service, had the greatest weight, and I believe he had great experience in the management of the Bank at Madras, and much practical knowledge of banking affairs generally. He certainly possessed a weight among mercantile men in Bombay greater than could be due merely to his official position, and I believe Trevelyan and others who had long known him thought highly of him. Of late, I am told, he devoted himself much to the Bank's affairs, rather to the prejudice of his other duties. As far as close attention to the Bank went, he is not to blame. But whether he aggravated or mitigated the Secretary's mismanagement I have at present no means of deciding.

I have every reason to feel satisfied with the present Government Directors, Mr. Lushington, the Deputy Accountant and Auditor-General, and Mr. Chapman, our Chief Secretary, as far as general ability and intelligence and right principle goes, but as regards banking affairs, I do not know that either of them had any experience before they joined their present appointments. I have already told you of the way in which the prohibition to appoint as Government Directors men who have shares of their own operates to exclude men of practical experience.

Our third Government Director, Mr. Mangles, has been for some time away, and I am told that he is not likely to return, his appointment as Civil Paymaster having been abolished; but this, like most other things in the Financial Department, we only know incidentally, and I am unable to ascertain exactly whether the office he held as a Government Director of the Bank is at this moment vacant or not.

As an instance of the incidental effect of keeping the local Government in the dark as to the proceedings of the Financial Department, I may point out that 18 lacs of the sudden diminution of the Bank's balance of cash this week is due to a transfer of that amount to the Currency Department, which was ordered by the Financial Department at Calcutta, without, as far as I can learn, a word of warning or intimation to this Government. I do not even know the reason, and only heard of the fact in consequence of parties unconnected with the Bank remonstrating at the ill-timed withdrawal of so large a sum at a moment when the Bank required the utmost forbearance.

But I must not wander from the main point, which is to tell you as fully as I can how the Bank is situated, and to learn your wishes as to the line which this Government should adopt in the event, which is I fear very probable, of our being appealed to for aid.

Nothing is further from my wish than to avoid responsibility, and for whatever we do I am ready to answer, without wishing to throw any portion of the burden on others; and I feel very confident that when you have the whole case before you, you will approve of whatever we may do, for neither I, nor any one belonging to the Government, have, as far as I know, the slightest personal interest in the matter, nor any wish but to do what is best for the permanent interests of Government and the country.

But if, after we have acted to the best of our ability, our proceedings are upset by a telegram from Simla or Calcutta to some one in the Currency or Financial Departments here, who looks to you, and not to us, for orders, we should obviously have done more harm than if we had folded our hands and let events take their course. It is very difficult at this distance to give you a correct idea of the state of affairs here, so as to enable you to judge what should be done. All I ask is, that you will give us credit for exercising reasonable care and circumspection, and not conclude we are wrong till you have given us time for explanation. I enclose a copy of a telegram which I have just sent you, briefly stating how affairs stand, and asking leave to comply in case of need with the Bank's request.

P.S.—I write in this form to avoid, as far as possible, the risk of the very serious state of affairs becoming prematurely known, but you will, I trust, deal with what I have written as though it were officially before you. Mr. Ellis, the only other member of Government now in the country, has gone carefully into the question, and agrees with me that there is no other apparent means to prevent the Bank stopping, and to avert the consequent public bankruptcy, but to advance in case of need to the extent and in the manner above described.

Letter from Sir BARTLE FRERE to the Governor General of India.

Poona, 22d June 1865.

I telegraphed to you on the 17th my thanks for your message of the 16th, and also on the 20th I telegraphed to tell you of the good effect which is already apparent in consequence of the knowledge that Government would give to the Bank reasonable support.

Mr. Chapman wrote on the 20th that a very marked degree of confidence was established directly the news became known, and he was in hopes that no actual aid would now be required.

It is, however, too soon to draw any such conclusion. The 1st of July is the settling day for a large proportion of the time bargains in shares. Till then no one can even guess with confidence who will be solvent and who bankrupt. Of course they who have had nothing to do with the time bargains will come off best, but they are a very small numerical minority, daily decreasing in number as revelations come out of men who were supposed to be clear of such transactions but who are found to have gambled under the names of others, and the most immaculate in the matter of time bargains have in the way of ordinary legitimate business trusted men whose word three weeks ago was good for millions, and who are now bankrupts. In addition to Byramjee Cama's bankruptcy for 3¼ millions, we have had two failures of men supposed till ten days ago to be quite solvent for between one and two millions sterling each, and I hear of an impending failure of a very respectable Parsee house,* with liabilities popularly estimated at six (6) millions sterling.

The Bank's weekly statement up to the 17th, which I enclose, shows things nearly at their worst. At one time the cash notes were down at 78 lacs. Chapman says that on the 20th they were up to 98 lacs, and the receipts from depositors for that day were 3 lacs in excess of the drafts, so I hope the run is for the present over. There was a run on the Poonah Branch Bank on the 17th, but Sunday intervened, and on Monday the deposits which had been withdrawn were in great part returned. When things were at their worst, the Agra and Chartered Mercantile Banks drew nearly their whole balances, under circumstances which induced the Directors of the Bank of Bombay to beg them to draw the remainder, and close their accounts.

It is a curious circumstance that our note circulation continues to expand rapidly. It was 356 lacs on the 10th, 375 lacs on the 14th, and yesterday 4 crores. Various explanations are given of this, that notes are safer and more easy to carry, or to hide, or to trace by their numbers, than cash is, and that they are in demand by those who wish to convey away or conceal their means.

However that may be, the fact indicates no mistrust of Government solvency, and is so far satisfactory.

Against four crores of notes, the Currency Department holds 186¾ lacs of Government securities, and the rest, with the exception of 19 lacs of sovereigns and gold, is in silver, almost all coined.

Our District Treasuries are well supplied; our last return of District Treasury cash balances shows 164 lacs of cash (exclusive of the Mint and Treasury at Bombay), and an estimated balance of about equal amount for the end of the month, and about 130 for the 31st July, which is equal to about three months of current local expenditure.

As far as I can gather from the numerous letters I see from mercantile men of various classes, as well as from the tone of the daily press articles, what has been done is very generally approved.

On this point you will hear enough, doubtless, at the annual meeting early in July, when the Directors' conduct will be subject to the criticism of shareholders, to whom they will be unable to promise a dividend.

Meantime, Chapman and Lushington are preparing a very full report, which I have no doubt will show how far their predecessors, as Government Directors, were or were not to blame.

As much depends on the exact time and circumstances of a loan, and there have been so many changes among the Government Directors during the year, I will wait for more definite information before stating my own impressions. The point of most present importance is the management of the Bank for the next three weeks, and in that respect I think we have done or are doing all that can be done.

We are of course inundated with suggestions publicly and privately, and from all sorts of people, but none of them seem to me of much practical use. One of our leading Greek merchants,† whose name stands deservedly high, and who is reputed to be quite clear of embarrassing engagements, sends me, through Mr. Ellis, an excellent letter, describing the prospect of ruin to three fourths of the houses in Bombay, and the paralysis of ordinary legitimate trade, at a time peculiarly favourable in all respects, save the state of the money market, and, after highly praising the integrity and public character of the present Government Directors, recommends that we should remove them, as inexperienced in banking, and appoint in their stead three Europeans of high character, "independent merchants, who are totally free of any transactions in the share market, or as promoters of companies;" but when asked to name such men, he was unable to point out one such phœnix, and every Native, or European who knows Natives, can estimate the extent of panic which would be caused in every bazaar by the news that the official Directors had been withdrawn and three merchants put in their places. Moreover, if a better professional mercantile element is required in the Direction, it is clearly for the shareholders to supply it.

Another suggestion is contained in a letter from Mr. Rustomjee J. Jeejeebhoy, of which I enclose a copy. You probably know the history of the Time Bargains Act to which he refers. It was brought in at the instance of the Chief Justice, Sir M. Sausse, by Mr. Westropp, then Acting Advocate General, and when he went into the High Court as Judge he left it in charge of Mr. Michael Scott. It was very fully discussed in our Council and in the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, where it was made rather a party question between those who followed Mr. Scott's lead and those who generally opposed him. In our Council it was opposed with great eloquence and ability by Sir William Mansfield, and supported by Mr. Anderson; and Rustomjee, who was originally in favour of the Bill, was converted by Sir William, and voted against the third reading.

It seemed to me that the main arguments used against the Bill did not apply to the measure in the shape which it finally took after months of discussion and adjournment. It did not propose to interfere with time bargains in any way beyond applying the existing English law to them, and leaving them out of court to be dealt with as merely gambling debts or debts of honour. I did not give any weight to the arguments, that the Legislature should prescribe such transactions, for that is not exactly the business of legislation; but I thought much weight was due to the Judge's complaint that, as the law stood, unless the Acts were passed they were forced here to go into cases of pure gambling which in England would be thrown out of court at once, and that our courts of justice were degraded into mere settling offices for a betting ring.

I therefore approved the Act, which was passed by a majority of the Council, and sent it to you in November, and have since heard nothing more about it.

We made a reference on the subject some months ago, in consequence of our Chief Justice pointing out that the High Court was being inundated with suits which had nothing to do with the legitimate commerce of the place, but were in truth the mere fencing of a couple of gamblers.

Mr. Michael Scott, as a leading merchant of a very advanced and liberal school, was much criticised for bringing forward a Bill which threw a certain class of bargains out of court. His reply was, that they had no more to do with trade than the Derby had, but that they very seriously interfered with trade by tempting traders to gamble.

The event has quite justified his view. Cotton has risen in price 50 per cent. in two months, but the cotton market is stagnant, not for want of cotton, or of buyers or sellers, or of money, but because every man is holding every rupee he can command to be ready for a great settlement of time bargains in July, when, I am assured on good authority, some 30 or 40 millions sterling will change hands, according to the then price of cotton, opium, Government paper, but, above all, of shares in joint stock companies, many of which exist only on paper.

Of course there must be a tremendous crash, and the best and most cautious will find great difficulty in getting paid what is owing to them in legitimate trade. The Court will be overwhelmed with business, and sorely puzzled to apply the law, for it is in a very doubtful state, and all that is certain is that the later English Acts do not apply here.

But while thinking that the advocates of the Bill have the best of the argument, and that their reasoning is backed by experience, and that a very large portion of the present distress is due to time bargains, and to the spirit of gambling which they foster, there is some risk, as I have pointed out to Rustomjee, that at this particular moment the immediate approval of the Bill may go further than at any other time in its moral effect. It cannot prevent the making of time bargains, but it may encourage some, who would otherwise try to pay, to repudiate, under a vague notion of the law excusing them. I would not myself let such an objection prevent the final passing of a useful law, but I have pointed out to my repentant colleague that the objection may have its weight.

Since I began this letter I have read your Military Secretary's telegram of the 21st, inquiring whether we have taken steps to ascertain the quality of the good outstanding bills and securities which the banks hold. This was done some six weeks ago, when Sir C. Wood drew my attention to the management of the bank, and the result was better than I then expected. The advances on shares without collateral security were not large, nor the prices at which they were valued then high. There ought, of course, to have been no such transaction at all, but they were not heavy, nor, at the then prices of shares, attended with much risk. Since then, however, shares of every kind have become almost unsaleable except at ruinously low prices; and as for bills, it would be difficult to say what in Bombay at present is a good bill. Till the first of July, no one will be able to tell who of his debtors will pay him and who not; and I believe no earthly financier could guess the probable value of the Bank's outstandings till the first settling day in July has revealed who are likely to be solvent and who not.

Letter from Sir BARTLE FRERE to the Governor General of India.

Poona, 24th June 1865.

I have just received the enclosed from Mr. Chapman, to whom it was forwarded, with an intimation that the original would come before Government, signed by a great number of the leading houses and banks.

Of course the weight to be attached to it will depend on the character of the signatures, but I send it to you as a sign of the times.

If it comes up in a form to deserve to be submitted to your Excellency officially, I will get the opinion of the Chief Justice and Chamber of Commerce to send with it.

I imagine that, as a body, the bar and attornies would oppose it. I am told they are so busy that it is quite impossible to get work unconnected with insolvency cases attended to.

The state of the Bank continues to improve slowly, but we shall probably not know the worst for another week or so; after that I look for some permanent amendment, not only in the state of the Bank but of commercial affairs generally.

I have been with Mr. Chapman looking over a very ugly list of doubtful debts owing to the Bank.

The sums owing by declared or known insolvents, and of overdue bills, after deducting securities reckoned at par, amount to upwards of 52 lacs, and probably 10*s.* in the 1*l.* would be a high estimate of what the Bank will realize on these, all round.

But it is impossible at present to get anything like a reliable estimate of what the bills, whether overdue or still recurring, will be worth ultimately. When you consider that liabilities, incurred sometimes six months ago by time bargains, i.e., bets on the price of cotton, opium, and shares on the 1st of next July, are in suspense to the amount of many millions (popular estimate says 30 or 40), and that not one Native trader in 20 is entirely clear of liabilities of his own, for such time bargains, and that every merchant and bank, however clear in their own persons, has at least that proportion of time-bargaining constituents and correspondents, you may imagine the present state of entire paralysis, and the impossibility of saying who is and who is not likely to be solvent next week.

I send your Excellency an extract from a letter from Sir M. Sausse, our Chief Justice, in which he gives by anticipation his opinion on the memorial of which I sent you a copy. We have not yet received it, except in this draft form, but I am told mercantile men generally in Bombay approve of its prayer.

I find the advances of the Bank on shares were not so heavy as has been supposed, nor quite so reckless, though not, I imagine, justifiable as banking operations. Up to the 12th April, when our Government Directors stopped them, the total advances on shares were Rs. 41,70,000, and the par value of the shares is Rs. 22,52,522, but some of them even now stand above par, and others are likely to do so in ordinary times. There are 39 Back Bay shares among them.

The excuse of the mercantile Directors is, that when they began to advance on shares the pressure on the money market was supposed to be temporary, that they had then nearly three millions of cash balance, and that they invented a sliding scale, by which, as the security was depreciated, fresh security was to be taken. But, like other sliding scales, it refused in the time of need to slide, and none of their reasons are, I imagine, sufficient in a banking view, as prudent men had for months previous seen that there would be a very tight money market in April and May and June, and the risk of advances beyond the paid-up value of shares is sufficiently obvious even to a lay understanding.

We have desired the Government Directors to report what is necessary to alter the terms of the Bombay Bank's Charter, so as to assimilate it to the Banks of Bengal and Madras, and prevent any such loans in future.

The present Government Directors are not to blame, as Mr. Chapman only came into office in February and Mr. Lushington still later, and till Mr. Birch left no one supposed that the Bank required more Government supervision than he gave it.

Letter from Sir Bartle Frere to the Governor General of India.

Poona, 7th July 1865.

I have received your letter of the 23d, regarding our Bank. Since writing it, you will, I hope, have received my subsequent letters, which will have served to lessen, I hope, if not entirely to remove, your anxiety. You shall have full details of all that relates to the Bank's past management, and what we propose for the future, in reply to your Financial Secretary's official letter.

The Bank's position goes on steadily improving. The dreaded time bargains settling day on the 1st of July passed, and left the Bank with rather a better cash balance than they opened with in the morning. Everyone seems to hope that the crisis is now passed, that everyone now knows the extent of liabilities, and that trade will revive. I hear of one more gigantic failure of Cursetjee Furdonjee, an old and formerly much respected house, with liabilities of between two and three millions sterling, more than a million of them from time bargains in cotton and shares, and a host of smaller fry.

I hope you will now assent to our Act for throwing these time bargains out of court. There can be no doubt they have been one great cause of all the misery and ruin we see around us here now. There would of course have been overtrading and mad speculation of all kinds under any circumstances, when so much money was thrown into a community peculiarly prone to speculation and gambling; but the evil has been intensified by these time bargains. They have this peculiarity as compared with all other kinds of betting, that they are carried on under the guise of trade, and the settling day is so far off that any unusual change in the price of the article bet on may cause such prolonged uncertainty as to the solvency of the betters as seriously to embarrass all non-betting people who are connected with them. It is easy to say, "Do not bank with a "banker who thinks more of the Derby, or rouge-et-"noir table, than his counting house;" but if the betting be carried on in the counting-house, and under the forms of ordinary trade, the most cautious man in Lombard Street may be taken in. All this Mr. Michael Scott pointed out when the Bill was before us, but his opponents ridiculed his arguments, which went no further than the existing English law.

You must not suppose that because the 1st of July is past there is an end of the evil consequences of time bargains which then fell due. The only step gained was each man's knowledge of his own losses. A few slipped out of their liabilities by informalities in the tender, or similar technical modes of getting off their bets. Some of the smaller fry compromised on the spot, promising to pay 25 or 30 per cent. of their losses, but to the great majority in number, as well as in character and wealth, the effect was merely to fix the liability and amount, and to allow the lawyers to commence a settlement by pettifogging duello, instead of the summary settlements of Tattersall's and the Jockey Club Committee.

Meantime, the ordinary business of lawyers and merchants is nearly at a standstill, under circumstances which, but for these time bargains, would have ensured a rapid revival of trade.

The Bank Directors are now so satisfied that they will not need any actual Government help that I will not trouble your Excellency with further reports, unless something unforeseen should happen.

I send the last published weekly statement, dated 1st July. The Bank's position has improved almost daily since then, and their own cash balance yesterday was close on a million, with liabilities much diminished.

You need not be afraid of our doing anything to embarrass the Currency Department. It is a curious thing that, at the time when the general panic was at its worst, and one of our local newspapers was writing in a strain to incite a run on the Currency Department, the circulation of notes steadily increased. It was, on the 1st July, more than four millions sterling (four crores and seven lacs rupees), and the cash reserve was,—

Silver coin	189 lacs.
Gold coin	18 ,,
Silver bullion	10 ,,
	217 lacs, or 2,170,000*l.*

In January, when speculation was at its height, the note circulation was not above 365 lacs, or 3,650,000*l.*

P.S.—I have sent Sir Charles Wood all the information I have given you. I fear that even the sad reality of the losses in Bombay will not be worse than the gloomy anticipations which were generally felt in the City as to what was in store for us. I have troubled you more than I otherwise should have done with letters in this form, because we find that, with our weakened and demoralized establishments, it is very difficult to prevent breaches of confidence, if once anything goes beyond the Members of Government and the Secretaries. The purport of Lushington's telegram, promising your support in anything we might do to support the Bank, was, I am assured, known and made use of in the Bombay Bazaar before it reached us. It was said to have come vid Calcutta, but I can learn nothing beyond suspicions as to how or to whom; and as the original telegram was not in cipher, it is just as likely it leaked out here.

Letter from Sir BARTLE FREERE to the Governor General of India.

Sholapoor, 23d December 1865.

On the 13th ultimo I drew your attention by telegram to the correspondence between our Accountant General and the Financial Secretary to the Government of India, regarding the state of our Bank and Currency Department, and I understood that the orders issued by you had removed Mr. J. Lushington's apprehensions. Yesterday I was startled by a letter from Mr. Lushington to Mr. Chapman, of which I enclose extracts, expressing great anxiety lest we should stop payment; and to-day I have a cipher telegram from the Secretary to Government, partly unintelligible, but distinct as to the facts that the Bank closed yesterday with only 6½ lacs of silver coin.

You will see that between the Christmas holidays, which will prevent inconvenient demands for payment, and help expected in the shape of cash remittances from Madras, there is ground for hope that we may not actually stop payment; but this is certainly the third time that we have been seriously threatened with the same calamity within the last two years, in times of extreme commercial prosperity, besides all our difficulties during the commercial crisis six or eight months ago, and I am sure you will agree with me in thinking that this is not either so agreeable or creditable a state of things, that we should allow it to become chronic. Moreover the wolf, so often threatened, may come at last, and Madras may not be always able to help us, for I fear some of the causes of our difficulties are not local, and the evils we suffer from it will, in time, spread over all India.

I do not know whether you ever have alarms of this kind in Calcutta or at Madras, nor can I tell how much of our difficulty so frequently recurring may be fairly attributable to the action of our own financial officers and how much to the Bank.

But I wish to point out that our Bombay Government has under the present system little or no power to prevent or even to foresee such difficulties. All our finance machinery is moved by the Financial Department at Calcutta, with very rare and incidental reference to this Government. So far as I know, we are never referred to till some mischief is imminent, and then more frequently by the local than by the Calcutta Financial officers.

This may be all as it is intended, and we may be needlessly disquieting ourselves about what is well looked after by your officers; but I do not like to leave the point doubtful, lest you should suppose we are looking after what, under the present system, we cannot, and, so far as I can make out, no one else does, thoroughly look to.

I hope to be in Bombay in a few days, and will, if you wish, do my best, as soon as I get there, to ascertain the causes of these threatened fits of Government insolvency in seasons of extreme commercial prosperity, and will let you know, if I can learn, whether any and what changes in our Bank, or mint, or currency management in our financial arrangements are likely to lessen the frequency of these alarms.

But before I attempt to do anything of the kind, I should be glad to have your authority to take up the question, and that I may be assured I shall not be brought up by a letter from your Financial Department, telling us to mind our own business, and not to meddle with what is no concern of ours.

P.S. (24th).—Mr. Chapman has just received a letter from Mr. J. Lushington, saying that "matters have "gradually got worse," and that the silver balance in the Currency Department was only five lacs, Government balance 56¼ lacs, but the only available coins for payment are, whole rupees 4 lacs; and half rupees 2¾ lacs, as the whole amount available to meet all demands on Government and the Bank, and he says, "suspen- "sion seems imminent." I hope to be in Bombay before business hours on the 26th, but I do not see what it is possible to do, if there is no money in the Treasury, nor any Bank which can discount your Calcutta bills. I do not understand why Lushington looks on the gold in the mint as less available than silver. Here the sovereigns which are taken at Rs. 10 by the Mint in Bombay are selling for Rs. 10. 7 in the Bazaar, so that there ought to be no difficulty in converting them into silver.

Letter from Sir BARTLE FREERE to the Governor General of India.

Bombay, 26th December 1865.

After sending off my letter to you on the 24th, I got such very alarming accounts of the state of our Treasury and of the money world here that I set off yesterday, and by travelling the greater part of Christmas Day and all night arrived this morning. I have seen Ellis, who had preceded me, and who, as you know, has a very good head for finance; Erskine, and all our Government people, including Mr. J. Lushington and Colonel Ballard, Mr. Hannay, the Chairman of our Bank, and others who could speak to the mercantile view of the crisis; and this is briefly the result of what I heard:—

The present crisis is, only in degree, unusual; there is every year more or less tightness of the money market about this time, especially if trade be brisk.

The causes of this tightness being this year greater than usual are,—

1. A general alteration in the system of buying cotton. Formerly the up-country cotton merchant bought from the cultivator on credit, paying only earnest money 10 or 20 rupees a candy. He sold the cotton again on credit to a Bombay merchant, and all the transfer from hand to hand, till the cotton reached the English importer, was more or less on credit, and the balance was often not cleared till the price of cotton was realized from the English importer. Thus payment of the full price was deferred for many months.

A different system prevails this year. Partly from growing wealth and growing independence, partly from more knowledge recently acquired of the possible value of their cotton, and of the risk of giving long credit, the cultivators and rural merchants will only sell for cash down. This has obliged even the best English houses this year to send cash into the cotton districts before buying the cotton, instead of as formerly sending only a small advance, and the balance after the cotton had been sold in England. Hence the necessity for an unusually large and early provision of cash this season.

Neither the Government nor the Banks have done anything to accelerate this change of system. It is the natural result of a thriving trade and of increasing prosperity.

2dly. The exchange Banks have not managed well. They parted with their available funds when exchange was not favourable, and now they want the resources which they thus improvidently forestalled. Exchange is now very high, and will in time bring back money hither; meantime the Banks suffer from want of it.

Last year at this season the aggregate cash balances of all the Banks in Bombay were over 3¼ millions sterling (3¼ crores rupees). On Saturday they were under a quarter of a million (25 lacs rupees), as ascertained by a careful and confidential comparison of their respective states.

Matters would have been even worse on Saturday had not the Banks, with a view to avoid extreme pressure, at the end of last week agreed to keep open during the Christmas holidays, which, it had been previously notified, by general consent, were to have lasted a week. But for this promise to keep open this week, most of the Banks would have run dry on Friday or Saturday, by customers wanting cash to carry them over the holidays.

The money has gone to pay for cotton just purchased generally in the Nizam's and other districts where bank notes are not current. The necessity for getting coin for this purpose has led to a run on the Currency Department. During the commercial crisis of April to August last the note circulation extended by about a million sterling. Men preferred notes, as more portable, and more easily concealed. Now they want coin to send to provinces where notes are not current, and about 2¼ millions sterling of notes have been cashed in a few weeks, beyond the cash drawn from the Banks.

There were symptoms on Friday and Saturday that this run on the Currency Department to cash notes was slackening.

3dly. The merchants generally have an idea that much of the present tightness is due to the tardiness of the Financial Department in Calcutta to reinforce the Treasury here with coin, and to the selfish conduct (as they call it) of the Bank of Bengal.

I find that Mr. J. Lushington gave very ample warning of the prospective want of coin. But instead of coin he received about 40 lacs (400,000*l.* sterling) in bills mostly drawn on customers of the Bombay Bank, so that the only effect was that if the Bank discounted the bills it simply transferred so many rupees from the account of customers A.B. to the account of the Government. The Bank's stock of coin was in no way replenished or increased by the transaction.

Of course under such circumstances the bills could not be discounted. They were valueless as a reinforcement to the Bank's means of meeting the drain of silver.

Our Banks here find great fault with the Bank of Bengal, who they suppose suggested the measure of sending bills instead of coin to serve their own ends, and also with the Government for consenting to it. They say, that the Finance Department at Calcutta ought to have known, and that the Bank of Bengal must have known, that what was wanted here was the actual coin, and that the best bills which could be sent were useless, unless the coin to meet them had been sent also.

Of course, without hearing the other side, I cannot tell how far this is true or just. I only tell you what the Banks here say.

4thly. There was some complaint that the Treasury here had been embarrassed by excessive and irregular drafts on it from the Secretary of State. There seems to have been some cause for this complaint, till lately. We have written and telegraphed to the Secretary of State to let the Accountant General know in time what he is going to draw for on Bombay, and if he does this there will be no more inconvenience from this cause. I cannot make out that it has had much to do with the present difficulty.

5thly. The Bank complains bitterly that much of the Government reserve is in small silver and copper. They say that it might almost as conveniently be in uncurrent coin, and I confess there seems to me to be much force in this complaint. When out of 57 lacs only 7 are in whole and half rupees, it is clear that the reserve, however imposing it may look on paper, is of little immediate use to meet a run.

6thly. It was stated that in the estimates of revenue prepared by the Financial Department at Calcutta the probable realizations were set down at higher figures than was warranted by the estimates prepared here, and that consequently the Financial Department at Calcutta has a fallacious estimate of the probable balance in hand during the year. I cannot at this moment tell how far this assertion is well founded, but a comparison of our figures with Trevelyan's Budget Estimate will show you whether any over sanguine calculation of our expected receipts has misled the Financial Department. Our Opium reserve is as you know much below what it was expected.

7thly. The Mint is doing as much as can be expected, turning out five and six lacs a day. But even at this rate it takes a long time to coin the whole of the silver poured in, which is sometimes close upon a million sterling, by a single mail; and at times like the present, when the money is wanted for provinces where notes are not in use, the Mint certificates are presented immediately for cash, which is thus drawn out of the Treasury long before the silver for which it is due can be coined.

When this inconvenience was first experienced about two or three years ago, it was proposed to revert to the old practice of making the Mint certificates promises to pay coin, not at sight, but after an interval of say 21 days. But there were objections to this, and Sir C. Wood suggested that the Hamburg form of Mint certificate should be adopted. This is a promise to pay coin, or to return the bullion. This would enable the Mint, when overtasked, to refuse payment for silver till it had been coined. To this our merchants here saw no objection, but they urged that no alteration should be made in the form of certificate at a period of excitement such as then prevailed, but that Government should wait for quieter times, and when quieter times came the subject, as far as I know, was forgotten.

I think some such change must be made, or your cash reserves here must be greatly increased. If you look at the returns of note circulation in this circle you will find that it was up at 4 crores 15 lacs at the end of September, just before the busy season, and by the middle of December it had fallen to 2 crores and 58 lacs, and besides this the Banks here had been cleared of all their cash to the extent of about three crores, and this, be it remembered, not in consequence of a panic, but of an unusually brisk trade.

In a market subject to such sudden and extensive fluctuations it is clearly not safe to have the Government Cash Balance with the Bank habitually near the minimum of 30 lacs, and to keep two thirds of it in copper and small silver.

I think whatever form of Mint certificate you may adopt you will have to increase the amount of Government balance which you habitually leave with the Bank, and also of the cash reserve held against notes by the Currency Department in Bombay.

We are sending you a question referred by the Mint Master and the Accountant General, which will show you that had either of them been obstinate about their interpretation of the Currency Act last week the Treasury might have been really bankrupt.

This is the sum of what I learned in my conversations with our own officers and the Bank people here. The district treasuries have all been drained, and we have failed to discover even five lacs of rupees which we could lay hands on. The Guickwar has a full treasury, and would readily help us, but all his revenues are paid in his own rupees, and I have ascertained that he has no Company's rupees to lend us. I have pointed out to Mr. Lushington how he might get his gold converted into silver, but this cannot be done to any great amount nor rapidly.

We have sent confidential instructions to pay nothing from any treasury which can be deferred. We have had applications for instructions as to what is to be done if the Treasury is empty (and of course answered "that it should be filled again as speedily as possible"), and suggestions that we should stop while we have still cash enough left to pay Government servants their salaries next month; but I hope we shall not run dry, nor even be reduced to tendering quarter rupees and two anna pieces. I will keep this till Wednesday, which the Banks seem to think, as the first clear day after the holidays, will be a trying one to them.

28th, Tuesday evening—Mr. Lushington reported that the Bank had paid away 12 lacs of rupees for notes during the day, and had only two lacs of whole rupees and less than three lacs of half rupees in the Bank at closing hour.

Yesterday ( ) the Mint turned out six lacs, and the Bank only paid away three (3), closing with seven lacs of cash in hand.

Mr. Lushington is still rather desponding, but Colonel Ballard and the Chairman of the Bank are sanguine that we have seen the worst; the latter says that the few people who know how great the drain has been seem suprised that matters are no worse.

I shall probably be able to tell you by telegram before you get this which opinion has been justified by the event.

P.S.—I enclose copies of some correspondence regarding the Bank's complaint that so much of the Government Cash Balance is kept in copper and small silver coins, which are of no use to them for banking purposes. You will see that on the Bank complaining of this in November 1863, we directed the Deputy Auditor and Accountant General of that day to transfer the small coins to the Mint balance, and to make over to the Bank whole rupees instead. But in March 1864 these orders of ours were upset by a letter from the Government of India, dated 6th February, to the Deputy Auditor and Accountant General, Bombay, directing "that no portion of the amount of small "silver or copper coin must be excluded from the "calculation of the Government balance" with the Bank.

So our previous orders of November were cancelled. The amount of small silver and copper was then 17 lacs. It is now about 20. So if the Bank had ground for complaint then, it has more now.

I have just heard of the arrival of two steamers, one with 10 lacs of rupees from Beypoor sent by the Madras Government, and the other with four lacs from Kurrachee.

Letter from Sir Bartle Frere to the Governor General of India.

Bombay, 12th January 1866.

My letter of the 26th ultimo and its enclosures will have given you some of the information which, from yours of the 3d just received, I gather you required.

You will have seen that it was not the Bank of Bombay which was in difficulty this time so much as the Government Treasury and Currency Department. We have had here our full share of bad and improvident banking, and the Bank of Bombay has been quite as bad as its neighbours here or elsewhere. But on this particular occasion it was as well prepared as the most cautious—the Agra, for instance—to meet its own liabilities, though it was not prepared to let Government overdraw its account to the extent we should have required.

Of course it would have been more to the Bank's credit if it had been able to help us. But we ought not to have needed help from any Bank to meet a pressure which might have been foreseen and guarded against.

It seems to me that our difficulties were mainly owing, as far as preventible causes are concerned,—1st, to Trevelyan having reduced our balances below what was safe or prudent; and, 2dly, to the more recent mistake of sending us 40 lacs of undiscountable bills instead of 40 lacs of coin.

You will have seen from my second letter that of the 55 lacs of balance which Edward Lushington told you we had in the Bank by his latest advices only 7 were in whole rupees, and that this 7 had fallen before you wrote to 2½. James Lushington tells me they send very full and punctual returns by telegram at least once a week, and the Financial Department ought certainly to be able to give you later and fuller intelligence than Edward Lushington seems to have had on the 3d.

You must forgive me for saying that I do not like either the measure you have just passed for altering the Paper Currency Act, nor the manner in which it has been passed.

No doubt it was necessary to take steps to prevent your being obliged to stop payment of notes with your Mint full of uncoined silver.

But might not this have been effected quite as well in the manner suggested by Sir C. Wood two years ago, by altering the terms of the Mint bullion receipts to what is called the Hamburg form, which gives Government the option of returning the bullion if unable to coin it fast enough?

Then by restricting your assay (only in time of pressure like the present) to the rate at which you can coin, say six lacs a day, you can at any time provide against a crisis like the late one, without causing panic, and without altering your Paper Currency Act.

For us, the season when your treasuries are full, say, from March to August, such a drain on your coined silver would occasion no inconvenience to you. It is only when, as now, the pressure happens to come just as your treasuries are at their lowest, that any inconvenience can be felt.

The power of being certain to get notes for bullion as fast as it can be assayed is one much valued by bullion importers. It is a great stimulus, indirectly, to the use of notes. It was a great convenience to the importer, not an "encouragement," as Mr. Massey and Sir William Mansfield are said to have called it, which such a trade does not ask for, and ought not of course to have, but a convenience, like a good and powerful Mint, which it is only reasonable to afford them.

The bullion trade has now acquired great dimensions and importance, and I cannot help thinking it would have been well to have consulted those concerned in it, both here and elsewhere, before adopting a measure which so greatly affects them.

We have, as yet, only newspaper summaries of what passed in your Council in Calcutta on the fifth, which are probably very erroneous reports of the arguments in Mr. Massey's Act for amending the Paper Currency Act, but I confess there seems to me much justice in what Mr. Bullen is reported to have said. We make a large profit out of the Mint and from the Government Securities purchased to the value of four millions sterling with the rupees which we got in exchange for notes. In return for the income thus received by Government, I think we are bound to give every reasonable facility to the bullion importer, and the retention of balances of coin adequate to meet the demand for Currency Notes seems to me one of the first and most reasonable facilities the public can expect.

We have reported to you officially that the demand for rupees has slackened, and they are again coming to the Currency Department in exchange for notes, the circulation of which has this week much increased. For the present, therefore, we do not propose issuing any notification under your new Act.

We shall have to propose changes in the Charter of our Bank, which has been very badly managed.

Letter from Sir Bartle Frere to the Governor-General of India.

Bombay, 2d February 1866.

My letter of the 12th ultimo will have partly answered yours of the 11th, but I return the memorandum from your Financial Department, with some remarks added in a third column, and I also enclose a copy of a letter from Mr. Dickson, which will, I think, show you that our currency management has great faults of its own to answer for, and cannot safely throw stones at the Bank. Indeed the Financial Department seems entirely to mistake who is the party on trial. It is not the Bank, but the Government Currency Department. The Bank might have been in a better position to help the Currency Department; that is matter of opinion, and even that they deny; but the Currency Department ought not to have needed help, nor would they have needed it but for the extraordinary mistakes of locking up so much coin in Government paper, and then sending J. Lushington paper when he asked for coined silver.

But, as you justly say, it is little use discussing the past, except with reference to the future prevention of any recurrence of such difficulties, and in this sense, you will see that the improvement of the Bank's management, however important in itself, has really nothing to do with the question. It is a Paper Currency question, and nothing else.

And in this point of view I own I cannot agree to the opinions you express in your letter of the 23d. You say, that, "so far as we can help the bullion dealer, "without deranging our monetary arrangements, we "should do so."

As I understand the case, the bullion dealer needs no help. You say to him, "You shall not coin your own "silver; we will coin it for you." But it is not coined quickly, and having taken his good silver, and given him paper notes for it, you lock up his good silver in the form of Government Securities.

I must say, I think that in this case he has a right to expect all the facilities you can purchase with the interest of those securities.

But this you do not give him, and your Council call him an idle, shiftless fellow, who will not exert himself, but runs to Government for help.

I think your bullion importer has good ground to complain of this.

However, the main question now is, how to provide against a recurrence of these difficulties in future?

No doubt, a Gold Currency will do something, and we have sent you a memorial from very influential Native merchants here, asking for it.

But, unless more care is taken in managing your Paper Currency, Gold will only increase your difficulties.

You will think it a very local view of the case, but I cannot help feeling that your difficulties are greatly aggravated by your Financial Department looking at these questions with very imperfect information of what goes on here, where the great import of bullion is not likely to be checked for some time to come.

If you will send for Mr. Kellner he will tell you how badly the Accountant offices here are manned; and Mr. Gordon, who has just come here from Allahabad, tells me he is a loser of Rs. 200 per mensem by his transfer.

I feel sure you will never get a good Accountant officer here on the present rates of pay, and without a good Accountant officer you will be always in the dark regarding the largest and most sensitive bullion market in Asia.

MEMORANDUM on assumed causes of tightness in the Money Market at Bombay.

Bombay Explanation.

The whole price of cotton has had to be paid for at once, instead of being deferred, as formerly, until the arrival of the cotton in England.

II. The Exchange Banks have run dry, their united cash balances at the Bank of Bombay last year being 3¼ millions against quarter of a million this year.

III. The tardiness in the Financial Department to reinforce the treasury at Bombay with coin, and the selfish conduct of the Bank of Bengal in giving bills mostly drawn on customers of the Bombay Bank, so that the only effect was, that if the Bombay Bank discounted the bill it simply transferred so many rupees from the discount of customers A. B. to the account of the Government.

The sudden and unexpected withdrawal of deposits has already been referred to.

Remarks by the Fiancial Department, Government of India.

Knowing this, it was the business of the Bank of Bombay to gather up its resources, to meet the coming emergencies. How far this was acted upon will be shown further on.

As this must have been occasioned by bad management, further remarks on this point seem unnecessary.

The first intimation of an approaching tightness in the Bombay market was made by the Accountant General, Bombay, in October. Relief was furnished to the extent of seven lacs by bills through the Bank of Bengal, and the mint was ordered to work extra hours. During the month of November the tightness continued to increase. The Accountant General, Bombay, was accordingly authorized to sell bills on Calcutta and other places, and remittances were made by bills from Calcutta on the Bank of Bombay to the extent of 30 lacs. Bills were sent in preference to cash, first, because they afforded relief more quickly than the despatch of coin by sea, and, secondly, because they cost less. The practice of replenishing the Bombay Treasury by means of bills had been largely used by Government on a similar occasion in 1863, and no objection was raised to this mode of relief until December 15th when, in reply to arrangements made for increasing the general Treasury balance by 40 lacs of bills from the Bank of Bengal, a telegraph came, saying coin and not bills was required. About the same time the Bank of Bombay telegraphed to the Bank of Bengal, saying, they could not cash five lacs out of forty, and requesting ten lacs to be sent round to them in silver.

As the forty lacs proposed to be sent in bills consisted of bills which fell due day by day in January, the Bank of Bengal cannot be charged with demanding too much from the Bank of Bombay in expecting them to meet the requirements of Government.

But it would appear that the Bank of Bombay never made any effort to provide funds from the pressure which they must have known would inevitably fall upon them. They neither gathered up their resources from without, nor husbanded those they had in their possession at the commencement of their difficulties.

On an examination of the published accounts of the Bank, their loans appear to have continued at about four crores from 30th June last up to very nearly the present time.

Possibly the Bank were not in a position to call in these loans, as many of them were granted on personal securities, and any attempt to sell them up might have led, in the depressed state of the market, to serious losses and embarrassment.

But at least they should have endeavoured to keep what cash they had.

Although the Bank's advances were at the extreme point of four crores, and local rates at the danger point of 10 and 11 per cent. in June last, the Bank sent 26 lacs to Calcutta from July to September, and even after the heavy drain of specie set in upon them early in October they continued to use their funds in Remarks by Sir H. B. E. Frere.

This could not have been done without the gift of prophecy. The system of cash payments for cotton is quite a new one up country.

H.B.E.F.

This is a sweeping charge, and begs the question. None of the Exchange Banks failed, and all made large profits. Whether they might not have done better is rather a question for their shareholders. The difficulties they were in is some proof that the Bank of Bombay was not alone in its trials.

H.B.E.F.

A bill is a very useful mode of remittance, when you can get it discounted, but to send a bill on a constituent of the Government Bank, and then ask that Bank to discount it in silver, was a mockery. Be it remembered what was wanted was coined silver, not paper. The Bank could have discounted as many bills as the Government wished in currency notes which were a legal tender. But these notes would have at once gone to the mint, and would have broken down the Currency Department.

This criticism is not only quite beside the question, inasmuch as it is the Government Currency Department which wanted silver coin, not the Bank, which had plenty of notes and as much coin, too, as it wanted for itself.

But the facts are quite incorrect, as will be seen from the following statements.

First-class deposits	243

The above figures will show the extent to which the Bank had gathered in its resources and the sudden and large claim it had to meet. The first-

Bombay Explanation—continued.

The greater portion of the Treasury balance was in copper and small silver coins, and was consequently of little or no avail to the Bank.

There is no mention of silver in the agreement. Notes and cash* (which latter is the word used) must be held to be one and the same thing. The Bank could have presented their notes for silver, but the question is, could the currency department have cashed them? The Bank is apparently blamed for having shown forbearance, and for not having added to the difficulties Government were labouring under by demanding silver for their notes.

purchasing bills payable in Calcutta, and even when the Accountant General of Bombay went into the market and sold bills on Calcutta to reinforce his general Treasury balance, the chief buyers were the Bank of Bombay. Notwithstanding their available cash had gone down from 2 crores and 45 lacs to 1 crore and 18 lacs by the 11th November, and with heavy deposits due to the public, they sent to the Bank of Bengal bills purchased out of their diminished funds, nearly 8 lacs of which were supply bills of Government.

Since June last, Government have maintained in Bombay an average general Treasury balance of 54 lacs, while in Calcutta it was not over 78 lacs. The balance at Bombay has thus averaged 14 lacs in excess of the maximum balance to be kept under the agreement, and it should have been kept in silver, as a special reserve for Government, under Clause 3 of the agreement. That this important clause was not observed by the Bank is clear, from the fact that, according to the Accountant General's telegram of 21st December, there were only 6¼ lacs of whole half-rupees on that date in the Bank, including those belonging to Government.

class deposits alone were reduced by a million sterling.

This seems to me the only thing like a blot in the late management of the Bank, which has been hit, and even this is beside the question, for it is the Government Currency Department which so nearly broke down, and not the Bank.

The Bank's answer would be something of this kind,—

"It was impossible to foretell that there would have been such a demand for money in October. In September the Bank had more money than they knew how to lay out.

"Every Bank in Bombay made the same mistake (if it is one), and all remitted heavily to Calcutta.

"The Bank did purchase the bills, because a profit could at once be made on the transaction. As the Bank can always sell its bills in the bazaar ¼ per cent. better than Government. An amount equal to the purchase was sold by the Bank immediately after."

But if this is not a satisfactory answer, it still does not excuse the Currency Department for needing the help which the Bank could not afford.

Extract from Letter from Sir Bartle Frere to the Governor General of India.

Mar Waee, June 15th, 1866.

We sent you, some days ago, a mass of papers about the Bank of Bombay. You can imagine the anxiety it has caused us, especially since I heard yesterday of the suspension of the Agra Bank, which will be a very severe blow to every bank and every house of business in Bombay. But we have done our best in giving the Bank of Bombay the most experienced and careful Directors we can, and all the moral and material support in our power, and we can only await the result. Much as the sailor feels, who, having made the ship as secure as possible, waits to see whether her spars or the force of the hurricane are the stronger.

I find I was mistaken in supposing that we had sent home last year a draft of a Bill for altering that part of the Bank Charter which permits advances on the shares of other than chartered companies. The Bill was drafted, and the letter sending it for Sir C. Wood's approval was signed, when we got a call from the Government of India for a detailed report on the past management of the Bank, and the submission of the Bill was in consequence postponed. Sir C. Wood had strictly cautioned us not to legislate without previous reference to him and his Council.

No harm has, however, been done by the delay, as I am assured that the Charter power to make such advances has been a dead letter during the past twelve months.

I own I am very adverse to legislation just now in the midst of panic and general alarm. The public are, I think, well assured that we have now on the Bank Direction got the best of such banking experience and honest management as is to be had in Bombay. The run which had commenced, not on the Bank of Bombay only, but on all our banks, more than a fortnight ago, was checked by the news that Government would support the Bank, but a worse time of trial is expected after next mail arrives, or early in July, and a feather might turn the scale against confidence, and cause a fresh run.

But if you must legislate, I think you had better let us do what is wanted here. The local legislature has, I believe, full power to do all that is needed, and local legislation will occasion less risk of groundless panic and alarm as to what may be intended.

But my chief reason for deferring legislation would be a wish to go more fully into a subject which requires more attention than it has yet received.

It seems to me that the whole system of the Government connexion with the Government Banks, both here and in Calcutta, requires looking into.

You have not as yet suffered in Calcutta, chiefly because the Bank is so fortunate in its Manager, Mr. George Dickson; but there was, as you are doubtless aware, much murmuring against the favour shown by Government to the Bank, at various times during the past five years, and there would have been more outcry, had not all been doing so well that none felt inclined to complain of the good fortune of his neighbour.

Here, in Bombay, during our days of prosperity, the history of our Government Bank was a very simple one. The shareholders were mostly interested in the export trade, and elected Directors from the partners of the export houses, instead of looking for banking experience. The then Secretary was anything but a judicious or cautious man, and the Chairman, Mr. Birch, who had been sent to us from Madras as our Accountant General, had the reputation of knowing more of practical banking than any man in the Indian service.

I cannot say I ever thought so, but he always seemed to me a very safe sort of man. However, between them they relaxed most of the byelaws which their predecessors had laid down for restricting the action both of the Chairman and Secretary, and did a very reckless and losing business.

Government were the last to hear of the mischief, for their Accountant General, who ought to have acted as watchman and guardian of the public interests, was, as we are now assured, the chief mover in the hazardous changes introduced into the Bank management. This will partially explain to you why I put in Colonel Marriott as a Director, instead of our Accountant General (for which, by the way, you found fault with us). I have no fault whatever to find with Lushington, our present Accountant General. But Marriott is very clear-headed and independent, and not easily put aside, and I wanted to know more of the Bank management than Lushington could tell me, and I could learn it much more easily from a Secretary to Government with whom I was in almost daily communication, than from the Accountant General, who, like all officers directly under the Government of India, is apt to keep rather aloof from the local Government.

* M'Culloch defines cash as "ready money, drafts, bills, bonds, and all immediately negotiable paper in an individual's possession."

With, I believe, only two or three unimportant exceptions, all the Directors and officials of the Bank who had much to say to the mismanagement in the days of prosperity had gone when the crash came, just a year ago, and an almost entirely different set of men are responsible for the management since.

I do not think there is much fault to be justly found with what they have done. In their official letters the Government of India imply that the Bank should have "gathered up its resources" between July and November; but I think, when you see the figures, you will say that they did quite as much in this way as could have been expected. They might perhaps have sent more of their debtors through the Insolvent Court, but I much doubt whether they would have done anything in this way worth doing with a view to turn bad debts into good ones, The general impression here certainly is that a less forbearing policy would have added to the Bank's losses.

Upon the whole, with regard to the past, it seems to me that there has clearly been much bad management, but that it is, as in all cases when you deal with Boards, very difficult to fix any clear individual responsibility.

But with a view to making better arrangements for the future, the Bank's history during the past two years seems to me full of instruction.

In the first place, it seems to me to show that you ought to have only one Government Bank, instead of three, as at present. I do not know what are the serious difficulties, if any, in the way of amalgamation of the three Government Banks, or of, in some other way, concentrating your Government banking operations. But I am very sure that the time is come when you cannot much longer get on with three distinct and in some respects rival establishments.

Then your head quarters Bank parlour must be somewhere near your Chancellor of the Exchequer, so that he may personally know and be able personally to communicate with the Bank Managers, when necessary. I do not know how this is to be managed, unless you have your Officer of Accounts permanently, and your Chancellor of the Exchequer, for a part of the year at least, at Bombay or Poona. They must be at, or very near, one of the great trading centres. This puts Simla, Agra, Allahabad, or Lahore out of the question, and the choice lies between Calcutta and Bombay, which, for such a purpose, includes Poona. Bombay is rapidly becoming, if it is not now, the larger money market. It is, and always will be, the more sensitive, and the advantage of being a fortnight or even 10 days return post nearer London, seems to me nearly decisive.

In all matters of compiling voluminous accounts, which take long to concentrate at Calcutta and have then to be sent 1,200 miles back on their way to England, the advantage in point of time will be even greater.

Then you must have only one channel of communication between the financial head of the Government of India, instead of a dozen as at present.

This evil is not so much felt with regard to the Bank of Bengal; at least, it used not to be when I was at Calcutta, and when there was no one between the Bank and Wilson (or Laing), unless he chose to act through the Financial or Home Secretary.

But it must be felt to some extent even with the Bank of Bengal when you are away from Calcutta, and here I wonder how the Bank of Bombay gets on at all with so many masters.

The Governor General and his Council of course have their say to it, and so have we here. The Accountant General's Offices and Currency Commissioners here, with the Government of India, at Simla, and at Calcutta, all criticise, and act too, in moving about and drawing away funds. Sometimes in a very embarrassing manner, and sometimes, but much more rarely and cautiously, the Home authorities interpose.

Even when there is no action, the advice tendered and the information asked for from authoritative quarters is often enough to embarrass the Bank. Two instances which have occurred since this last crisis commenced will illustrate what I mean. In one, we got an open telegram, to ask if it was true that the bank had lent 80 lacs of rupees (800,000*l.*) to one speculator who was named.

These open telegrams are too frequently divulged to others than the parties addressed, and no merchant who cares the least for secrecy ever telegraphs, if he can help it, except in some cipher-language. Had such a telegram as this become public, it might have done incalculable mischief.

In the other case, also, at the commencement of the present pressure, our advice was gravely asked as to the propriety of withdrawing the Government balances from the Bank of Bombay, in anticipation of a run. A somewhat similar suggestion was made in the December crisis.

You can imagine the difficulties of a bank management surrounded by so many physicians, and some of them capable of giving such foolish advice.

On these four points: (1) the necessity of having but one Government Bank; (2) of having its head quarters at Bombay; (3) of placing the Government control and connexion with it in one office, and not, as now, in half a dozen; and, (4) of having that office at Bombay or Poona, I believe that experience and further consideration will confirm the views I have expressed, but I need not at present discuss the mode in which the change should be effected.

Letter from Sir Bartle Frere to the Governor General of India.

Poona, 22d June 1866.

We have just received from you a telegraph about the Bombay Bank. I enclose a copy of it, and of our reply, for easy reference.

You ought ere this to have received a great mass of official papers about the Bank, and my letter of the 15th will have briefly stated how we stand, and what are my own views.

I really do not know what more we can send you, but if you will specify the information you require it shall be sent.

You can have daily returns of the Bank's state, such as we ourselves receive by post.

But reaching you by post at least a week or more after date, they will be of no practical use to enable you to advise, assist, or control our Bank management. A run would have broken the Bank, or been successfully met, before the latter was half way to you.

You say, "Send us such information as can be sent by telegram." We have tried daily telegrams from the Bank to wherever I happened to be, and the delays and mistakes were so numerous that we gave it up. They would, of course, be multiplied greatly over such a long line as that to Simla. There was, besides, the invariable risk of mischief from sending such information by open telegram. This, of course, and the mistakes, might have been avoided by using the cipher telegram, but the use of cipher telegrams is a serious addition to lines already so much overtasked.

I would note in passing that the inefficiency and uncertainty of our telegraph is a very serious aggravation of our commercial difficulties.

But I would beg you to consider whether any telegraphic information, even if ever so full, accurate, and punctual, can enable you usefully to control and advise, or even to assist, except on suggestions sent hence?

Even if you got daily by telegraph a statement as full as the weekly published return, what would it tell you of information useful for the Bank's daily management.

I need hardly tell you the important questions of daily management do not brook many hours' delay, and many of the data on which they are decided can hardly be adequately given in writing. Practically all such questions are dealt with either at the daily meeting of the Chairman and Secretary or a Board meeting, and the discussion is mainly oral.

I really believe that there is little or nothing which Government can do, either here, or at Simla, or Calcutta, or in London, except to keep a balance as large as possible in the Bank's hands, and to abstain from interference as much as possible, except at the Bank's request.

I believe this will be quite sufficient to keep the Bank safe, for we have got in all our revenue for the past season, and our treasuries are, at this time of the year, always at their fullest. We can support the Bank by simply not withdrawing our deposits, for which we have no immediate use.

But, as I told you in my last letter, what the Bank has to fear is not what the Government may do here on the spot, but what may be done by any one of the many people who have more or less to say to your Account, Finance, or Currency Departments here, at Simla, in Calcutta, or in London.

If orders are telegraphed, as has, I am told, been frequently done, from Simla or Calcutta, in the name of the Government of India, without notice to us or any one else, to transfer large sums of many lacs of rupees from the Government reserve in the Bank's hands to the Currency Department in the Mint, any amount of mischief may be done in a time of panic like this. We have occasionally interfered, to stay compliance with orders of this kind, but, with the present system, the mischief may any day be done before we have time to hear or interfere.

As for practical suggestions to prevent evil for the present time, I can only advise that you should enjoin on your Finance and Account and Currency Departments, both at Simla and Calcutta, to issue no orders of importance to their representatives at Bombay, especially regarding the movement of cash or funds, without previous reference to the local Government, or at all events to send their orders through us.

As a permanent arrangement, as I have before submitted, the head quarters of all these Departments ought to be here, and I would earnestly commend this change to your consideration before some serious calamity happens, consequent on the distance and multiplicity of controlling and influencing authorities.

Whether at Simla or Calcutta they are as far from Bombay as London is from Naples, or Paris from Memel, and the means of communication are in India so much more tedious and uncertain as in effect to double the European distance. Just imagine a Neapolitan bank controlled from London, or, to make the comparison clearer, a Liverpool or Glasgow bank controlled from Naples.

We got a telegram from the Secretary of State a few days ago, opening a small credit on behalf of the Comptoir d'Escompte of Paris, and to-day another, rather mutilated in transit, which, as far as I can make out, authorizes us to advance 90 per cent. on Government securities deposited with the Secretary of State. You shall have a copy as soon as we have got all the correction we can obtain from Kurrachee. I mention this to show you that we may have large and expected demands on us.

The Bank return yesterday showed a slight improvement in deposits, but very serious fears are entertained both for Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy's sons and Premchund Roychund. The failure of the former would imply ruin to half the Parsee, and the latter to half the Banian community, and every exertion is being made by their friends, European and Native, to tide them over; but, unless cotton rises, I fear both must go.

Extract from Letter from Sir BARTLE FRERE to the Governor General of India.

Bombay, 10th December, 1866.

I send with this, for ready reference, some papers about our Bank. I really do not know what more we could send. The story is a very clear and simple one. Having doubled their capital, the Bank Directors ran a race with others as reckless as themselves, in bidding for custom, and lent out their money on bad security, and no security at all. They had a rash and incompetent Secretary (Blair), and the Accountant General (Birch), to whom we should naturally have looked for advice or warning, was Chairman, and gave us no notice whatever of anything calling for notice or check. Partly from failing health, and partly from his equivocal and anomalous position—nominally the servant of the local Government, but really looking mainly to the Government of India as his immediate masters—he kept aloof from us very much, and left us, to return to England, as did Blair, without a word of warning. The crash came, and found the Bank with a safe full of securities, which have turned out hardly worth the paper they are written on, some of them, indeed, worse than worthless, for their possession has rendered the Bank liable for calls.

Since Blair and Birch went, and since our attention was directed to the Bank's affairs, I believe the Directors have honestly, and not unwisely, done their best to get out of the mess the Bank was in. They have lost half their capital, and have asked leave to write it off. All the Directors are changed, and they have just sent for Mr. John Stuart, an old secretary, who managed the Bank with great prudence for many years. I really do not know what more can be done.

I would have urged making a public example of the men who did all the mischief, but in the midst of all the distress they have caused, I have not yet heard any imputation on their good faith. They made ducks and drakes of the Bank's money, as they did with their own and their friends', but when almost every considerable trader and money lender, individuals and firms alike, has done the same, with very few exceptions, and when nothing worse than sharing the prevalent rashness and folly is imputed, I do not see the use of prosecution for the punishment of folly.

But if any further inquest is to be held, I think you had better send some one quite unconnected with Bombay, or even India to make it. Any further inquiry we could make here, and, I believe, any you could have made by people from Calcutta or Madras, would do nothing but tell us what is already known, and be no more productive of pratical good than an inquiry into the South Sea Bubble.

Telegram from Sir BARTLE FRERE to the Governor General of India, dated 22d February 1867.

This Government requests immediate answer, by clear line telegram, to letter regarding renewal of Agreement with Bank of Bombay, as recommended by this Government.

Extract from a Letter (private) to Sir J. LAWRENCE.

Bombay, 23d February 1867.

I had for some weeks been rejoicing in the sense of security regarding Bank affairs which was imparted by the return of our old and trusted Secretary, Mr. John Stuart, when I received, yesterday afternoon, quite unexpectedly, intelligence of a steady run, which had for some days been preceded by gradual withdrawal of deposits, amounting altogether to about a crore in ten days.

With my colleagues, Messrs. Ellis and Erskine, I met Mr. Stuart and the Government Directors (Messrs. C. Chapman and Norman) in the evening, and the result was my telegram to you in part cipher.

Besides the withdrawals usual for trading purposes about this time, it seems that confident rumours, founded on supposed telegrams from Calcutta, were in circulation to the effect that you had decided against renewing the agreement with this Bank, which was thereupon to shut its doors, even if it reopened them under another constitution. These rumours were much aggravated in effect by the persistent misrepresentations of the "Friend of India," whose utterances are always believed by the unofficial public here to have more or less an official foundation, and by the supposed intention of the Bank of Bengal, after opening branches in the Central Provinces and the Punjab, to open one in Bombay. Mr. Stuart, however, believed the alleged telegrams to be simply fictions, invented by those who wished to "bear" the Bank shares. They had varied Rs. 300 in a few days.

He agreed with the Government Directors, that an authoritative contradiction of the rumour would restore confidence; but this contradiction we could not give without previous reference to you, hence my telegram.

Your answer will, I hope, enable us to restore confidence. I feel great trust in Mr. Stuart. He is of the same sound school as Mr. George Dickson, and has quite sufficient ability, combined with firmness and honesty, to do all that is possible to retrieve past errors, and I hope you will have less anxiety about our Bank than we have had of late.

But your Financial Member of Government, and all your Financial advisers, ought, I would respectfully submit, to know more of this very sensitive money market than they do. The place is now as big as two Glasgows. Lyons and Marseilles rolled into one would hardly equal it in either population or trade, and it is daily growing at a rate I have never seen equalled; while the "Friend" is singing dirges over its ruin, and while many of its great traders are ruined, and more embarrassed, I have never seen the ordinary trade and movement of Bombay so brisk. There are few better tests than private building, and while a few of the would-be-palaces are standing still, there is quite as much private building of houses, from hucksters' shops up to houses worth 20,000*l.*, as during the American war; and there are many signs that the briskness is that of a sound trade.

How much of all this, of its springs and effects, Mr. Massey and your other Ministers know, you can tell better than I can. I only know that I can hear of no inquiries from Calcutta addressed to our Government or Bank officials, nor our Chamber of Commerce, or great mercantile houses, so that any information before you is likely to be to a great extent second hand.

I wish you would come and see and judge for yourself.

We are a little better off for houses in Poona than when Maine was here, and had I been remaining I would have engaged to put you up, so that you and your family would not have complained of bad accommodation from June to November in Poona, or from November to March here.

April to June are still difficulties for a very large Court like yours. We have plenty of good climate for an Indian hot season at Matheran, Egutpoora, Khandalla, within five hours of Bombay, and better still, 24 hours further off, at Mahableshwur, but very rough accommodation.

But I would have engaged to put up Mr. Massey very comfortably for the whole year, or as long as he could stay; and I think there is much to be learnt in Bombay which he will hardly see elsewhere.

However, I fear I shall be able to do little to further such plans, except by distant advice, which a year hence will be growing obsolete; though old or new it is always at your command, as I hope you need no assurance from me.

Letter from Sir Bartle Frere to the Governor General of India.

Bombay, 1st March 1867.

What has been done to support the Bank of Bombay since I wrote to you on the 23d February you will have learnt from our official telegrams and letters. The run which had commenced has been stopped, but the Bank is not in a position to do any effectual business. It may last for the next twelve months, as it has done for the twelve months past, propped up by Government and by others who are aware how much mischief might follow its failure. But a working, useful Bank, it cannot be, unless it be entirely reconstructed. This is the opinion of Mr. John Stuart, the old secretary, who, after several weeks trying to put life into it, is obliged to confess that the attempt is hopeless without a reconstitution, or a call on the shareholders, which, just at present, is out of the question.

Under these circumstances, the Directors have proposed to make overtures to the Bank of Bengal to take over the business of the Bank, and its recoverable capital, and to become, in fact, a branch of the Bank of Bengal. I confess I do not see any other solution of the difficulty, which is not open to greater objections. The Directors of the two banks will, of course, discuss the terms of any amalgamation. All the people here desire is to know, if possible before the 12th, when they have a meeting of shareholders, whether the proposal is approved by the Government of India.

Mr. Erskine has doubts of the sound policy of a single State Bank for all India, which will be the probable result, but he sees no alternative.

My other colleagues agree with the Directors.

Letter from Mr. Rustomjee Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy to Sir Bartle Frere, referred to in his foregoing Letter of the 15th June 1865 to the Governor General.

Bombay, 13th June 1865.

I need not tell you that commercial matters in Bombay are at present in a state of great jeopardy, distrust prevailing everywhere, and business is nearly at a standstill, because cash payments are almost suspended.

I understand that the Bank of Bombay have written to Government asking aid in this season of difficulty, and have suggested that this assistance should be given in the shape of an assurance on the part of Government that a crore to a crore and a half of currency notes shall be placed at its disposal, if required by the Bank of Bambay, upon the security of the assets of the Bank. The object of my troubling you in this matter is to express my earnest hope that you will give this proposal your serious consideration. I believe that if it were only known that Government was ready to come forward in this way to relieve the existing pressure, the very knowledge of that fact would produce confidence, and Government would, in all probability, have to advance but a small portion, if any, of the sum applied for.

As things stand now, there may be on any day such a sudden panic, and consequent run upon the Bank of Bombay, on the part not only of the public but also of the many banks who keep their deposits of spare cash there, that the Bombay Bank may be placed in a very inconvenient position, and the consequences will be very disastrous.

I believe that even if the advance is made by Government to the full extent required, the sum will soon be repaid, as a healthy trade may be expected as soon as the present crisis is past. I may also mention that I believe that a great deal of hoarding of notes and rupees is now practised in the bazaar, many of the dealers being afraid to invest their surplus funds; but if it becomes known that Government is coming to the rescue, much of this hidden property will see the light, and be thrown upon the market. Much money is also locked up for the present with the view of providing for the purchase of shares after the 1st July, and hence circulation is for the present greatly impeded.

I think it only proper to state, before I close this, that I have no personal interest to serve in writing to you on this matter, for I am thankful to say that I am free from any engagements in time bargains in shares, which will be the ruin of so many in this place.

Rustomjee Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy.

His Excellency
Sir H. B. E. Frere, K.C.B., Poona.

P.S.—I have sent a copy of this letter to the Honble. Mr. Ellis.

Yours obediently,
R. J. J.

Letter from Mr. Ralli, referred to by Sir Bartle Frere in his foregoing Letter to the Governor General of the 22d June 1865.

Bombay, 17th June 1865.

My dear Mr. Ellis,

Shall I apologize for intruding myself upon your precious time with these few lines? I hope, even if you will think so, that you will excuse me, and in any case, if you find that the subject of this letter is not worthy of your attention, please throw it into the fire, and let not a word be said about it.

Do you remember the conversation we had at your bungalo in Bombay two months ago on the state of the share market and the monetary affairs in general of the place? I do not remind you of the circumstance in order to prove to you that I was a good prophet, because what has occurred since and is going on has surpassed even my forebodings, but I only refer to this conversation as an introduction to the subject-matter of this letter.

The newspapers and public report so amply inform you of the state of affairs in Bombay at the present moment, I need not recapitulate. I am only sorry to add, that we have not seen yet the worst, and that in the course of the next three or four weeks I am much afraid that a general ruin, involving the three fourths of the inhabitants of Bombay, either Natives or Europeans, will be witnessed.

It is the consequence of the previous prevailing wild speculation, and no human help can be afforded. Neither the Government nor individuals, or any propositions or schemes, can afford relief to those who irretrievably have become insolvents; they must suffer the consequences of their folly, and the quicker this takes place the better for the general public.

But, unfortunately, the legitimate trade of the Presidency is so much interwoven with the present state of the share market, that I think, if no helping hand comes to the rescue, this trade will have to suffer immensely, and all the benefits obtained during the four years that the American war has lasted will be totally lost.

I am perfectly aware that Government cannot and must not interfere in private matters, nor any lasting good can be derived even if they had the power and inclination to interfere; materially speaking, affairs must be left alone to take their regular course, and after the collapse we shall be again into smooth water.

But the present state of affairs is quite unprecedented; it threatens to involve all Bombay into a general ruin, and for this reason I consider that Government is bound to interfere, and afford its usual support, by adopting whatever measure it will think proper for the maintenance of the credit of the only public institution we have in Bombay, I mean the Bank of Bombay.

I know that the powers of the Government in the constitution of this Bank are very limited, but there is one which, if properly exercised at the present crisis, may be of a great benefit and advantage to the public, and may contribute materially to the re-establishment of that confidence of which we are so much in need.

It is not fair nor wise, without a fair knowledge of all the circumstances, to condemn the management of the Directors of the Bank of Bombay; it is evident, however, that they also, unfortunately, were carried by the general infatuation of last year, and not the less by the then prevailing influence of the Native element, and have exhausted the means of the Bank in giving credit to parties who were not entitled to obtain, and in advancing money on securities of a very unsound character; this liberality has brought them to the present stress, and the Bank now finds itself, if not in peril, most certainly in the most uncertain and precarious position.

The uncertainty of the affairs of the Bank of Bombay contributes not a little to the mistrust and confidence which predominate during the prevalence of a commercial and financial crisis, and in this instance much more, because the public have lost all confidence to the present Directors of the Bank.

The Government Directors of the Bank of Bombay, who at present are only two instead of being three, are men of integrity and high standing, but they are not men of business, nor can their various occupations allow them much time for the affairs of the Bank; naturally enough, in questions of credit, they must follow the opinions and appreciations of their fellow elected directors, and the consequence has been that this institution has been brought into its present abnormal position.

It would have been, therefore, advisable, and in my opinion very beneficial, if the Governor would and could take the initiative by replacing the present Government Directors with three independent merchants of Bombay, who are totally free of any transactions in the share market, or are promoters of land companies and other undertakings. Such a measure, well explained and well understood, I am confident will have a very good effect on the public mind, and will be also very beneficial to the Bank itself.

I took the liberty, my dear Mr. Ellis, to express myself very freely, but I hope you will appreciate and give justice to my motives. I am a foreigner in Bombay. I have no personal ambition, nor am I interested in any way. We came here as regular merchants, and as such we cannot but see with dismay and regret that the legitimate trade of the Presidency should collapse and retrograde for many years to come.

Believe me, my dear Mr. Ellis,

The Honourable H. B. Ellis, &c. &c. &c.

Yours sincerely,

A. T. Ralli.

Letter from Mr. Rustomjee Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy, referred to by Sir Bartle Frere in his foregoing Letter to the Governor General of the 22d June 1865.

Dear Sir, Bombay, 18th June 1865.

As your Excellency is already aware, I am myself interested in no time bargain transactions in shares, &c. I think the only course now left to save the commercial reputation of Bombay is by asking the Supreme Government to pass the Time Bargain Bill into law at once.

I need hardly put forward any reasons for making this suggestion; suffice it to say, that I feel fully convinced now of the urgent necessity of some such measure being speedily passed, say before the 1st July next.

Assured as I am of the great interest which your Excellency and your able colleague in Council take in the welfare of Bombay, I am emboldened to write you in the belief that there is still time to save the Presidency over which you so ably preside from a complete wreck.

I send this letter by a special messenger.

I remain, &c.

His Excellency Rustomjee Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy.

Telegram from the Government of India, dated 20th June 1866, referred to in the foregoing Letter of the 22nd June 1866.

We hear of the rapid decrease in the value of Bombay Bank shares, and are still without any information as to the affairs of the Bank. We wish, if possible, to support the Bank, to maintain public credit, and to prevent alarm, but we can take no steps while we are in ignorance of the condition of the Bank. We must insist on such information as can be communicated by telegram, to be followed immediately by a full official report.

Reply to the above from the Government of Bombay, despatched on the 22d idem.

Full details of past affairs of Bank ought to have reached you ere this. Of current affairs no details by telegram would give useful information on which you could act with good effect. Crisis in England coming with fall in cotton, and such failures as Agra and Commercial Banks have destroyed confidence, and business is suspended. From 13th to 19th current deposits decreased 44 lacs; they increased 3 lacs on 20th; if Government reserve is kept up, Bank will, we hope, meet all liabilities. You can have daily return of Bank's state if required; but this Government earnestly represent the risk of your acting on information necessarily imperfect and liable to errors; and would strongly recommend no active steps be taken except on suggestions from this; and especially that Government balances in Bank be not reduced beyond imperative necessity.

Important words in both telegrams in cipher.

India Office,
Dear Sir Bartle, March 3, 1865.

I cannot help being in some alarm at the possibility of a crash in your Bombay speculations. We hear of disagreeable rumours, and after the way in which they have been going on I am afraid that it is too probable.

Pray look after your bank and currency matters. We must stand clear; but I would send for your Government directors in the Bank, and desire them to look very carefully into what the Bank is doing, and to keep you informed.

Yours truly,

Sir H. B. Frere, K.C.B., &c. &c.

India Office,
Dear Sir Bartle, May 18, 1865.

Pray desire your Government directors to look after the Bank's proceedings.

Their advancing on shares, such as you have at Bombay, is contrary to all banking principles.

It would be contrary to the charters of the banks of Calcutta and Madras. Unfortunately not so as to Bombay; but it is not the less wrong.

Yours truly,

Sir H. B. Frere, K.C.B. C. Wood.

Extract letter from Sir John Lawrence to Sir Bartle Frere, dated 4th June 1866.

We are all very anxious about the stability of the Bank of Bombay, and very well disposed to support it as far as we can possibly do so with due regard to the public interests. We can quite understand why you have not taken measures to reform its constitution, and put it on a sound basis, in the present critical state of affairs in Bombay, but we think that you might still have a full and careful inquiry into the real conditions of the Bank, so as to enable us to judge how we should act; the result of such inquiry to be kept as secret as possible. At present we are quite in the dark as to the actual solvency of the Bank. I am afraid that the extraordinary depressed price of cotton, and the depressed state of mercantile affairs generally in England, must react very seriously on Bombay, and that we must anticipate some large failures.

Extract letter from Sir John Lawrence to Sir Bartle Frere, dated Simlah, 20th June, 1866.

We are most anxious regarding the state of the Bombay Bank, and our anxiety is much increased from your not giving us any account of its real condition. If we are to help you in tiding over the present crisis, you must make us acquainted with the actual state of the Bank's affairs. At present we know nothing beyond what we can gather from the newspaper reports, which, of course, are not very reliable.

Extract letter from Sir John Lawrence to Sir Bartle Frere, dated Simlah, 28th June 1866.

I am very glad to hear that the Bombay Bank is so well in hand, and that everything which circumstances admit of has been done to meet the gale which is still likely to burst on Bombay.

We are quite willing that the change in the charter of that bank should be made in your legislature. We very unwillingly made up our minds to do the work when we despaired of getting your Government to act. What we now desire is that the change should be made at once; we think that, if the measure be introduced, with a statement that no such business as that which it is proposed to prohibit has been allowed for some time, and an assurance of Government support be also declared, the general effect will be to add to the confidence now existing in the stability of the bank.

What we feel here is that we allow pledges to be given in support of the Bank of Bombay, which has been carried on for some time on unsound principles; we may therefore be seriously compromising the finances of the state, and have been kept in ignorance of the real condition of the Bank's affairs. We therefore desire both to be put in possession of the exact state of the Bank, and to have the system on which it is carried on at once so altered that no one can allow matters to revert to the old system without incurring the penalties attached to an infraction of the law.

I have been looking over the different despatches from the Secretary of State regarding the modification required in the bank charter, and can find nothing which amounts to a caution against legislation without reference to him. Moreover, if you considered a reference was absolutely necessary, surely you ought to have made it long ago, and not delayed because we had asked for certain information regarding the management of the bank. As the case stands, you neither made the reference to the Secretary of State, nor gave us the information asked for.

As to the instructions of the Secretary of State on the point under discussion, the despatch No. 71 of the 8th September directed that measures should be taken for effecting the necessary change in the Bank's charter. The despatch of the 2nd June 1865 directs us to take the earliest opportunity of restricting the business of the Bombay Bank, and those instructions, issued before the last crisis, and after a derangement of the Bank's affairs consequent on the transaction of unsound business, evidently contemplated legislative measures, the last paragraph of the letter saying that in the meantime checks, such as these contemplated, being carried out through the directors. The last despatch on the subject, that of the 24th March 1866, certainly does contemplate a report, but also fully admits that decided measures are required

While you say that you are averse to legislation just now, you tell me that your main reason is that you are in favour of large changes, whereby the three presidential banks shall be incorporated into one concern to be located at Bombay or Poonah. Now, I do not think it would do any good to enter into such a question, the effect of which would simply be to postpone indefinitely a very simple but important change which we desire. It is not so much the public that we wish to satisfy, though this is of importance, but that we require the change for our own satisfaction as responsible for the general finances of India.

There is only one other point in your letter to which I will advert, and that is to Colonel Marriott's nomination as director of the Bombay Bank. I have not the papers by me to refer to, but my impression is that the Government of India did not object to his appointment, but to the non-appointment of the Accountant General of Bombay. If I recollect right there were two vacancies in the direction for the Bombay Bank, to which you appointed Mr. Norman, the collector of Bombay, and Colonel Marriott, thus leaving out the Accountant General, the officer to whom the Government of India looks as its representative; the officer who, under the old standing orders from the time of the Court of Directors, ought to be one of the directors. Had you appointed him and Colonel Marriott to the two vacancies, doubtless, no objection would have been raised.

I have not yet seen the official report of the condition of the Bank of Bombay, it being still with the Financial Department.

Extract from a letter from Sir Bartle Frere to Sir Charles Wood.

Private and confidential. Poona, July 7th 1865.

I hope my telegram of the 4th will have assured you that the worst of the crisis in the Bombay money market is passed. I enclose copies of my letters to the Governor General, giving him such information as I thought he would care to have regarding our Bank, and I hope it will not be necessary to send him any more bulletins.

It remains to ascertain the extent of the mischief done, and who is to be blamed, and time is necessary before we can get a satisfactory answer on either point.

It is possible that some of the debts, which at present promise badly, may turn out better than is expected, but under the most favourable circumstances possible the Bank must lose heavily, and I fear that there can be no doubt the majority of their losses must be set down to the very bad management of the past year. The Bank directors have advanced largely to men who were known to be speculating to a dangerous extent; "to be buying," as the phrase is, "for money," and "selling for time," and in this respect, and in their advances on unguaranteed shares, the losses would have been far heavier had not the warning you gave me enabled me to put our Government directors on their guard.

There is to be a meeting of shareholders soon, at which it is probable much will be stated which will help us to ascertain who is to be blamed, and till we receive the report which we have called for from our present Government directors I can only state my general impressions. The secretary, on whom so much depends, was certainly not competent to manage so important a bank in such times. The Bank directors present were second-rate men,* overwhelmed with affairs of their own, and too much of one clique. The European directors certainly did not control their native colleagues as they ought to have done; but I have as yet heard of nothing worse than want of weight and power. Mr. Birch, the Government director, is much blamed by the popular voice as a great advocate for looking mainly to personal security in place of something more tangible, but without further data, such as his successor's report will furnish, I cannot tell how far this charge is warranted by facts.

Private. Poona, October 28th, 1866.

We have had infinite trouble lately with the Bank of Bombay and the Back Bay Reclamation Company. The former is suffering from grievous mismanagement during the share mania two years ago, which cost it half its capital. We have since changed all the directors, amended their charter, and the bank might, I believe, do very well for the future, but the Government of India sees through the spectacles of the Bank of Bengal (which has been admirably managed, but which is still a rival bank), is not satisfied, and calls us to obtain and send by post the names and all other particulars regarding all the Bank's customers who are under advances to the Bank. We demur to ask the Bank for information which no solvent bank ought, we think, to give, and the communication of which ought to be followed by the withdrawal of all custom from the Bank. We have asked the Government of India, if they want more inquiry into the past, to nominate independent commissioners to inquire here; but as nothing has ever been charged against the directors worse than the almost incredible mismanagement, folly, and extravagance from which so many banks have suffered at the same time in their rivalry for custom, and as the directors and secretary of that day have all left, I hardly see the use of further inquiry.

No. 2,741. Bank of Bombay,
1861. Bombay, 20th June, 1861.

To Messrs. Rimington and Kelly, Bombay.

Gentlemen,

With reference to enclosed copies of the charters of the Banks of Bengal and Bombay, I am directed to request that you will revise the charter of the Bank of Bombay, assimilating it as closely as possible to that of the Bank of Bengal, embodying the proposed alterations, and making provision for power to the Bank to increase the capital to Rs. 2,10,00,000.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your obedt. servant,
JAMES BLAIR,
Secretary and Treasurer.

I shall be glad to see you, in reference to the above, when you can conveniently call at the Bank, before 4.30.—J.B.

Herewith is left a copy of the Act by which the Bank of Bombay was established This was amended by Act 21 of 1854.

It is now proposed to make some further alterations in their Act, with a view to entering hereafter into some arrangement with Government for taking over the management of the Treasury. The Directors of the Bank of Bombay have been in communication with the Directors of the Bank of Bengal, and have obtained from them a copy of their charter with such alterations therein as they wish to have. The Directors here have considered these alterations, and wish that their own Act should be similar to that of the Bank of Bengal.

Counsel, therefore, is requested to modify the existing Act according to the alterations made in the Bengal charter; and we would draw his attention to the following points in doing so.

It will be necessary by the preamble to repeal the Acts 3 of 1840, and 21 of 1854, but at the same time to keep alive existing liabilities and privileges.

The Directors are to have power from time to time to increase their capital to a sum not exceeding Rs. 2,10,00,000, by the issue of new shares of Rs. 1,000 each.

There are to be ten Directors, four of whom are to be nominated by Government.

With regard to the description of business to be transacted by the Bank (s. 25), the Bank of Bengal wished to have power to deal in exchanges; but on reference to the document herewith sent, No. 3649, it will be seen, by paragraph 1 of the memorandum, that Government decline to allow such a power generally, but are prepared to allow it in a modified form. Counsel is requested to prepare this clause in such a manner as will meet this modified form.

The arrangements which may hereafter be come to with Government for taking over the management of the Treasury will be carried out by some separate deed; Acts 19 and 24 of 1861 provide for this. But in preparing the draft, counsel is requested to insert such words as may make it clear that the Bank under its new constitution will have power to make the arrangements contemplated by Act 24 of 1861.

It is proposed that the internal management of the Bank should be carried on subject to byelaws; and the new Act must give the Directors power to make byelaws and alter them from time to time.

Dear Sir, 27th November 1862.

We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th instant, with its enclosures, having reference to the form of the draft of the new Act.

As instructions to counsel to prepare a new Act, we laid before him a copy of the existing charter. On examining this with care, it was seen that it was drawn in a somewhat loose manner, and certainly was not in accordance with the phraseology of the present day. The advantage of following the existing forms is, that if any question should hereafter arise upon the construction of any clause of the charter, you would possibly have the advantage of some decision in the English courts. We therefore determined that the draft should follow to a great extent the phraseology of the English Joint Stock Companies Act; but the order of the clauses is almost the same as in the existing charter.

For the reason above stated, and because the draft is more comprehensive than the existing charter and than the Bengal Act, we would recommend that the draft should be adopted; we would add, as a further reason for adopting the draft, that it has obtained the approval of the Governor General of India, and that if any extensive alteration is made in it, some delay might arise in referring it back to Calcutta.

If it should be considered desirable, we can speedily make the draft in accordance with the Bengal Act.

On perusing the Act for the Bank of Bengal, we find that there are a few words which might beneficially be introduced into your draft before it is submitted to the Legislative Council; but they effect no material alterations in the draft. For instance, the clause providing for auditors should be inserted.

We beg to return you the draft bill for the Bank, and the official letter from Government, and are

Yours truly,

John H. Ryland, Esquire, Bank of Bombay. KELLY AND HORE.

India Office,

Financial.
No. 103.

To His Excellency the Right Honourable the Governor General of India in Council.

My Lord,

Para. 1. I have received your Financial Letter, dated the 2d January 1863, No. 1, replying to my Despatch of the 16th September last, No. 158, relative to the measures adopted by you for transferring the Government Treasury business to banks, and for the introduction of a Government paper currency into India; and I have also received your Financial Letter, dated the 15th April last, No. 46, forwarding minutes by the several members of your Government on the same subject.

2. I have carefully considered in Council your observations in reference to the arrangements which you have made, for the employment of the Bank of Bengal and its branches in connection with the issue and circulation of notes; but the perusal of them has not removed the objections which I have always entertained and expressed to such employment of the Bank.

3. A great defect of your arrangements is, that no adequate security is provided for the convertibility of the notes, especially in parts of India distant from Calcutta, although it is certain that the most complete confidence on this point is indispensable to the success of the circulation of the Government notes.

4. I pointed out, in my former despatch, that your having relieved the Bank from the necessity of holding one fourth of its liabilities, payable on demand, in specie, necessarily diminished the coin available for the convertibility of the notes.

5. Your arrangements have, however, a further tendency to diminish the coin available for the conversion of notes; for the explanation contained in your Despatch of the principle on which the payment of three quarters per cent. is to be calculated, shows that the Bank has every inducement to hold as little coin and as large an amount of notes as possible in its reserve. You state that the three quarters per cent. is to be paid on all notes for which the Bank has given bullion or coin. It will be payable, therefore, on all notes kept in reserve by the Bank, whilst, on coin so kept, it would of course receive nothing. It is obviously, therefore, the interest of the Bank to keep notes, and not coin, in its reserve.

6. With respect to the branches of the Bank of Bengal, the duty of cashing the notes is not even imposed on them. They are only expected to do so, as stated in your Despatch, "in ordinary circumstances;" and in Mr. Laing's minute the cashing of notes at the branches is spoken of as "an accommodation to the public, as a matter of convenience," and not as "a legal obligation."

7. I readily admit that this is as much as can fairly be expected from a banking establishment, which is altogether unconnected with the currency, but it certainly is not the sort of security for the convertibility of its notes which Government is bound to provide.

8. You stated that one of your principal reasons for not adopting the system of circles, and for using the Bank as the Agent of the Government, was, because you conceived that the latter course of proceeding ensured the advantage of an uniform currency, which would be impossible with different circles of issue.

9. I observe, however, that under the system which you have adopted, even within a much more limited area round Calcutta, the notes of the branch banks are put into circulation with a mark upon them, indicating the place of issue, "those put into circulation by each "branch being freely exchanged for coin at their own "branch, and if sent elsewhere, and paid into any "other branch, or into the head office, they are imme- "diately returned to the branch to which they belong."

10. I do not see in what respect this system differs from that which I had recommended for the circles of issue, with one exception. The notes issued at each centre of a circle would have been legally convertible there, whilst, according to your plan, the notes are only to be freely exchanged at the place where they are put into circulation.

11. It is obvious that the same degree of uniformity exists in both plans, whilst, according to my directions in regard to circles, actual convertibility at each centre of issue of the notes issued at such centre would be secured.

12. I remain, therefore, of opinion, that the only sound system for the management of the paper issue in India is, that it should be entirely in the hands of the Government, and that the Bank should have no connexion whatever with it; and I adhere to that which I conveyed to you in paragraph 31 of my Financial Despatch of the 16th September 1862, that it is "wise "to intrust to Government agency, and to Government "agency alone, the issue of paper as well as of metallic "money, combining as far as possible both measures "in the same Department of Government, and to leave "to banks only the exercise of legitimate banking "functions."

13. I am equally certain that, in the exercise of its legitimate functions, the Bank would essentially promote the circulation of notes, as I pointed out to you in the subsequent paragraphs of that Despatch.

14. I have, therefore, to desire that you will, at the earliest period in your power, take measures for carrying into execution the instructions contained in that Despatch:—

1st. That the notes in Calcutta should be issued by the Commissioner at the Mint, and that the means of verifying the notes and exchanging notes for bullion and coin, and vice versâ, should be established there.

2nd. That at certain places, which probably need not exceed five or six in Bengal and the Upper Provinces, offices should be established for the issue and exchange of notes.

3rd. That these notes should differ from the Calcutta notes only in having the name of the place of issue marked upon them; should be convertible of right only at the place of issue, or at Calcutta; should be receivable everywhere at Government treasuries in payment of taxes, and should be converted at any other place of issue if the officer anticipated no risk in doing so.

15. I merely point to these general measures, and for any further details I need only refer you to my former Despatches, and especially to my Financial Despatch of the 2d May 1861, requesting you to keep in mind the fundamental principle that the Bank is to have no part in the management of the currency.

Financial Letter to India, dated 2d May 1861, No. 75:—
Extract, para. 32. "The issue of notes should, therefore, be kept quite distinct from any banking establishment, and the supply of notes to any banks must be on precisely the same terms as to any other person."

16. An obstacle may exist in the agreement with the Bank of Bengal for the management of the issue and circulation of notes, receiving a payment of three quarters per cent. on the notes taken over by it. As the agreement is only for five years, and as by the change above-directed the Bank will be relieved from considerable expense and responsibility, they may not be unwilling to come to an arrangement for cancelling the agreement and dispensing with the payment, and I shall be ready to view favourably any proposal which you may make for this purpose.

17. I entirely approve of your placing the whole of the Treasury business in the hands of the Bank of Bengal and its branches, as pointed out in paragraph 57 of my Financial Despatch of the 16th September 1862. I am also in favour of your encouraging the Bank to establish branches in different parts of the country, to which the Government Treasury business of the place may be transferred.

18. I apprehend that, in confiding to the Bank of Bengal and its branches the management of the Treasury business, you will be able, without detriment to the public interests, to extend such advantages to the Bank as will fairly compensate it for any loss to which it may be exposed from the withdrawal of the three quarters per cent. on the currency business. I should hope, therefore, that you will not find much difficulty in this matter.

19. I cannot, however, give up the condition on which alone any bank can be entrusted with the Government business, and that is, that it should be debarred from dealing at all in foreign exchanges.

20. I believe that, by the establishment of a great bank entrusted with the business of the Government, important advantages may be secured, not only to the Government, but also to the public and to the bank itself; that, without loss or danger to the Government, great benefit may be obtained by the bank, from its connexion with the Government; but it is essential for the security of such operations that the business to be conducted by it should be legitimate banking business, and that it should abstain from all speculative commercial transactions.

21. The same course should be adopted also in regard to the Banks of Madras and Bombay, and probably but little difficulty will be found in those Presidencies, as the arrangements have not proceeded so far as in Bengal. Copies of this Despatch will therefore be sent to the Governments of Madras and Bombay for their guidance.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient humble Servant,
(Signed) C. Wood.

No. 52, Fort William,
Financial Department,
Resolution. the 27th March 1862.

The arrangement with the Bank of Bengal having now been completed for the transfer of the Treasury business at Calcutta, Patna, Mirzapore, Benares, and Dacca, and for undertaking the Agency of the Government currency in the circle of Calcutta, the time has arrived when the Government desire to extend similar arrangements to the North-Western Provinces, including Oude and the Punjab.

Where there are no existing banks, arrangements will be made with the Bank of Bengal for the establishment of branches, if that bank is willing to undertake them on fair terms for the public, but at the following places, viz.:

Allahabad,
Agra,
Delhi,
Lucknow, and Lahore;

there are one or more existing banks, or one or more banks so connected with the districts, that they might reasonably claim some preference if willing to do the Government business on terms as favourable for the public as other banks.

It is impossible for the Government to reconcile the conflicting claims of such banks, and at the same time do justice to the public interests, which require the currency business to be transacted by one and the same Government agency within the same circle, by any selection among those banks, and accordingly his Excellency in Council resolves to invite tenders for undertaking the Treasury business at the above-mentioned places, under the following conditions:—

The cash at each treasury will be divided into three parts. The first, a minimum balance, which the Government will undertake to keep in the hands of the bank without interest, or to pay interest at 5 per cent. on any portion of it which may be for a time overdrawn; the second, the difference between such minimum and a maximum balance, the whole of which may be employed by the bank as they think fit, as an ordinary customer's deposit; the third to be appropriated strictly to Government purposes, and to remain under Government control.

The competition will turn on the lowest amount of minimum and maximum balances, for which any bank will undertake the business of a particular place.

The Government do not bind themselves to accept the lowest or any tender.

A preference, in case of equality, will be given to the oldest established bank in the place, or any bank in whose favour they may waive their claim.

Security may be required by the Government, if it thinks it requisite, for an amount equal to the cash balance placed at the control of the bank.

Any bank obtaining the Treasury business must bind itself to undertake, if required by the Government, a sub-agency from the Bank of Bengal for the currency business, on terms to be settled, if the parties cannot agree, by arbitration, the Government naming an umpire, if the arbitrators on each side cannot agree on one.

The term of the agreement both for the Treasury business and currency will be the same as that of the Bank of Bengal's agreements with the Government, viz., for five years from the 1st March 1862.

Tenders will be received by the Financial Secretary to the Government of India up to the 30th April 1862 inclusive.

Banks proposing to tender, and wishing for more detailed information, may apply to the Financial Secretary at his office, where they may see copies of the clauses in the agreements with the Bank of Bengal for establishing branch banks at Mirzapore, &c., which will be required, as far as they may be applicable in other cases.

Ordered that the above resolution be published in the Calcutta Gazette, for general information.

Bank of Bombay,
5th March 1866.

Sir,

With reference to your endorsement, No. 181 of 17th ultimo, with copy of despatch from the Secretary to the Government of India, regarding the execution by the bank of Mr. F. L. Brown's trust deed, I have the honour to give the following information:—

A loan for 2½ lacs was granted on the personal security of Mr. Brown and his partner, who at the time were considered to be perfectly good for three times the amount. When it became due, an extension of time was asked for and granted, on the understanding that 46 shares of the Port Canning Reclamation Company would be deposited with the bank as collateral security. These shares were then saleable at Rs. 8,000 premium or Rs. 9,000 per share. Their present price is about Rs. 1,300 per share.

A bill for Rs. 45,000, signed by Mr. Brown jointly with other two parties, both merchants in Bombay, who have since failed. It is not yet known what dividend these estates are likely to pay. A bill for Rs. 20,000, signed by Mr. Brown jointly with a solicitor in Bombay. The assets of the latter are in the hands of trustees. When he submitted a statement of his affairs to his creditors, his assets exceeded his liabilities, but as the largest item was a coffee estate, and such property having fallen greatly in price owing to the number of estates belonging to bankrupts offering in the market, I believe the trustees do not anticipate that they will be able to pay the liabilities in full.

In the beginning of May, when it became known that several of the largest native merchants who had purchased shares for delivery in July would not be able to meet their engagements, panic reigned in the share market. Shares of the best and soundest undertakings were offered at any price, and the consequence was that in a few days shares that were at a respectable premium could not be sold except at a ruinous discount, and Mr. Brown and many others found themselves unable to meet their liabilities.

Mr. Brown laid a statement of his affairs before his creditors, who believed it to be correct, and being perfectly convinced that nothing could be gained by any proceedings in Court against him, (possibly he might have been punished for over speculation,) agreed to the proposition that his affairs should be put under trust. The creditors, in assenting to this proposition, did not overlook the fact that several native debtors were dealt with in this manner, and that if an example was required they did not consider that a European, who they were perfectly satisfied had given up his all, should be made the first victim.

With reference to paragraph 3 of the despatch, it is impossible to say what the precise loss will be on Mr. Brown's transactions, as his partner is jointly liable to the bank for the loan of 2½ lacs, and although at present he is not in a position to meet his liabilities in full, he does not wish to effect any compromise, his uncovered debts being comparatively small. They do a large and profitable business as bill brokers, and as Mr. Brown has promised to assist his partner in reducing their debt to the bank, it is hoped that the loss will be ultimately but trifling.

There can be no question in my opinion that the bank is likely to receive more by having agreed to a trust deed than they possibly could ever have expected had only time been granted. The latter course would at the time have ruined the business of the firm, and cut off all hope of part payment hereafter.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obt. servant,
D. Robertson,
Officiating Secretary and Treasurer.

LETTER from Mr. C. E. Resolution.—His Excellency the Governor in Council approves of the recommendation to increase the amount of storage accommodation at the Bank by the removal of the copper coin to the Castle; but directs that the necessary arrangements be carried out at such time and in such a manner as the Accountant-General may deem proper.

My dear Sir Bartle,

As I know you will be glad to hear what we have been doing at the bank since you left, I will now give you as much information as I can put into a couple of sheets of note paper, which must be my limit for the present, the mail having come in.

As you already know to what extent the bank promised to assist Premchund, you will not feel alarmed, I am sure, at the absurd rumours that have been flying about, that the bank had given him 80 lacs. He has not had 20 yet, and we have, as security, over 20 in landed property and 3 or 4 in jewels (he says 10), and of this advance about $\frac{3}{5}$ths has to be borne and is guaranteed by other sound banks.

Our chief anxiety has been the position of the Asiatic Bank, which has applied to us for temporary aid to the amount of 15 lacs, giving cover of over 7 lacs in bank drafts, all payable before 15th or 16th proximo, and other less realizable though good securities. For the sake of Bombay we shall have to give this assistance, if it is absolutely needed.

Other demands upon us were made by the Commercial and Hindustan Banks, but they have been of lighter amount and have not disturbed us, though we met them promptly, the loans being well secured. We have been fairly successful in being able to keep up the available bank balances; and throughout this week I have urged upon the directors the desirability of realizing government paper and any good securities the bank holds which may not have suffered depreciation (such as Bank of Bengal Shares), and have got sanction to do so. This course ought at once to bring us in about 12 lacs to add to our balances, no bad addition in these hard times.

The native community has been quite in a panic at the daily declining price of cotton (our latest is to the 7th from Crawford, Colvin, and Co., quoting 10¼*d.* for fair Dholla) and they have been pressing some of the Parsees so hard, that three or four have had to give in and call meetings of their creditors. Cursetjee Furdonjee and Limjee Manockjee go into trust at once, and Sorabjee and Nowrojee Nanabhoy follow to-morrow. In all these cases the bank, though it must be a loser, I fear, is fairly secured, but must lie out of its money for a long time unless the monsoon should bring some small demand and advance for shares.

Premabhoy is very hard up indeed; but it is impossible yet to say what is to be done with him.

I hope that in three or four weeks more we shall see an end to any pressure from or upon the banks, all of whom have telegraphed home for silver, and if the Asiatic does but pull through, as we trust it may, my next note may be a more cheerful one. As far as the Bank of Bombay is concerned we are in good case, and without any idea at present that we shall have to ask either moral or effectual assistance from Government.

Last night's balances showed an improvement of 9 lacs and a decrease in the government reserve; and after mail-day (to-morrow) we ought to keep pretty steady until the banks begin to get their remittances. The native dealers in cotton still hold out for higher prices than merchants are willing to give, and our only chance now to get them down to a reasonable price is that the panic is sure to extend up country, and make the ryots ready sellers. The news from home is not over and above cheerful; the best informed of our correspondents looking for large stocks and low prices for some months.

Some reasons, hitherto unsuspected here, are now apparent for the heavy and sudden fall in cotton, apart from stock and warlike rumours; one of the greatest importance being the stringent orders from America to sell the cotton at market, even at a loss. This may or may not be due to the fear of a monetary crisis in New York, but to my mind points to a strong impression that England will be involved in political troubles and perhaps war. No fresh news from the Continent has reached us.

FRANCIS P. LIDDERDALE.

Copy of Exhibit marked L 2.

My dear Lidderdale,

Mahabuleshwur, May 24th, 1866.

Many thanks for your two very valuable letters. I hope that the bank will get through this present crisis creditably, but you are clearly right in anticipating a time of even greater trial to us, when the redrafts come in, and I am sincerely glad that you have put off your departure.

I do not like the look of things in America. Some of Mr. Johnson's late acts look very like those of an able man who means to be supreme, and will not allow trifles to stop him. It is not easy for such a man, if successful, to limit himself, as Washington did, to the bounds which he proposed to himself before he gained power, to do what he pleased. I think there is more cause for anxiety in America than even in Germany.

I shall look for your letters with much interest and some anxiety.

Meantime believe me,
My dear Lidderdale,
Sincerely yours,
W. B. FRERE.

P.S.—27th. This has been delayed accidentally, and now I see the Commercial Bank has gone. This is an unlooked for misfortune; but it is satisfactory to know you did your best to keep them up here.

Yrs, W. B. F.

My dear Candass,

Don't be angry in your mind that why I am not coming at present I am rather in difficulty; people have filed suits against me and I am trying to put off for three months; and I am bullied by small paltry debt who don't allow me to sit down even a quarter of an hour, and I am trying to raise one or two lacs, but I am not succeeded yet; if I don't succeed before Monday I think I will have to stop altogether; but don't you be frightened at all and give in, keep up yourself and mind you must always think in your mind that all your money will be paid in full if any remains unpaid to you at all. I have got food in my stomach from you, and therefore sure to pay to you rather than pay to any one else. I am now a ruined man; but I know how to do business, so depend upon my word that you will not lose by me a rupee. I have tried up to this day my best, and still trying, to keep up my name; but when I see that they are going to put me in court I will at once gived up, or otherwise they will put me in jail, and I don't think you will like that at all. You told my Dossabhoy that I saw Cumla and spoke against you; never mind I have spoken, although I have not done so; still you ought not to listen in these times, you ought to help me rather than listen anything at all; this is the time to keep up one name and not to fight. I am writing this because I feel it and not with bad motive, and you must further remember that if I thought that such a thing is going to happen in Bombay I would not have told you to go into trade; but who thought of this, and besides it is not all my fault; you yourself voluntarily told me that you like to go to cotton, and therefore I went into joint account; but whoever thought such a time like this, I think no one but God, and that you must admit. I never thought that this time will come, and we shall be all in difficulty; but you just try and keep your name up and you will certainly make money again.

Yours sincerely,
(Signed) Premchund Roychund.

Private. Bank of Bombay,
My dear Douglas, Bombay, 28th April 1866.

Rodgie tells me you were up about this arrangement of Premchund's.

When the question came before our Directors the other day, they considered it might be as well to get the opinions of two of the Banks largely interested, viz., the Asiatic and Hindustan, and they invited them and also the Oriental and Mercantile to a conference on the subject. The meeting was adjourned very late in the evening to meet next morning at Mr. Lidderdale's bungalow. I went out to call you to attend, and also Beattie, but I was too late for you. I only mention these circumstances that you may not think you were overlooked in the consultation; but we shall be glad if you will undertake a part of the responsibility. Will you? say to the extent of two lakhs.

I have got title deeds of landed and house property for which he paid about eighteen lakhs, and as the most of it was purchased in 1863 and the beginning of 1864, I dare say it might to-day be worth as much.

I am to get twenty lakhs of jewels to-morrow. I have only advanced him three lakhs cash as yet, but have instructed our Guzerat agents to take hoondies on him to the extent of eight lakhs if they have funds. I shan't advance more until I get the jewels and have them valued. It would be a frightful thing for Bombay if he suspended payment. Where it would end it is impossible to say. Have you much of his paper?

Yours sincerely,
(Signed) D. Robertson.

Bank of Bombay,
Bombay, 22d May 1866.

My dear Tracey,

The Board had under consideration to-day the different advances made to Premchund, and with reference to the overdraft of three lacs, which is guaranteed by you, I have been instructed to inform you that it is the wish of the Board that it should be paid up or covered by satisfactory convertible security, and as Premchund has done neither, I am requested to ask you for payment or good collateral security.

As Premchund has not furnished the security he promised when it was arranged that a loan of 25 lacs would be given him, I regret the three lacs cannot be included in that loan.

Yours very truly,
D. ROBERTSON,
Offg, Secy. and Treasurer.

Bank of Bombay,
Bombay, 3 Sept. 1866.

My dear Tracey,

Among the securities given by Premchund against that annoying 3 lacs were 58 Coast and River Steam Navigation shares. We sent them over the other day just to see if they would be transferred, and were told they were absolutely forfeited on the 19 June as he had not paid the last three calls, aggregating Rs. 500 per share.

I asked Shepherd if he would not take the money, and the enclosed is his reply.

It is a beastly nuisance, as Rs. 2,000 per share have been paid on them. Security against the overdraft is thus diminished by over one lac of rupees.

Do you think he can give anything else instead? Please try him.

Yours sincerely,
D. ROBERTSON.

Bank of Bombay,
My dear Tracey, Bombay, 4th Sept. 1866.

Here is another lot of Premchund's securities like to slip out of our hands for non-payment of calls of Rs. 150 per share. Is there any chance of his raising the money, Rs. 7,500, before the 7th instant? The security against the 3 lacs is gradually disappearing,

Yours sincerely,
D. ROBERTSON.

Copy of Exhibit marked R 17.

My dear Premchund, London, 3d Dec. 1867.

I have been disappointed at not hearing from you for the last few mails. Can it be press of work that prevents your writing? I hope not, for all who have been doing any business lately must have suffered from it. Poor Bombay is indeed paying dearly for its short dream of prosperity! One could not have imagined it possible that things would go so completely to the bad.

I hope by this time you will have arranged something with Best for me, and I am most anxious to hear something on the subject.

I have to write this mail to Robertson about that overdraft of yours for a lac which I guaranteed. I fear I may yet get into trouble with the Board about that, as the responsibility rests with me. That matter ought really to have been settled. What balance still remains unpaid? I fancy it cannot be large, as I know you put in certain securities against it. Please let me know about this.

What are you doing now, and what do you think about future business? Next year there ought to be money made, both in cotton and goods, as both must have reached almost their lowest sum.

Remember me to your father and Dessabhoy.

Believe me,
Yours very sincerely,
R. L. TRACEY.

I need not remark that these articles, more especially these of large value, are such as may not be saleable at all times at definite prices. In them many would not give Rs. 10,000 for what others might willingly give double that sum. It is therefore quite possible that these jewels may have cost more than the value I have placed upon them, yet it is equally possible they may, if forced into the market, produce less.

I would add that I have not tested the genuineness of all the stones, but have carefully inspected them generally, and I believe them to be such as I have described them.

I am, dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,
THOS. CRAWFORD.

No. 2005 OF 1864.

General Department.

Bombay Castle, 16th November 1864.

To

Sir,—In forwarding, for communication to all Officers under your control, the annexed Extracts* from the Proceedings of Government in 1861 to 1863, portions of which have been already published, the Governor in Council considers it necessary to recall to the recollection of all Departments of the Government Service that so recently as the 31st May 1862 the Right Honourable the Secretary of State recorded his decision that although, as a general rule, he saw no objection to the servants of Government holding shares in Joint-Stock Companies, having for their object the development of the resources of the country, still it was necessary to impose the restriction that public servants should take no part in the management of such Institutions, and should not be employed within the Districts where the operations of the Company might be carried on.

* Extract (paragraphs 2 to 10) of a Minute by Sir George Clerk, dated 15th November 1861.
Extract (paragraphs 1, 4, 5, and 6,) of a Minute by Sir George Clerk, dated 26th December 1861.
Letter from the Government of India, No. 1,421, dated 11th March 1862.
Extract from the Proceedings of the Government of India, No. 453, dated 16th January 1863.

2. The Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India likewise concurred in the view held by Sir George Clerk, that supersession in promotion was the proper and practicable course for enforcing the orders of Government in this respect.

Vide notification of the Government of India, No. 383, of the Home Department, Revenue, dated Fort William, 16th January 1863, republished in Government Gazette of Bombay under date February 4th, 1863.

3. His Excellency the Governor in Council now desires to point out to all public servants of Government at this particular period, when there is so strong a tendency to speculation in Bombay, the extreme importance of obedience to the spirit of all the previous orders above alluded to, rather than to the mere letter of the law, and to repeat that Government will be guided in its action in accordance with the principles laid down by Sir George Clerk, concurred in by the Government of India and the Right Honourable the Secretary of State.

4. The Governor in Council has no wish to go further than is absolutely necessary in defining by specific restrictions limitations easily recognized by that high-toned sense of public duty which has always stood out as one of the strong characteristics of the Indian services. He believes it to be sufficient to remind all public servants of the great importance of avoiding any connection, however remote, with any undertaking which might tend to fetter their action or divert them from the numerous and important responsibilities imposed by the public service upon them.

5. Without, therefore, attempting to lay down stringent rules on the subject, the Governor in Council would caution every one connected with the Government, or belonging to any Department or Office at or near the Presidency, in which the affairs of any Company are likely to form a matter of official reference or discussion, that he will run extreme risk of having his motives misconstrued, more especially during the present period of excitement, should he become a shareholder in any such Company.

6. Where any Officer has held shares, under the general permission accorded by Government, previous to his appointment to such an office as has been above described, and he wishes to retain them as an investment, the case is materially altered, and his Excellency in Council confidently leaves such cases to be dealt with according to each Officer's sense of the proper course to be followed in the spirit of the instructions now laid down.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
E. W. RAVENSCROFT,
Offg. Chief Secretary to Government.

EXTRACT (paragraphs 2 to 10) of a Minute by Sir George Clerk, dated 15th November 1861.

2. I have always been of opinion that the public servants of our Indian Government, either here or at home, ought to be precluded from engaging in speculations in India. It cannot be right that there should be constant clashing of the private and public interests of functionaries whose duty it is to protect public rights, amongst the most numerous of which are those of our Native subjects. Every one exercising official functions may as such be in communication with railroad, flotilla, cotton, oil, or diggings Companies; and it is clear that he would not be justified in turning, in any degree, to his own purpose information obtained in the course of his official career. Therefore, the servants of the State ought never to be in the position of Directors or Shareholders.

3. The purity of British administration in India, so far as concerns the European section of it, is, to a great extent, to be ascribed to all its members being liable to summary dismissal for trading. And it was to maintain this condition of the public service in India that its Officers have not been permitted to have recourse to that mode of seeking to increase their incomes which, in our other colonies, has occasioned so many wars and so immense a waste of imperial treasure. Instead of allowing its servants to blend their official duties with the avocation of sheep-farmers, share-speculators, quartz-crushers, or land-sharks, the Indian Government has paid liberal salaries, and so saved the people from the manifold wrongs which must ever affect them when their rulers are addicted to irregular mercenary transactions.

4. Of course it is difficult to draw a line between one sort of trading speculation and another. Even engaging in so-called "farms" in India cuts at the root of an administrative system, which, by means of high pay from the public treasury, aims at securing constant attention on the part of public servants, when not on leave, to their appointed and well remunerated duties. The evil consequences of that mildest form of Civilian's speculations having attracted my notice in the North-West Provinces, I published, when Lieutenant Governor there, an order putting a stop to it, after two years given to proprietors to wind up and dispose of such jobs. That order was subsequently approved by the Governor General in Council, and made applicable to British India generally.

5. No doubt, taking shares in public works in India appears to be a practice which is now silently creeping in among other indulgences which are impairing the vigour of the service in British India. It is to be regretted that such is the case; and I always have regretted every measure which tends to paralyze or divert the local cares of the few men to whom the administration of our vast empire here is intrusted from any of their multitudinous duties connected with the welfare of the many millions of our subjects. It has been attempted to justify this loose and pernicious habit of gambling here on the grounds that our legislators in England applied their private means to the great work of modern times. But the speculations of our legislators in those railroad schemes, whether useful projects or bubbles, proved very detrimental to the public interests in general. And had it been otherwise, the condition of the two classes of functionaries in that country and in this is very different as regards pecuniary means, and therefore as regards the time and the attention absorbed in an excitement so novel and so exhaustive of means as are such pursuits to European gentlemen in this country. I do not suppose that all the members of the Civil Service in India could without borrowing provide an amount of money sufficient to construct one hundred miles of railroad with subsidiary buildings, and certainly not at the rate of expenditure of the "East Indian Railway." And it is further to be noted, that although before closing the gaming houses in England, their notorious high play was commonly denounced as disreputable and immoral, the spirit of clandestine gambling which, among the higher and middle classes, took the place of it in Westminster, the City, and the several affiliated brokerages for shares in all the commercial cities in England, was not so regarded. On the contrary, under the guise of respectability borrowed from rank and official position, the pursuit became commonly diffused among every class, and tens of thousands of poor families were involved in penury in consequence of the force of those examples serving to encourage gambling. I believe it is now very generally admitted that the tone then given to that propensity was unfortunate for England in various ways. The Government should be careful not to err in the same way in this country.

6. We are now verging towards colonization in India, and, if properly supervised at first, a very good thing it will be for this country. But it would be a subject of endless regret were we not to profit by the lesson which may be read in observing British colonization elsewhere, and so abstain from those dishonest schemes and ruthless aggressions on ancient rights for which the blood of Natives and of British troops has been so abundantly shed, and for which alone so many millions of British treasure have been there expended. To be sure, such misdeeds, if repeated here, would not be at the charge of Imperial funds, but of Indian. But, considering the present condition of both, that would be a still greater calamity. It is not to be feared that the dominant class will treat the Natives here with equal disregard of their rights, and the same degree of contempt. The resistance shown, after much endurance, by Kaffirs and by Maoris—to say nothing of what has been learnt of late years in India—shows that there are some descriptions of injury which will excite any people to rebellion. But what is always to be guarded against in such circumstances is the reliance of the British speculator on support from British troops; and the higher the social position and influence of the speculator in these distant countries, especially if he has official influence, the greater the probability that such false aid and high-handed encouragement will be available.

7. But there is another point of view from which those in the service of India, in this country or at home, who desire to speculate, should regard the subject. It is this. Should success attend their efforts, and those of their advocates in the public journals, to attain this object, who that has observed the conditions of service elsewhere in British dominions can doubt that, with the concession of the supposed boon, the salaries now fixed at 5,000*l.*, 3,000*l.*, or 1,000*l.* a year will soon subside to 500*l.*, 300*l.*, and 100*l.*, and so in proportion in all grades of the public service, the liberal allowance of leave remaining perhaps as it now is.

8. No one desires more than I do to see gentlemen in India, Military, Civil, and Covenanted or Uncovenant, withdraw from the service with their savings, and invest them in the land, the forest, the coffee farms, or the tea plantations, or even to leave them, if they prefer gambling, to pursue stockjobbing. For from all, excepting the last, great would be the benefit arising to the people and to the country from the capital, the intelligence, the civilization, and the benevolent measures which would so be diffused among them.* But no fact connected with such undertakings in India is better established than that to make them profitable residence is indispensable; and to suppose that while so engaged, either bodily or mentally, proprietors could ever do justice to duties of the character of those which devolve on the administrator in India, would be simply absurd.

9. When the last effort was made, not long ago, to carry through these schemes, it was proposed, by way of compromise, that the official should be restricted from following such avocations in the Zilla in which he may be serving. One consequence of this would be, that the requirement of the Government for his services in any particular locality must be made subordinate to the inquiry which would have to be instituted regarding the exact situation of concerns interesting him in his trading capacity.

10. I trust, therefore, that the day may be distant, or may never be known, when in India that fallacious economy prevails of enlisting the educated European on the seemingly cheap terms of small salary, with livelihood to be eked out by ventures in trade and stockjobbing, and that the propriety of avoiding the inconvenience and risk of trusting public servants who embark in projects, and cherish private interests, that at times must be incompatible with a steady regard for their official duties, will be everywhere felt and admitted.

Extract (paragraphs 1, 4, 5, and 6) of a Minute by Sir George Clerk, dated 26th December 1861.

1. I alluded to some prohibitory orders which, I believe, were published by the Government of the North-west Provinces and by the Government of India in 1843–44. Although I have not succeeded in procuring copies of all the documents connected with this subject, I find in the Secretariat here ample evidence of the intention of the authorities at home and in Calcutta to deter their public servants from engaging in speculations. The official Gazette of the 3rd February 1844 from Calcutta contains the following extract of a letter, No. 7, of the 24th November 1843, from the Honourable the Court of Directors, having reference even to Medical Officers in Civil employment:—

9. Although Medical officers possess no civil authority, and are unconnected with the collection or management of the revenue, we are nevertheless of opinion that it is undesirable their attention should be drawn from their regular duties by being concerned in any description of speculation within their immediate Districts; and we, therefore, direct that the prohibition contained in paragraph 53* of our despatch to the Government of India, dated 23rd February 1842, be extended to Medical Officers appointed to Civil Stations;

* Paragraph 53.—"We direct the invariable observance of the rule of the Service, that no Officer holding civil authority in a district shall, directly or indirectly, be a holder of land, or be concerned in any description of speculation therein."

and from a correspondence between this Government and the Government of India in 1852–53, it appears that some officers at the head of important Departments in Bombay, both Civil and Military, having engaged in private banking and other companies,—amongst others the "India and British Life Assurance," the Auditorship of the "Oriental Bank Corporation," a "Steam Navigation Company," a "Tramway Company," the "Commercial Bank," the "Mercantile Bank," the "Agra Bank," "Sind Bank," &c.,—the following Resolution of the Government of India was ordered to be republished in the Bombay Gazette:—

"No. 462.

"Fort William, Home Department.

"The 28th May 1852.

"Notification.—The Most Noble the Governor General in Council is pleased to notify for general information, that, under instructions from the Honourable the Court of Directors, all servants of the East India Company, whether Civil or Military, Covenanted or Uncovenanted, are strictly prohibited from taking any part in the management of Banks or any other Trading Companies, except as simple Shareholders, the only exception to this rule being in favour of ex-officio Directors or Secretaries of the Government Banks at the three Presidencies;"

and the following letter was addressed to the Court of Directors:—

"With reference to our letter, No. 46, dated the 23rd June last, we have the honor to forward herewith a copy of our proceedings consequent on your instructions prohibiting the Honourable Company's servants from being in any way connected with the management of Banks or other Trading Companies."

4. My honourable colleague adverts to the public funds. It is a part of the question for which it would be difficult to lay down precise orders. But I conceive it might be sufficient, as no doubt it would be proper, here, as in any other Government in or out of India, to observe strictly towards public servants addicted to stock-jobbing, the rule of discouraging the propensity by supersession in promotions occurring in the course of changes and casualties in the public Service. This remedy can be unerringly applied in India, where the pursuits of every one of the few Europeans engaged in its administration never fail to be notorious. The same rule ought to be adopted in regard to Native Officials. They are more numerous. But the head of an Office will always be aware of the existence of such disqualifications in his subordinates.

5. In this, as in so many other matters of public concern, it will probably serve the purpose to bear in mind the principles of conduct which experience leads us to adopt in private life. No man who requires an exact and punctual performance of duties in a household can be satisfied with the services of a steward or groom who attends "betting-houses" or keeps "a book."

6. In short, regarding the existing disposition to join in trade speculations as a revival of that which it was the object of the Home Authorities and the Government of India in 1843–44, and again in 1852–53, to annihilate, I would recommend that this Government also should steadily and effectually exert its powers to discountenance the practice among its public Officers.

A. D. ROBERTSON, Esq.,
Acting Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

HOME DEPT. SIR,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 323, dated the 28th of January, transmitting copies of minutes recorded by His Excellency the Governor of Bombay and the members of his Council, on the subject of issuing orders prohibiting Public Servants of the Indian Government from engaging in speculations in India.

2. The Governor General in Council has carefully considered these papers, and desires me to state that he does not consider it expedient that the Government should attempt to impose any restrictions in this matter more stringent than those already in force, by which all Public Servants, whether Civil or Military, Covenanted or Uncovenanted, are strictly prohibited from taking any part in the management of Banks or any other trading Companies, or from being in any way concerned in them except as simple shareholders.

3. The Governor General in Council entirely agrees with His Excellency Sir George Clerk as to the great evil of Public Servants jobbing in the Public Funds, or in the shares of Joint Stock Companies, and he thinks that the proper and the only practicable method of preventing this evil is that which is indicated by His Excellency in the 4th paragraph of his minute dated the 26th of December.

I have the honour to be, &c.
W. GREY,
Secretary to the Government of India.

RESOLUTION.

In his Despatch No. 46, dated 31st May 1862, the Secretary of State observes that, as a general rule, there is no objection to Government Servants holding, under certain restrictions, shares in mining or other Companies having for their object the development of the resources of the country. In the recent despatch dated the 25th of November, Sir Charles Wood states that the question raised by the Landholders' and Commercial Association was fully considered when his Despatches No. 22, dated 10th August, and No. 29, dated 30th November 1861, were under preparation, and he sees no reason to modify the instructions conveyed therein. He also communicates instructions on the points submitted by the Government of Madras relative to a Civilian holding Shares in a Joint Stock Company formed for Agricultural purposes in his own Presidency, and in regard to a Madras Civilian holding land in Mysore, Coorg, Cochin, or Travancore, or becoming a shareholder in a Company formed for holding or cultivating land in those territories.

Resolved that the following Notification be published in the Calcutta Gazette.

No. 383.

FORT WILLIAM, HOME DEPARTMENT, REVENUE.

The 16th January 1863.

NOTIFICATION.

The following orders passed by the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India are published for general information, in continuation of the Notification, No. 241, dated the 14th January 1862, published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 15th idem:

I.—Extract from the Secretary of State's Public Despatch, No. 46, dated 31st May 1864.

Para. 2.—You will have learned from my Despatch to the Government of Bombay, dated the 8th April last, No. 11, that, in connexion with the orders of that Government of the 26th November 1861, relative to the case of Public Officers who might take part in any Company formed for working the Gold Mines in the Dummul Hills, I stated that, "as a general rule," I see no objection to servants of Government holding shares in Mining or other Companies having for their object the development of the resources of the country; and the only restriction I think it necessary to impose is that public servants shall take no part in the management of such institutions, and shall not be employed in the districts where the operations of the Company may be carried on.

3.—With the exception of the concluding proviso, that no Public Officer shall be employed in any District where any Company in which he holds shares may carry on its operations, the sentiments above expressed are in accordance with the opinions recorded by Earl Canning and the several Members of your Council; and, as I think it important that this condition should be maintained, I have to direct that my decision communicated in the terms above quoted to the Government of Bombay may be made generally applicable, and may be published for general information.

4.—There can be no doubt as to the great evil of public servants in India engaging in speculations in the public funds, or in the shares of Joint Stock Companies; but I agree in the opinion of Lord Canning that such a practice, on the part of any Officer, could not long escape the knowledge of Government, and that it would be in the power of Government to mark its sense of such conduct, either by withholding promotion or in any other way it might deem fit.

II.—Extract from the Secretary of State's Revenue Despatch No. 22, dated 25th November 1862.

Para. 3.—In your letter of the 8th May (No. 10) you request to be informed whether a Covenanted Civilian may hold Shares in a Joint Stock Company formed for Agricultural purposes, such as Tea or Coffee cultivation, in his own Presidency. This question is sufficiently answered in my Public Despatch of the 31st May (No. 46) 1862, which you would have received shortly after the date of your reference.

4.—As regards the question whether a Covenanted Madras Civilian may hold land in Mysore, Coorg, Cochin, or Travancore, I agree with your Government in viewing with disapproval the holding by Covenanted Civil Servants of lands in Native States, and I consider that the same objection applies to the holding of such lands by Military Officers in the actual service of the Crown in India.

5.—The right of Officers, Civil or Military, to hold shares in the Agricultural Companies operating in Native States, may be regulated by the same rules as apply to their holding shares in similar Companies within the British Territories.

E. C. Bayley,
Secy. to the Govt. of India.

Ordered that a copy of the foregoing Resolution be forwarded to the Government of Bombay, with reference to their letter No. 323, dated 28th January 1862, and the reply to it, No. 1421, dated 11th March 1862; to the Government of Madras, with reference to their letter No. 537, dated 11th March 1862; and to the Governments of Bengal and the North-Western Provinces, as well as the Straits Settlement, and the Military and Public Works Departments, for information; and to the Foreign Department, for information and for communication to the Government of the Punjaub, the Chief Commissioners of Oude, Central Provinces, and British Burmah, the Commissioner of Mysore, and to such other Officers under the control of that Department as may be deemed necessary.

Ordered also that a copy of paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Despatch dated the 25th November 1862, No. 22, be forwarded to the Landholders' and Commercial Association, with reference to their Secretary's letter dated the 31st March 1862.

The Under Secretary of State for India.

Sir,

Having ascertained that the explanation referred to in my letter of the 6th instant, on the subject of the catastrophe of the Old Bank of Bombay, was mislaid by the late Acting Chief Secretary before his departure from Bombay, I have the honour to submit herewith the substance of such explanation, in case Her Majesty's Secretary of State should require the same either for his own information or for communication to the Commission of Enquiry.

I have, &c.
(Signed) H. E. Jacomb,
Bombay Civil Service.

Having acted as a Government Director of the old Bank of Bombay from the 8th June to the 28th September 1864 during Mr. A. D. Robertson's temporary absence at Mahabaleshwar, and being about to proceed on sick leave, the undersigned ventures, in anticipation of any possible call by the Government, to place in the hands of the Acting Chief Secretary his explanation as to the part he took in the conduct of the direction.

The undersigned admits that during such period no applications for loans were brought before the Board collectively or received their united sanction. How long this omission had been the practice he is not aware, but he believes that it was no innovation after the date of his assumption of office, and he therefore pleads guilty only to perpetuating what is now patent to all was a most irregular method of transacting business. Had, however, such applications been regularly submitted to the Board, he cannot but feel the utter improbability of his having exercised the slightest control for good, owing to his never having been employed in Bombay before March 1864, and thus having to rely on the opinions of the Commercial Directors as to the solvency of applicants for accommodation. It may be objected that under such circumstances a public servant ought not to accept office, but the previous traditions of the bank never having disclosed any losses arising out of this habitual absence of active interference by the Government Directors, it might not unnaturally be concluded that the Commercial Directors were the best judges. Acting on these impressions, the undersigned conceived (erroneously as is now only too clear) that his duty would be best fulfilled by seeing that the existing charter was not infringed, and by limiting the total transactions generally with reference to the cash balance, but otherwise not interfering with the details of individual loans. He believes it may safely be asserted that the then directors worked within the charter, inasmuch as they could have granted loans on shares in public companies, but abstained from doing so. Latterly indeed it has been alleged that cash credits uncovered by other than personal security were invalid, but although another Government Director, Mr. Mangles, and he himself had doubts on this point, and even referred its solution to a merchant then unconnected with the bank management (Mr. Lidderdale, who satisfied them that the practice was of long standing), the undersigned believes there is in banking no invariable rule as to the kind of security requisite for cash credits, and this opinion seems strengthened by the silence of the charter on the point.

In conclusion, the undersigned urges that of some 7 lacs of fixed loans and 28 lacs of cash credits loaned during the period under report, and believed to be mostly outstanding, a large proportion might have been collected if the obligations had been enforced at maturity, and not allowed to stand over in consequence of the subsequent adoption of a so-called forbearance policy towards debtors, who thereupon pledged their property elsewhere.

Of the discounted bills the undersigned is unable to say anything, as he has no accurate account as to their outstanding for the period under notice, but in respect of these he apprehends no allegation exists that the terms of the charter or mercantile usage were contravened.

To Exmouth, England, May 14, 1868.
Sir Charles Jackson,
President of the Commission to inquire into the affairs of the old Bank of Bombay.

Sir,

I have had the honour to receive the accompanying letter from the India Office, informing me that an investigation is about to be held "into the circumstances which led to and which attended the recent catastrophe of the old Bank of Bombay." In his last paragraph the Secretary of State says, "As the inquiry will relate to transactions of the Bank for the period during which you were a Government Director, I am directed to make this communication to you, in order that you may take any steps which you may consider necessary with a view to your being personally present, or being represented on that inquiry."

2. I much regret that it will be impossible for me to be in Bombay at the time when the Commission over which you preside is sitting. On the 28th of March last I was compelled by very severe illness to leave

India on medical certificate, and I am still so unwell that I cannot hope to return to my duty for many months. Neither do I see what way I can be adequately represented by another. I beg, therefore, to submit the following statement relative to the Bank's affairs and my connexion with them for the period during which I was a Government Director. There will, I trust, be no objection to its being attached as an appendix to your report.

3. I took my seat at the Board on the 6th of October 1864, having been then appointed, for the first time, to act as Revenue, Financial, General, and Chief Secretary to Government, vice the Honourable A. D. Robertson, who had been granted three months leave of absence. I may notice here that I had no previous knowledge of banking, and was ignorant of its simplest rudiments. A rule, however, framed by the Secretary of State, prohibiting the apointment of shareholders as Government Directors, left His Excellency the Governor scarcely any choice. It had always been customary also for the Revenue Secretary to be a Director of the Bank; and the only two Civil Servants trained to accounts who were stationed in Bombay were already on the Board; and I probably knew as much or little as any other Government officer. Under these circumstances I felt that there was no alternative but for me to join and do my best.

4. At the same time I was of course, compelled to learn my new and important duties of Secretary to Government; and for some weeks I was also President of the Bombay Municipal Commission. Subsequently, in addition to other work, I was placed on the Commission which was appointed to consider application from promoters for reclaiming portions of the foreshore of the island. These occupations almost monopolised my time, and thus, though I was a Government Director of the Bank of Bombay for four months and a half, I found it impossible to attend the board meetings more than 15 times. Except at these meetings I did not have anything to do with the Bank's affairs beyond signing shareholders' transfers and certificates when shares were bought or sold, these documents requiring the signatures of three Directors.

5. As before mentioned, I took my seat on the 6th of October 1864. Heavy press of business prevented me from again meeting my co-Directors until the 20th of October, when I was able to attend the weekly meeting. Our deliberations were very short, and it appeared to me that nothing was done except to read the last week's proceedings, discuss the rate of interest, and consider any letters received from the managers of branch banks. No application for loans, cash credits, or discounts ever came before the Board when I was present, except on one occasion, and this was of a peculiar nature. A reference to the record of our weekly proceedings will prove this. The theory was that the Secretary (who had enormous independent powers secured to him by the bye-laws) should, in conjunction with and subordinate to the President and some Commercial Directors, transact the current business which was beyond his own power, reserving very difficult cases for the full Board. After a few meetings it struck me that the Directors generally should have the opportunity of scrutinizing more closely the ordinary business of the Bank. But I was met with many objections. It was urged—

1. That the terms of the Bank's Charter, as regards loans, &c., were so clear that there could be no risk as to this part of the business.
2. That as regards the discounting of bills, the Act left unlimited discretion in the hands of the Directors, and that it was impossible that this discretion could be properly used except by those who knew the actual position and means of applicants for accommodation; a knowledge which would be possessed by the old Directors and Secretary, but not probably by Government Directors just appointed.
3. That the system in force had been long in existence without the occurrence of any loss, large annual dividends being, in the meantime, invariably received by the shareholders.
4. That within the previous 18 months the capital had been increased from 500,000*l.* to 2,000,000*l.*; and that any obstructive or close-handed policy would render the use of the quadrupled capital very difficult, and, as a matter of course, reduce the annual profits.

6. I will allow that these arguments had weight with me, and I then determined to turn my attention to the law under which the Bank was constituted, and see, as far as I could, that its clauses were observed.

7. With this view I requested to be furnished with the book or books showing the amounts advanced on loan or granted as cash credits. I was then furnished with a volume called the "Applicants' Book," showing these. The transactions extended over a period of many years, and in separate columns were shown the securities taken in each case. I beg to refer the Commission to this book, and to state that, to the best of my belief, no loan was made or cash credit granted and entered therein during my tenure of office, unless fully covered by securities on which by law the Directors were authorized to advance money. I beg, however, that it may be borne in mind that I am writing solely from memory, without the assistance of papers, books, or advice, of complicated matters of account and transactions which occurred between three and four years ago. Though my memory is good, it is not infallible, and on some minor points I may therefore be under a misapprehension.

8. A great outcry has been raised against a portion of the New Bank Charter Act of 1863. With the construction of this Act I have no concern, having joined the Board long after it was in force. But, by the light of late events, it is easy to say that the clause authorizing the Directors to lend money on the security of shares in "other public Companies in India," was very impolitic, and was clandestinely introduced by the Directors, and particularly by the Government Director, who had charge of the Bill in the Legislative Council, to facilitate their gambling propensities. This charge is known by persons on the spot to be utterly untrue; but the Bank Directors and Bombay Government have been severely censured by an interested public for the admission of the new clause. This censure should, however, be shared, if any is due, by the Government of India and the Home Government, as the Act could not become law without the consent and approval of both authorities. As a matter of fact, it was for a long time under the consideration of both. But, before blame is hurriedly cast on any one, it should be remembered that unless unprecedented ruin had overtaken almost every company in Bombay, the security of the shares taken by the Bank would have been undeniable, and therefore opinions still differ as to the policy or impolicy, under ordinary circumstances, of the insertion of the words "other public companies in India." At all events, if the extended powers it was proposed to give the Directors were as objectionable as they are now alleged to be by the shareholders, the proper time for objection was when the Bill was under discussion, and not when the mischief was done. So also as regards the quadrupling the capital. This was effected between the summer of 1863 and winter of 1864. Now it is perfectly notorious that all shareholders who understood anything of money matters were delighted at the increase of capital, more especially at the doubling in 1864. The reason is plain; for each old share they got a new share at par; that is to say, they got for 100*l.* what they could sell at once in the money market for 230*l.* In those days, therefore, no terms were good enough to extol the wisdom and judgment of the Directors; and it is therefore rather hard that they should now be abused for the very thing which in the days of prosperity was considered a great stroke of finance. I speak with perfect impartiality, as the full amount of 2,000,000*l.* had been subscribed before I joined the Board.

9. With reference to the "Applicants' Book" mentioned in my seventh paragraph, I fully thought, and was justified in thinking, that it contained all the successful applications for loans or cash credits made to the Bank, excepting perhaps those which the Bye-laws authorized the Secretary and Treasurer to grant on his own authority. From what I heard when last in Bombay, I am inclined to think that I may have been mistaken; but on this point the Commission will be best able to judge with the accounts and ledgers before them.

10. The only other matter which occurs to me about which any explanation is necessary, is with reference to the monthly statement of the Bank's assets and liabilities, which, by law, some of the Directors were compelled to sign and furnish to Government. These purported to show in separate columns the amounts of discounts, loans, and cash credits granted on Government or other securities. I could, however, never find time to examine them, and the documents from which they were framed, carefully; and as there was something I did not clearly understand about the security,

I did not wish, without satisfying myself, to attach my signature. As regards the half-yearly returns I had no scruples, as there was nothing in them about security; and I thought I might fairly take for granted that the amounts had been properly added up by the Bank's Officers.

11. So much for the loans and cash credits. As regards the bills discounted, I wish now that I had taken a more active part; but, excepting Native shopkeepers and Government servants, I scarcely knew half a dozen Natives in Bombay; and beyond believing that they were rolling in wealth, I was entirely ignorant of their means or credit. My knowledge of the real pecuniary position of Europeans was also very limited; and I thought that Mr. Birch, the President, who had been many years on the Board, together with the Secretary and one or two Commercial Directors, would best superintend that part of the business which depended on the discretion of the Directors. I believe that Government Directors before and after my time were of the same opinion.

12. On the 23d of February 1865 I attended my last weekly meeting at the Bank; and on the 1st of March I left India on furlough.

13. This, therefore, concludes my connexion with the Bank; but before closing my statement I will add a few words on the third paragraph of the Secretary of State's letter. With reference to the allegations contained in the memorial, I have only to say that during the time and long before I was or had any idea of being a Government Director of the Bank of Bombay I was not directly or indirectly possessed of or interested in any Joint Stock or other Company of any description whatever. Two or three days before I left India I purchased one share in the Colaba Land Company. I also had a Port Canning share, and some shares in a Bengal Bank. If the possession of such property is called in question because I happened to be a Government Director of the Bank of Bombay, I am quite prepared to defend the course I took. It is notorious that at least one eminent member of the Bombay Government and some Judges of the High Court of Judicature of Bombay were shareholders in the Port Canning scheme. They, I presume, felt, that as the Port Canning Reclamation was a Calcutta Undertaking, carried on in Bengal, with which Presidency they had no connexion in their public capacities, there was no more reason why they should not invest their money in that than trust to the "glorious simplicity of the three per cents." This, at all events, is what I felt. As a secretary to the Bombay Government, and therefore possibly in a position to have official connexion with a Bombay scheme, I should have hesitated to apply for or receive an allotment had Port Canning been situated in Bombay. But, as the case stood, I had no hesitation; and under similar circumstances would again act in a similar manner.

14. The allegations made in the Memorial to the Secretary of State, that the Commercial Directors knowingly misused the Bank's funds, and gave the Government Directors shares as hush-money, are as ridiculous as they are false. There can be no doubt that the management of the Bank was unfortunate, and has ended disastrously; but the times also were very exceptional. Possibly also want of judgment wasexhibited by the Commercial Directors, which, considering their training and pursuit, may seem odd, and by the Government Directors, which, considering their training and previous employment, seems quite natural. But I am sure that all the Directors challenge the fullest inquiry; and instead of feeling animosity against the memorialists, anonymous pamphleteers, and suppliers of articles to the Indian press, they are obliged for the fallacious statements which have rendered an inquiry necessary.

15. In addition to the Memorial which the Secretary of State has been good enough to forward, I have seen in other pamphlets assertions to the effect that the Government Directors borrowed the Bank's money with which to carry on their "vicious speculations." On this point I have to say that I believe the statement to be entirely false; as regards myself personally, I distinctly say that it is false; I never borrowed one rupee from the Bank directly or indirectly, and I was never security for any one who did. All my private connexion with the Bank was this: when I had money I placed it there, and so highly did I think of its stability and wealth, that after I had ceased to be a Director, when in England, in May 1865, I deposited there a large sum for the fixed period of one year. Also, when at home, I purchased 24 shares of 100*l.* each, which on my return to Bombay, in October 1867, I sold at a very great loss for a mere song, because I found (having been again appointed Acting Chief Secretary) that I was so officially mixed up with the affairs of the old and new Banks of Bombay that I could not consistently have any private interest in either.

16. In conclusion, I can honestly say that I hope Government will look with a favourable eye on the cases of those Shareholders who have been ruined by a combination of unfortunate circumstances rarely exceeded. But I deprecate the tone in which pamphlets and Indian newspaper articles have for months past been written. With the shortsighted aim of fixing the responsibility on Government, it has been ungenerously and foolishly assumed, that the three Government Directors, generally appointed against their own wishes, were the chief cause of the Bank's ruin; whilst little or no mention is made of the six Commercial Directors who were elected by the Shareholders, and who fought for their seats at the Board with an energy which proved how anxious they were to be successful.

17. I trust my statement is sufficiently clear, but if there are any points on which further explanation is needed, a communication addressed to me at 14, St. James' Square, London, will always reach me. As I am, however, about to proceed to the Continent for my health, an answer may not be quite so promptly furnished as it would be were I going to remain in England.

I have, &c.
EDWARD WILLIAM RAVENSCROFT,
Her Majesty's Bombay Civil Service.

"STATEMENT by JAMES BLAIR, late Secretary and Treasurer of the Bank of Bombay.

I WAS Chief Accountant from 1853 to 1856, and Deputy Secretary from 1856 to 1860, when I was appointed Secretary and Treasurer.

The Bank had done a prosperous business during a long course of years, but when the Indian Government established its currency system, and cancelled the Bank's power to issue its own notes, its business was affected, and its resources crippled. During the American war, the business of Bombay greatly expanded, and with the view of obtaining fixed deposits to enable the Bank to make advances to the merchants when money was most required, the Board resolved to allow interest on accounts and deposits, and that system was then found to work well.

As the business of Bombay, however, began to increase enormously, the Board and the shareholders became desirous of increasing the capital of the Bank, and the usual steps were taken for that purpose. A copy of the Bank of Bengal Act being obtained, it was submitted to a Committee of Directors and the Bank's Solicitor for consideration, and sundry additions and alterations having been made by them, the same were approved of by the Board. Mr. A. D. Robertson, then one of the Government Directors, will be able to give the requisite information as to the Act passing through and obtaining the sanction of the Legislative Council of Bombay, as at that time I was absent from Bombay, opening branches, in various parts of the Presidency, under the instructions of the Board.

I may here state, that during 1864, and early in 1865, I was often absent from Bombay, establishing branches and visiting them; for instance, I was absent at Ajmere from 16th January to 14th March 1865, and I left Bombay for London on 29th April thereafter.

The business of the Bank from 1860 to 1863 was conducted thus:—In granting loans and discounts, a circular was sent to the Weekly Committee consisting of one Government, one Mercantile, and one Native Director, but as the applicants were chiefly Natives, the two European Directors were generally guided in their opinion by their Native colleague, who had better means of knowing the standing and wealth of applicants.

The Native Directors were men who commanded the respect and enjoyed the confidence of the shareholders; and on Board days when Native interests were under discussion, the European Directors invariably trusted to the opinion and advice of their Native associates.

An important part of the business of the bank was the purchase of Native Hoondies, and the Directors and officials were guided therein by the advice and recommendations of their brokers, Roychund Deepchund and his son Premchund Roychund. For a long period of years no losses whatever were made on this description of business, and when Mr. Cowasjee Jehangeer Readymoney retired in 1864 from the Board in ill health, his parting advice was to consult Premchund Roychund regarding all Native business, as no man in Bombay could advise the Bank better than he. Indeed, Cowasjee himself had been in the constant practice of consulting him, and when he retired in July 1864, he wrote to me a letter which I am ready to produce, warmly approving of Premchund becoming a Director, and concluding thus:—"No person can beat him. I hold his ability in high esteem."

In 1863 the position of the Native merchants rapidly changed, as many of them had acquired great wealth from profits in cotton, so that it became more difficult to ascertain the actual means and wealth of merchants generally. Money was very abundant, and the competition among the banks for business great; and that being the state of matters, both European and Native merchants felt disinclined to allow their transactions to be known and discussed by the whole Board, so that a discretionary power was given to the Secretary to discount, and to purchase what he considered safe bills, or with the approval of one Director.

This system was continued, but there was no secrecy in it, as every transaction was entered in the books of the Bank, which were accessible at all times to the Directors. The Daily Abstract Book was regularly sent to each Director to show the daily business transacted, and on no occasion was the extent objected to. The feeling of the general body of Directors then was that too small a business was being transacted, and that the profits of the Bank were not such as they ought to be, considering what the other Banks were doing; one of them having actually declared a dividend of upwards of 30 per cent.

Such being the state of matters, the Board considered it necessary to make advances in competition with the Banks then established, to enable them to pay a reasonable dividend on the enlarged capital of the Bank. Some of the leading merchants, who were known to have been most successful in their cotton operations, obtained considerable loans from the Bank for the simple reason that their means and position were then considered undoubted. Even at this time, viz., in the end of 1864 and beginning of 1865, when not a cloud on the commercial prosperity of Bombay had appeared, it was considered prudent in the interest of the Bank to lend the money payable on demand; and, further, as many merchants, European and Native, were engaged in speculations in shares, that certificates of shares in the Land Companies, such as the Back Bay and Elphinstone Companies, should be deposited with the Bank as collateral security for the advances, which was done accordingly, and this was considered a prudent step at the time. Such shares were, however, not transferred to the Bank, and no one then contemplated making the Bank copartners of any of these companies, the object being security only.

The Directors were satisfied with the business transacted, as were the shareholders, and more especially the Government, who were fully advised of all that had been done in the monthly statements submitted to them, signed by three Directors, as well as in the weekly statements published in the newspapers.

The business of the Bank was not increased in a day, it was the work of a considerable period, and during all that time, and up to my leaving India in April 1865, not a word was heard from any quarter, on the publication of the Accounts and Auditor's Reports, that the transactions of the Bank had been or were of a risky nature, in fact the Bank continued to command the confidence of the public, as is evidenced by the premium which the shares then commanded in the market.

I have already stated that for a long period of years Premchund Roychund was of great use to the Bank in giving information and advice as to the means of the Native Merchants. During the American War Premchund was known to have acquired a large fortune in cotton transactions, and he was elected a Director of the Bank as successor to Cowasjee Jehangeer Readymoney, who, as has already been stated, was greatly pleased with his election.

In these years there can be no doubt of it, Premchund was one of the leading Native merchants of the place, and, like all successful men, he commanded great influence, and his advice was sought with respect to Native business by almost every banker in Bombay. The Governor of Bombay himself praised Premchund at public meetings, and pointed him out to the rising Native generation as worthy of example. It cannot, therefore, be surprising that, as Premchund's judgment in advising the Bank with respect to Native business had never been at fault for a long period of years, the Directors and the Officials should have continued to consult him and to follow his recommendations in granting loans. Never once in my day did a single Director, Government or mercantile, find fault with the system of relying upon Premchund Roychund for advice, nor was he ever then suspected of taking advantage of his position for sinister purposes. His wealth was then believed to be, and no doubt was, enormous, and not a word was breathed as to his credit for a long period after I had left Bombay in April 1865.

Owing to incessant work in the management of the Bank, and the fatigue and injury to my health in establishing the numerous branches throughout the Presidency, I obtained leave from the Directors to visit Europe, and as everything in Bombay, and the affairs of the Bank itself, were in a flourishing state, the time was considered opportune.

Enormous wealth had been acquired by the mercantile community from cotton; property had become greatly enhanced in value; and few or none in Bombay at that time looked for a collapse.

The Governor and his Council must have been of opinion that the prosperity was real, judging from the fact that although enormous sums had been realised by the sale of Government property, other properties were held for still higher prices, although probably five to eight times the ordinary value had been offered. I accordingly left Bombay on 29th April 1865, while the Bank was apparently enjoying the greatest prosperity, and as a proof that this was then so considered, the Directors, after making a careful investigation of the business and position of the Bank after the first panic in Bombay in May and June 1865, on the close of the American War, the losses by the failure of cotton merchants and others were estimated not to exceed thirty lacs. In the following half year a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum was paid, and two lacs were added to the reserve.

I have already stated that during 1864 and 1865 I was very frequently absent from Bombay on the affairs of the Bank's branches, and my connexion with the Bank as Secretary practically ceased on the 29th April 1865. Up to that date not a word had been stated by any man reflecting on the business that had been transacted, or upon me directly or indirectly. The sudden closing of the American War, and the subsequent monetary collapse in England in 1866, ruined many of the merchants of Bombay, causing enormous losses to the Bank; and it would appear from the proceedings before the Commission in Bombay, as if I alone had been the author of all the evil, and that the Bank had not been administered by a Board of Directors, Government and mercantile, under the eye of the Government themselves, who were so largely interested as shareholders.

As Secretary of the Bank, it was my duty to carry out the policy and instructions of the Directors, for the result of which they are responsible. In my capacity as a servant of the Board, whatever blame attaches to me I am willing to bear. Of course, as in all similar cases, an undue share of blame has been attached to me, and it has, I believe, been stated that I aided Premchund Roychund in procuring the Bank's money for speculative purposes for our mutual benefit. This is simply not the fact, as no loan was ever procured directly or indirectly from the Bank on my account, or for any purpose in which I was interested. Nor did I ever receive any money, jewels, or presents of any description, from any of the constituents or customers of the Bank.

It is true that in 1864, in contemplation of shortly leaving India, I unfortunately invested a considerable amount of my savings in India, and of money I had inherited from my father, in shares of public companies in Bombay, as permanent investments, believing at the time they were good.

Further, that certain allotments of shares were made to me, which I accepted and held in the face of high premiums which they attained. I paid for these shares out of my own funds, and in place of selling them at high premiums, and pocketing some lacs of rupees, I held most of the shares, and have thus lost my entire fortune. As a proof in my belief in the sound position of the Bank of Bombay, I invested a considerable amount in its shares in the end of 1864, and only sold them long afterwards at a heavy loss when I required money to pay calls on my Investments. I never was a speculator, and never had any Bank account in my name, or in the name of other persons for speculative purposes. I hand, herewith, a statement of all and every share held by me, or in which I was interested, during the time I was in the service of the Bank of Bombay.

To James Blair, Esq.,
Matheran, Bombay.

Asiatic Banking Corporation, in Liquidation,
Bombay, 30th April 1867.

DEAR SIR,

I AM in receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, enclosing one to the Manager of the Union Bank of London, requesting him to have transferred to the Liquidators of this bank your three hundred shares of the English and American Bank, and that as you had now given up all your property to me and my Co-Liquidators you asked for a release from all claim upon you.

As I have good reason to believe you have given up all your property, I hereby grant you release from your debt, without prejudice to our rights and remedies against third parties. I shall now have no further demands on you, except in the event of a call being made upon the shares in this bank standing in your name, when the fact that you have now given up all your property will be duly considered.

In your letter to the Manager of the Union Bank of London you merely request him to transfer your English and American Bank shares to the Liquidators of the Asiatic Banking Corporation. Please send me another letter in duplicate, and insert after the word "corporation" "or their nominees."

I send you enclosed your loan note for Rs. 311,702 8.

I remain,
Dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,
F. W. LAWRENCE,
Off[s] Liquidator.

DEAR MR. BIRCH,

Robertson confirms what I thought was the case in regard to cash credit accounts, viz., that the Resolution passed by the Board to make advances was on the security of either one name if considered sufficient, or two or more names. He also says that the power granted to the Secretary to pass loans recommended by one Director was not recorded; and he further recollects that I mentioned to him on the breaking up of one of the Board meetings that you had put a note in your memo. book to that effect, showing that I, as Secretary, had more power than might be given to another secretary. That was in Cowasjee's time, and all loans or bills recommended by him were at once taken, consequently, without another Director's initials. And the same course was adopted with Premchund when he succeeded Cowasjee, as his recommendations, like Cowasjee's, were considered undoubted. I wish you could have had a talk here with Robertson, but the few days he has been here were so taken up with his father and brother that he could not fix a day, but says he will be glad to give you any information if you will communicate with him. His address now is Tay Terrace, Dunkeld, Perthshire, N. B.

Ever yours sincerely,
JAMES BLAIR.

REPORT

BY THE

COMMISSIONERS FOR THE BRITISH FISHERIES

OF THEIR PROCEEDINGS

IN THE YEAR ENDED 31ST DECEMBER 1868.

BEING THE FISHING OF 1868.

Presented in pursuance of the Acts 48 Geo. III., c. 110, sect. 7, and 55 Geo. III., c. 94, sect. 4.

THE Returns for the Herring Fishery of 1868 show a considerable decrease upon those of several previous years, and therefore a very large falling off upon those of 1867, which were almost the largest on record. At most of the Stations upon the north-east coast of Scotland, so poor a Fishing has not been experienced since the year 1834. Singularly enough in that year, as in 1868, the stations of Peterhead and Fraserburgh had an exceptionally good fishing, but not to the same extent as in 1868, when the fishing at these two stations proved a great one and gave the Fish-curers and Merchants there ample reason to congratulate themselves upon the favourable position they occupied. At Wick, Lybster, and Helmsdale, and thence along the Moray Firth to Banff, every station was miserably deficient, and loss and disappointment were the lot of both fishermen and their employers.

As regards the disputed question whether Herrings remain as abundant as ever, it may be viewed as satisfactory that the falling off in the Fishing of 1868 could not be traced positively to a diminution in the quantity of Herrings, but is almost everywhere attributed to tempestuous weather which occurred at a very critical period of the Fishery; for towards the latter end of August, just as the Herrings were settling down upon the coast, and when large shoals of them had made their appearance near the land, strong north-west gales set in. The effect was instantaneous in breaking up the shoals of fish and dispersing them, so that they were not fallen in with again within the wide range of coast alluded to as being so deficient in its catch. The Fishery Officers in that range simultaneously speak of these gales as producing that deplorable result. Thus the Wick Officer states:—

"On the Caithness coast success depends in a great measure on the weather during the fall of the "stream-tides of the fishing season, and unfortunately, with proof of fish on the coast, on the 11th "of August and again on the 22d, stormy weather prevented the boats from putting to sea."

He also states—

"That on the 25th a strong north-west gale blew, and that the weather continued unsteady "throughout the week, which prevented the boats from getting the desired offing until after the fish "had left the coast."

The Burghead Officer states—

"A week of favourable weather was succeeded by one of strong westerly gales, and the night of "the 26th, or more correctly the morning of the 27th of August, will long be remembered by fisher-"men in connexion with such a loss of nets as has probably no precedent in any previous year. A "violent storm from the north-west burst suddenly upon the boats as they hung to their nets; some "crews with great difficulty and danger succeeded in hauling their nets on board, but many were "compelled to cut the whole train away, or a great part of it, and run for the nearest harbour. "Hundreds of nets were thus abandoned."

The Buckie Officer states—

"On the 22d of August there was good appearance of herrings and a good fishing expected, but "a gale from the west sprung up which continued till the 26th. On the evening of that day, the "boats from the different harbours and creeks put to sea, but when most of their nets were shot "the gale broke out again, and it was with difficulty that they got back, many of them with a great "loss of nets, which had to be cut away. This gale put an end to the fishing."

EDINBURGH: T. CONSTABLE, PRINTER TO THE QUEEN, AND TO THE UNIVERSITY.

The Banff Officer states—

"Towards the middle and close of the season the weather was extremely rough, nothing but gales "of wind from the north-west which drove the fish down the Firth, and caused great loss of nets."

Although these gales were experienced at Fraserburgh and Peterhead, they did not break up the Fishing there; for at Fraserburgh it was carried on with success until the middle of September, and at Peterhead until near the end of that month.

The distance of the shoals of Herrings from the Coast varied considerably, and this difference of distance is interesting to note, although the causes for it have not yet been arrived at:—

Thus the Wick Officer states—

"That the herrings did not visit the inshore grounds this season in any body, the main shoal being "at a distance of fifteen to twenty miles off the coast."

The Lybster Officer states—

"The usual and best fishing ground for some years past has been from four to eight miles off in an "easterly direction, but during the past season nearly the entire catch was got close in to the shore, and "few or none were got further than two to four miles off. So very partial was the fishing, that while "one or two boats some nights hauled twenty to sixty crans each, all the others round about, and "perhaps not twenty yards off, would not have a cran of fish."

The Helmsdale Officer states—

"That in that locality no considerable shoal of fish appears to have come within ten miles of the "shore or visited their usual spawning grounds."

The Banff Officer states—

"That at the beginning of the season, the fishermen tried the fishing at thirty miles from the shore. "They caught no herrings there, but in the middle of August fell in with the shoal about three miles "off Troup Head; and some days after, what was supposed to be the same shoal was found more to "the eastward."

The Fraserburgh Officer states—

"That like the two past seasons, the herrings were got at a considerable offing, viz., from twenty-five "to forty miles from the shore; that only in one week at the end of August were they abundant on the "in-shore fishing grounds where they used to be found, in which week the weather proved stormy."

The Peterhead Officer states—

"That in the few days of the heavier fishings, the herrings were got on the inner or old fishing "ground, the lighter fishings being generally made from the distant offing of from twenty-five to "forty miles. Yet as the fish were not so often found inshore as outside, the chief part of the year's "fishing was carried on outside."

The Montrose Officer states—

"The herrings were chiefly to be got this season at a considerable offing."

The Anstruther Officer states—

"That no large shoal of herrings visited the Firth of Forth, the herrings landed having been almost "altogether brought from a great distance seaward, their former favourite haunts near the shore proving "very unproductive; but as the season advanced there was a tendency in the herrings to set in more "upon the land."

The Eyemouth Officer states—

"That on the Northumberland coast there seemed to be a large body of herrings throughout the "season; that the French vessels fishing from ten to fifteen miles seaward of the Fern Islands were "very successful, that many of them (and they are large vessels) had fished full cargoes as early "as the 8th of August, and by the 28th had made up second cargoes, with which they were on their "way back to France; that owing to the much better fishing which these vessels have for some years past "had, at an offing of from ten to twenty miles from the Fern Islands, compared with that which the "native boats have had fishing inshore, although the French fish with inferior netting and with "less knowledge of the coast, those native crews who own large-decked boats for the White Fishing, "have in view to use them at the Herring Fishery, which hitherto they have not done, and to store "them with provisions and salt, so as to remain at sea for a week and fish in the offing."

In connexion with the better success of the French fishermen, Officers state—

"That the French have a practice of attaching old worn-out nets to the bottom of their good "trains, so as to make their netting reach to a greater depth in the sea. In this way they discover "at what depth the thickest portion of the shoal of herrings is swimming, and then adapt their "trains of nets to that depth so as to catch them. It seems as if our own fishermen might, in some "instances, succeed better if they made trial of this plan among the French for discovering the herrings."

These Extracts indicate that last year, as in some other years, the Boats had generally more success out at Sea than near the Shore, but that in some localities the case was just the reverse. This is one of those fluctuations which have ever been characteristic of the Herring Fishery and which have contributed to make it, as an enterprise, that lottery which it is known to be. The fact however that shoals of Herrings are found, and are fished successfully by coast fishermen, at a much greater distance from the land than those fishermen were in the habit of venturing to in former years, is calculated to give a great stimulus to the improvement of Boats. An immense advance in the construction of Boats has been made of late years, and their equipment is superior even to what it was but a few seasons ago. They have now reached to a size as large as the crews can handle or well propel with oars in contending, as they often have to do, with calms and light winds. The existence of fine shoals of herrings far out to sea, but easily reached by a more sure mode of propulsion than by sails and oars will undoubtedly ere long introduce Steam into the fishing fleet, and although the experiments as yet made for its introduction have not been successful, there are not wanting signs of so much attention being directed towards the best means of applying this improvement to Fishing Boats, as to make its ultimate application to them as certain, and eventually nearly as universal, as it has become to Ships in the Navy and to Merchant Vessels. With the increased value then given to the Boat, that which has long been required among fishermen will also no doubt come, viz., an organized system of insuring their Boats against loss at sea. Hitherto, it has not been found practicable to effect such insurances by means of the ordinary Marine Insurance Companies, but now the fishermen are tending towards the establishment of Insurance Clubs or Societies among themselves, perhaps the best form which this requirement can take; for in this form it will elicit and set into action the deeper thoughtfulness and providence which are beginning to prevail among them, and by which they have already so much bettered their condition, as to enable them to contemplate the undertaking of obligations of no inconsiderable amount, and by entering into mutual combination for such a purpose, to show that in social organization they are becoming a truly self-supporting class.

Upon the West Coast the Herring Fishery at Stornoway was much broken up by severe gales. The Officer there states—

"That the scanty and irregular fishing of the season is attributed solely to the remarkable "succession of severe south-westerly gales, which commenced about the middle of May, and continued "with little interruption throughout the greater part of the fishing; such was the boisterous state of "the weather, that on twelve out of thirty-three fishing nights only a small proportion of the fleet "ventured to sea, and on not a few of the other nights, numbers were forced back to harbour before "reaching the fishing ground or wetting their nets. The fishermen said they never before experienced "such unseasonable weather."

At Loch Boisdale, in South Uist, the Fishing was more successful than at Stornoway. The Loch Boisdale Fishery, which was only first developed so recently as in 1865, has sprung into importance with almost unexampled rapidity. This is owing partly to the abundance in which the Herrings have been found, but more especially to the fact that it occurs at a time when Herring Fishing is suspended everywhere else in Great Britain except at Stornoway; and that Loch Boisdale being much nearer than Stornoway to the Southern Ports, is able to supply them with Herrings fresh, which Stornoway, from its greater distance, cannot so well do. The Loch Boisdale Fishery employs Steamers of considerable size and tonnage to ship off the Herrings, and no fewer than eleven of these vessels (besides Sailing Vessels for the Cured Fish), were so employed last season. The Herrings, lightly touched with salt to preserve them during the short and quick passage they make in these steamers, are in great demand, and are disposed of the moment they reach port. The trade is a vigorous one, requiring energy and promptness; and the spurring activity and circulation of money which it has imparted to that formerly unvisited region, have brought it into advantageous contact with the commercial world, and already materially altered its character. If this trade from Loch Boisdale in Fresh Fish has in some degree interfered with that which was formerly carried on in the same article from Stornoway, it has at any rate given Stornoway the opportunity of devoting itself more exclusively to the Export Trade with the Continent, where its Herrings, cured for immediate consumption, and being the first catch of the season, are eagerly waited for, and where the first arrivals realize high prices. To expedite delivery, a large proportion of them are forwarded vid Glasgow and Leith by the passage Steamers to Hamburgh and the Baltic, thus adding much to the internal traffic of the Kingdom.

Off Greenock, a shoal of Herrings set in even more abundant than that adverted to in last year's Report, and it was fished with the greatest success. Several fishermen netted £100 a piece at this fishery in a very short time. Both Drift Nets and Trawl Nets were used, but chiefly Trawl Nets. This admixture at one fishery, of Nets so totally different in character, and theoretically so little able to be worked together, requires undoubtedly strict supervision over the fishermen to keep order and prevent destruction of property, the greater amount of injury being most likely to befall the Drift Nets which are the larger and more costly Nets of the two. The Board, aware of this, took the necessary precautions to prevent collisions in the use of these different Nets, and by the watchfulness of the superintending force, any such collisions were entirely avoided. The re-appearance of Herrings at Greenock in still greater profuseness, after the large take of them there with Trawl Nets in the previous year, goes far to disprove the allegations which have been made against the Trawl, that it is injurious to the Herring Fishery. Further disproval may be derived from Loch Fyne, where the Herring Fishery was better in 1868 than it had been in 1867 ; and where the Trawl Net, more or less in use for many years, was in consequence of the Act passed in 1867, brought still more freely and extensively into use in 1868 than it had ever been before. Facts like these cannot be overlooked by those on the spot, and are silently working out conviction ; they have already modified the objections entertained against the Seine or Trawl Net as a Net for Herrings, and the animosities upon this subject, which quite recently were so rife amongst Fishermen, are becoming much allayed.

In the Districts of Loch Carron and Loch Broom, as well as throughout the Lochs on the north-west coast of the Mainland, the Fishery proved very deficient.

The Gross Returns of the Herring Fishery of the year, exhibit the following result :—

	Barrels.		Barrels.		Barrels.
Cured,.....	651,433¾.	Branded,.....	209,462½.	Exported,.....	368,744¾.

Considering the very short catch at so many of the principal Stations, these Returns show that the Fishery of 1868 was less below an average than might have been expected ; but this general result by no means made up to the principal Stations for the scarcity they experienced. This scarcity at Wick and at many other places was followed by disastrous effects, exhibited in serious depression of trade and severe destitution and suffering among the working classes, and it will be long before the season 1868 will cease to be regarded by them as one of failure and want.

The shortness of the Fishing at so many of the chief exporting Stations, necessarily diminished the amount of Brand Fees, yet notwithstanding, they reached the sum of £3493, 4s. 8d., indicating the important fact that the foreign trade looks to the Brand as the means for carrying on its transactions. This fact is further confirmed by foreign trade circulars, which state that, with extended railway communication upon the Continent, the Official Brand is the means of opening up markets for Herrings in distant districts, the Brand permitting their transport to any distance without their having to undergo by the way the repeated and deteriorating inspection of dealers.

In the Firth of Forth, neither the Winter Herring Fishery nor the Sprat Fishery were successful, but upon the Caithness Coast the Winter Herring Fishery was better than that of the previous year. As regards the Coast of Caithness, it has been remarked that until this Winter Fishery began, there was no proper Cod and Ling Fishery carried on there, but now, in consequence of the herring bait obtained in winter and spring, a valuable Cod and Ling long line fishery has been set agoing, to which most of the boats also take nets, so as to be able to work the Herring Fishery along with the long line Fishery. By this means, they frequently land upon the same day fair takes of both Herrings and Cod and Ling. Besides herring, mussels are extensively used as bait for the long line fishery, and the preservation and increase of this description of bait is a subject of growing importance to fishermen. It was represented to the Board by the fishermen of Eyemouth, that the extensive mussel-beds in Boston Deeps, from which they had been accustomed to derive large supplies of mussels, their chief stay for the long line fishing, had become so reduced by being over-fished, that an entire loss of mussel bait from that quarter was apprehended, and at the request of the committee of fishermen, who undertook to pay all expenses, Mr. Wilson, the fishery officer at Eyemouth, was sent to Boston to make inquiry. He ascertained that the fishermen had good reason for their fears, and he furnished them with such information upon the state of the beds as enabled them to put the matter before the Board of Trade, by whom it was fully considered, with special relation to the provisions of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868, under which Act the Corporation of Boston have since applied to obtain powers for the better regulation of the Mussel fishery at these beds.

The Sea Fisheries Act, which was passed by Parliament in 1868, is a most important legislative measure, and applies to the whole of the sea fisheries of Great Britain and Ireland, salmon excepted. It contains a new Fishery Convention with France, establishes a complete system of Registration for Fishing Boats, and enacts useful Police Regulations for the fishing grounds. During its progress through Parliament, it received the constant and careful attention of the Board, in respect to those parts of it which apply to Scotland, and it is hoped that the Act may ultimately lead to the collection of the Statistics of all the Sea Fisheries of the Kingdom, an object undoubtedly difficult to accomplish, but which has long been desired.

The Cod and Ling Fishery of the year, for Scotland and the Isle of Man, produced 113,831 cwts. cured dried; and 9659 barrels cured in pickle, as compared with 119,638¼ cwts. cured dried, and 10,819 barrels cured in pickle in 1867.

The superintendence at sea was effectively carried on upon the East Coast, as in past seasons, by H.M.S.V. "Lizard," and by the Gun-boats from the "Duncan" Guardship at Leith and the "Dauntless" Guardship at Hull. The "Vigilant" fishery cruiser was actively employed upon this duty off Wick and Stornoway, and upon other parts of the coasts, as was likewise H.M.S.V. "Jackal" upon the West Coast. Valuable as the services of the superintending vessels have always been to the interests of fishermen, and frequent as has been the aid and protection they have afforded in cases of difficulty, distress, or aggression, the efficiency of their superintendence will be much increased by the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868, from its clear definition of the police duties to be performed and the power it confers of carrying out these duties. In this particular the Act cannot fail to prove a great boon to the fisheries.

In continuation of the system pursued by the Meteorological Department, London, of contributing its aid towards the wellbeing of the fisheries by arranging with the Fishery Board for supplying Barometers on loan to Coast Stations, Portpatrick and St. Monance have been furnished with barometers, and negotiations have been effected by the Board whereby the Earl of Seafield purchased from the Department a barometer for Cullen in Banffshire, and the Earl of Stair another for Drumore in Wigtonshire. The Board have besides induced the fishermen and the proprietors of land at Downies in Kincardineshire to subscribe jointly to purchase a barometer for that place, the Department stating that, in consequence of so good a subscription having been collected, they would bear any additional expense for setting up the instrument beyond what the collection had provided. Since the commencement of the system, the Board have obtained from the Department the loan or gift of barometers to the following places in Scotland:—

NEWHAVEN.	WHITEHILLS.	STAXIGOE.
BUCKHAVEN.	PORTSOY.	BURRAY.
ST. MONANCE.	CULLEN.	SANDLODGE.
CELLARDYKE.	PORTKNOCKIE.	LERWICK.
ST. ANDREWS.	PORTESSIE.	NESS.
BROUGHTY FERRY.	BURGHEAD.	BAYBLE.

PORT LEITHEN.	PORTMAHOMACK.	PORTREE.
FINDON.	LYBSTER.	PORTPATRICK.
PITULLIE.	SARCLET.	DRUMORE.
ROSEHEARTY.

The instruments are excellent; they are under charge of proper persons for having their indications noted daily, and every year they become more appreciated and better understood by the fishermen for whom they are supplied.

In previous Reports it has been stated that the Board is engaged in carrying on extensive works for the construction of Anstruther Union Harbour, and that they are such as to absorb the whole of the annual grant made to the Board by Parliament for fishery harbours. These works were advancing with great rapidity and without having met with any check, when unfortunately, upon the 19th of September, a very heavy gale, accompanied by an extraordinarily high equinoctial tide, did much damage. At the outer end of the eastern pier it destroyed nearly the whole of the work which had been executed during the year, and the waves pouring down over the parapet on to the roadway broke up the roadway, making in several places large fissures which laid the pier open to the foundations and shook and tried it severely in many parts. The Contractor's stages and plant were also carried away. Repair of the damage was immediately proceeded with, but it has proved tedious and expensive and must in the end considerably enhance the cost of the works. The negotiations adverted to in last year's Report for bringing a branch of one of the Fife railways to this harbour, have been further advanced during the year but have not yet been concluded: pending final decision by the Directors of the railway and others on this point, which is one of the utmost consequence to the fishing as well as the trading interests of the harbour, commencement of the Western Breakwater has been again suspended, as the direction the breakwater is to take and the whole character of its construction, are involved in the question whether it is to have a railway, or is to be merely a bulwark for boats. Having alluded in last year's Report to the great works carrying on by the British Fishery Society for the improvement of Wick Harbour, although not under charge of this Board, it is satisfactory to be able to state that they have made very considerable progress. They attest the formidable difficulties which have to be contended with in erecting such structures upon so exposed a coast as the East Coast of Scotland, and being in many features a national undertaking and directly connected with the Herring Fishery and other Coast Fisheries, they are viewed with the deepest interest by the Board.

The Report of the Engineers, and General Account of the year's Expenditure of the Pier Grant, with the outlay upon Anstruther Union Harbour, will be found in the Appendix along with the Returns and Statistics of the Fisheries for the year, in the following order :—

SUMMARY.

In detailing the substance of these Accounts and comparing them with those of the preceding year, it will be seen that the total quantity of Herrings cured during 1868 was 651,433$\frac{3}{4}$ Barrels, the total quantity branded 209,462$\frac{1}{2}$ Barrels, and the total quantity exported, 368,744$\frac{3}{4}$ Barrels: being a decrease from the preceding year of 174,155$\frac{1}{4}$ Barrels in the total quantity cured; of 107,958½ Barrels in the total quantity branded; and of 109,959½ Barrels in the total quantity exported.

In the Cod and Ling Fishery, the Returns show that in the year 1868, 113,831 cwts. were cured dried, and 9659 Barrels cured in pickle; and that the total quantity exported was 52,403 cwts. cured dried: being a decrease from the preceding year of 5807¼ cwts. in the total quantity cured dried; and of 1160 Barrels in the total quantity cured in pickle; but an increase of 6178 cwts. in the total quantity exported.

From the Fishery Statistics, it will be seen that in the year 1868, 14,300 Boats, manned by 46,417 Fishermen and Boys, were employed in the Herring and Cod and Ling Fisheries; and that the total estimated value of Boats, Nets, and Lines employed in these Fisheries in the same period was £1,041,809: being an increase over the preceding year of 92 Boats and 198 Fishermen and Boys, and of £21,621 in the estimated value of Boats, Nets, and Lines.

Report by the Engineers on the State of the Harbour Works under the Charge of the Board of Fisheries.

The Works connected with the Union Harbour at Anstruther had been carried on by the Contractors until the Eastern Pier had been extended within 130 feet of the head, when a very severe gale upon the 19th of September last, accompanied by an extraordinary equinoctial tide, came on and destroyed a considerable portion of the Season's unfinished Work, and besides this damaged the Contractor's Plant. Immediate steps were taken for having the Damage repaired, and the repair has been going on satisfactorily whenever the state of the weather and tides would admit of it. The Works have been pushed on so as, if practicable, to have the Eastern Pier finished before the Winter of 1869.

As stated in last year's Report, the execution of the Western Breakwater has been delayed in consequence of the negotiations for connecting the Railway with the Harbour, but these negotiations have not yet sufficiently advanced to allow that portion of the Works to be proceeded with.

D. & T. STEVENSON,
Engineers.

REPORT

OF THE

DEEP SEA AND COAST FISHERY COMMISSIONERS, IRELAND,

FOR THE YEAR 1868.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY JOHN POYNTZ, EARL SPENCER,

LORD LIEUTENANT-GENERAL AND GENERAL GOVERNOR OF IRELAND.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,

WE, the Commissioners for the Deep Sea and Coast Fisheries of Ireland, beg leave to submit to your Excellency our Report on the state of the Fisheries for the year 1868.

The general conditions and results of the fisheries during the past year will, we trust and believe, on a perusal and consideration of the facts stated in the various reports printed in the Appendix, be deemed satisfactory. In some of the districts, and especially in those which are more remote, it is true that a diminished capture and declining prosperity is reported; but in others, again, and those the more important, a decided improvement is represented to have taken place. Where the former state of things is alleged to exist, want of means, emigration, in some cases an actual falling off in the numbers of fish frequenting the coast, and, generally, stormy and unfavourable weather are referred to as the causes; but we have little doubt that where such falling off is well authenticated it is to the last cause that it is chiefly to be attributed, the season having been one of unusually severe and protracted gales. There is much difficulty, however, in ascertaining the exact facts in consequence of the reporting officers (the inspecting officers of the Coast-guard) being of necessity, through their frequent removal, dependent for their information on local persons, whose statements are not unfrequently coloured according to their views and feelings, and are often unreliable.

The decrease in the number of boats—nearly all being of the first class—shown by the district returns, and which would appear to bear an unfavourable aspect, we find on inquiry to be mainly due to the frequent removals referred to, and to the different views taken by the officers, many boats previously registered as fishing boats having been rejected from the list in consequence of their being found to be more employed in carrying stone or manure or in other coasting occupations than in fishing; the number of men employed, on the other hand, it will be observed is, notwithstanding, stated to have somewhat increased. Under the careful revision which the introduction of the new system of registration authorized by the Act of last Session will necessitate, and with greater attention to classification and details on the part of the registering officers in future, these discrepancies will, we trust, disappear.

The herring fishery on the east coast generally during the year has been very successful, and the take greatly in excess of late years. It is also very satisfactory to observe that the herrings have again, after many years' absence, returned in considerable numbers to the western coasts, and in anticipation of the return being repeated this year and its becoming, as formerly, an annual occurrence, active preparations are now being made by the fishermen to profit by the occasion.

The important mackerel fishery on the south coast although unproductive during the earlier part of the season in consequence of heavy and long-continued gales has latterly been highly successful and remunerative to all concerned. The letter of the Secretary of the South of Ireland Fishing Company, established at Kinsale, which will be found in the Appendix, gives a very gratifying account of the success which has attended the efforts of that Company—a success which we believe is principally due to the system of management adopted.

We much regret that similar results have not attended the enterprise of the Irish Sea Coast Fishery Company, established at Howth, and the North-Western Company, established at Derry, both of which have ceased their operations. In neither case have we been able to ascertain the precise cause of failure, but in the former at least we apprehend that it is attributable in a great measure to a faulty system of management and the preliminary formation of an establishment too costly in its nature in proportion to the profits to be derived from the business engaged in.

The oyster fisheries, so far as they are of common right to the public, and more especially those on the eastern coast, have been attended with increased success, and have afforded remunerative employment to the large body of fishermen who are engaged in them. We have the more satisfaction in recording this prosperity from the marked contrast which it presents to the ruined and exhausted state of the public oyster fisheries on the coasts of England and France generally—a contrast which is due to the proper regard which has been paid to the statute law, the enforcement of the penalty due to its transgression, and to the care and attention which has been bestowed on the general interests in the enactment of such protective or restorative bye-laws as circumstances in each case have seemed to demand. We refer also with satisfaction to the success which attended our efforts during the last Session of Parliament to preserve the beds on the eastern coast from the disastrous consequences which would inevitably have attended their being left open to dredging all the year round, under the terms of the Convention with France, as had been proposed.

With regard to the private beds, for the formation of which licences have been granted by us, we regret to have to state that although in some few additional instances, beyond those of previous years, a disposition has been shown by the licencees to avail themselves of the privileges conceded to them, yet, on the whole, the primary objects in granting the licences, viz., the affording an increased supply of oysters to the public, the giving of increased employment to fishermen and others in their localities, and the dissemination of spat from the protected to adjacent public beds, have not been attained. From not more than one-half of the persons to whom licences have been given have replies been received to our circular, requesting information as to the steps they had taken to stock their beds; and it has now become an important question whether it will not be our duty, in many instances, to take steps for revoking the licences, the purposes for granting which have been so neglected.

At the same time, looking to the present insufficient and gradually diminishing supply (from general sources) of oysters to the public, it seems to us very desirable that means should be adopted for, as far as possible, supplying the deficiency. With this view, we think that increased facilities might with advantage be given for the formation of oyster beds to private parties unconnected with the soil of the adjacent foreshore; and it is also, in our opinion, worthy of consideration whether it might not be advisable to authorize and encourage, in such localities as might be found suitable, the establishment of oyster layings by individual fishermen of known good character and industry, granting to each a portion of the bed of the sea, not exceeding in any one case five acres, on certain terms and conditions, and on principles somewhat similar to those recently adopted, under like circumstances, on the coast of France. It would perhaps be found advisable, should the course thus indicated be approved, to afford to the fishermen to whom the grants might be made the aid of a qualified instructor who might be attached to the Fishery Board as a sub-inspector, subject to certain charges, and we believe that, from the industry and enterprise of the small communities which would thus be established, important benefits would accrue, both to the public and to the individuals themselves.

No complaints have reached us from any quarter, except in one doubtful instance, of irregularities amongst the fishermen, and we believe that the same good conduct which has hitherto characterized them has prevailed during the past year.

In the Appendix will be found a report of a tour of inspection and inquiry undertaken at our request by Mr. J. P. Brophy, of the Secretary's Department of the Board of Works, with the object not only of ascertaining the actual present state of the fisheries, but also the causes which have led to the apparent falling off in the numbers of men and boats now engaged in them as compared with the numbers twenty-five years back, and to trace out, if possible, what has become of the numerous boats reported then to have been in existence. We find his statements to confirm the views and opinions we have entertained and from time to time put forward, and which it may not be out of place here again to repeat. We believe that the present depressed state of the fisheries, so far as such a state is fairly deducible from the mere apparent decrease in the numbers of men and boats engaged in them, is mainly due to the great diminution in the population, more especially on the remote southern and western coasts (to which localities, in fact, the description of the state referred to is almost solely applicable) consequent on the distress and loss of life caused by the famine of 1845-6-7, on the emigration which ensued and has since continued, and the consequent decrease in the demand for local or home consumption; the distance from and difficulty of access to good markets and want of remunerative prices; the precarious nature of the pursuit itself, more especially on the rugged and stormy coasts before alluded to; and, prominently also, the more general means now afforded to the remaining population of obtaining agricultural employment and their disposition to give a preference to it.

A further cause also given by us, and the correctness of which continued reports to the same effect leave little room to doubt, has been that in some localities the quantity of fish frequenting them has seriously diminished, one or two species having even almost entirely disappeared, while the migratory fish have in some cases altogether, though there is reason now to hope only temporarily, abandoned the coast.

That which, in our opinion, is now required to give a new stimulus to the exertions of the fishermen, and to recruit their numbers, is the providing of means, for the more important stations at least, of immediately communicating to fish factors and others when good takes have been secured, and of rapidly transmitting the produce to good markets, where remunerative prices may be obtained. Electric telegraphs would supply the former, and tramways of a cheap construction, the latter want.

The aid which we think it desirable that Government should afford, namely, by an increase of the superintending staff, and also by the appointment of a Government tender to watch over the fisheries, we have pointed out in our reports for the past three years. Such public aid, however, can of itself avail but little; private enterprise alone can, in our minds, advance and develope the fisheries on a sound and permanent basis.

We have the honor to be
Your Excellency's obedient servants,

J. G. M'Kerlie,

Commissioners of Public Works and Sea Fisheries.

Report of Inspecting Commissioner for 1868.

REPORT OF INSPECTING COMMISSIONER FOR 1868.

THE Board having this year determined to avail themselves of the valuable services of Mr. Brophy in making a tour of such part of the coast as other pressing engagements would permit, he has left little for me to say in reference to the several places which he has visited, from Galway, round the north coast to Dublin, further than to express my general concurrence in the conclusions which he has drawn from his observations upon the state of that portion of our island. Indeed, it may be said that in most parts of the south and west very nearly a similar state of things may be found, varying only where an extraordinary stimulus had been given by the introduction of concentrated capital or increased facilities of transit.

Mr. Brophy's very minute and interesting report will be found from page 9 to page 16. It is much to be regretted that his other important engagements did not permit the completion of the tour this year. In the meantime we are enabled to refer to the ordinary returns from the Coastguard Department, and without meaning to undervalue the services of those gentlemen whose zeal and activity have been found in many instances beyond praise, it is not to be expected that, in the state of constant mutation which the rules of their service require they can be as generally well informed on this branch of their duties, giving much trouble and no recompense, as an intelligent public officer who has for upwards of twenty years been occasionally visiting nearly every creek upon the coast. Our last report bears date the 15th of June, 1868. Since then, on the 13th of July, a new measure of legislation has, at the instance of the Board of Trade, been passed under the title of "An Act to carry into effect a Convention between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French concerning the fisheries in the seas adjoining the British Islands and France, and to amend the laws relating to British sea fisheries."

This Act, 31st and 32nd Vict., cap. 45, would, from its title, appear to relate exclusively to British fisheries, but Ireland is especially included in the interpretation clause, section 6, and has become subject to all its provisions, excepting only the regulations relating to oyster fisheries contained in part 3, section 27, which interdicts interference with the jurisdiction or powers now possessed by the Irish Fishery Commissioners with regard to oyster fisheries, which jurisdiction, it appears, does not extend further than a distance of three miles from low water mark along the whole extent of the coast, but with respect to bays, the mouths of which do not exceed ten miles in width, the distance is to be measured from a straight line drawn from headland to headland.

But in order to give further protection to the deep sea oyster banks upon the eastern coast, another section (67) has been added, authorizing the Irish Fishery Commissioners from time to time to lay before Her Majesty in Council by-laws for the purpose of restricting or regulating the dredging for oysters on any oyster beds or banks situate within the distance of twenty miles measured from a straight line drawn from the eastern point of Lambay Island to Carnsore point on the coast of Ireland outside the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands, and all such by-laws shall apply equally to all boats and persons on whom they may be binding. In pursuance of this authority we forwarded to the Board of Trade on the 3rd of October last the draft of a by-law for the approval of Her Majesty in Council, but it could not of course be submitted till after the Act had been put in force and so gazetted, and that period having been fixed at the 1st of February we have again forwarded a by-law, duly executed, making the close time for those distant banks similar to the general statutable close time fixed by the original Acts for Ireland from the 1st of May to the 31st of August, which has been approved of and duly published. A copy will be found in the Appendix, page 66.

The Board of Trade have, under the 22nd section of the recent Act 31st and 32nd Vict., cap. 45, established a most minute system of registration, marking, and numbering of all fishing vessels on our coast in strict conformity with the regulations contained in the several articles of the late Convention with France, classified under the several collectorships of customs, and to be carried out by the customs and coastguard departments. The proofs of this important code were very politely submitted for the information of our department, but some trifling alterations which we ventured to suggest were not judged expedient.

I earnestly hope that it may be found possible to carry out those regulations more satisfactorily than the former less complex and less minute measure worked. The aid of the customs department and their closer intercourse with the coastguards will probably insure a more vigilant enforcement of the new regulations, and the advantages of it if thoroughly effected cannot be overrated. We have, since the sad scenes of 1846, never had a reliable registry.

Our department has for some years now been considered a fair subject for reform or improvement, and it is much to be deplored that so much time should be allowed to pass without some decided step. Ever since the report of the Royal Commissioners, issued in 1865, parties have been anxiously looking for some important changes, and what, between vague expectations of extraordinary encouragement, and apprehensions of measures not calculated to give confidence, there is decidedly an unwillingness in such a state of uncertainty to embark capital in our fisheries.

I had hoped that from the three cases of concentrated capital applied to the fisheries at Londonderry, at Howth, and at Cork, much good might have been expected. There did not appear to have been a deficiency of skill, of energy, or of means in any of these cases, and yet in the last only am I able to point at a successful result. The real causes of failure in the two first cases, so far as they are not involved in mystery, and so far as I have been able to learn, are attributed to mismanagement, disunion, lavish expenditure, and perhaps still more to another cause, incidental to joint stock companies, where the operations cannot be under the immediate and constant supervision of principals. I have taken great trouble in one of those cases, "Howth, or the Irish Deep Sea Fishery Company," to unravel the mystery of failure. I have been met with the utmost candour by some few individuals of high position interested in the project, and I have traced a combination of causes, quite enough to make me tremble for the success of any similar undertaking so long as the superhuman efforts of James Haughton and Father Spratt and their truly philanthropic associates are ineffectual in restraining the monster evil of the day, that evil which most especially affects that branch of industry which has for more than half a century been the main subject of my thoughts, and which now, in the close of my life, I still pronounce to be its greatest bane.

But there is one bright spot to be found to cheer us. We have just received from the respected secretary of the South of Ireland Fisheries Company a most gratifying detail of circumstances connected with their proceedings for the last year, calculated to encourage hopes; and let it be remembered that it refers especially to a community of whose habits I dared to tell truth in one of my communications in last year's report. I did so on authority that could not be doubted, and I brought upon my head all the accumulated wrath of both sexes, and of various writers. If, as I have been assured, the evil has been most miraculously diminished, and the untiring efforts of those who should have appreciated my motives better have ended in improved habits, I am amply compensated.

In the meantime I beg especially to refer to the report of the South of Ireland Company, Appendix, page 65.

I also beg to refer to our correspondence with the Board of Trade on the subject of the new regulations, which will be found in the Appendix, page 64.

Among the printed documents furnished to us is a report from Messrs. R. A. Ogilvie and H. Cholmondeley Pennell to the Board of Trade, dated the 4th of November, 1868. In this report, under the section referring to Ireland, page 6, may be found the following statement:—

"On reference to the foregoing remarks upon the existing systems of registry of sea-fishing boats in the United Kingdom it will be seen that the only system at present in operation which substantially embodies the above conditions is that in force in Ireland. Whilst in England and Scotland the numbering and lettering of boats is incomplete in theory, and is, although in different degrees, imperfectly carried out in practice, and in neither country is any attempt made at systematic registration or the granting of certificates of registry. In Ireland both have been organized, and have been carried out with uniformity and vigour under the Commissioners of Public Works with the assistance of the Coast-Guard. We consider that this system, with certain modifications necessary to bring it into harmony with the provisions of the new Act, will form an excellent basis on which to frame general regulations for the registry, numbering, and lettering of fishing boats throughout the United Kingdom; and will also furnish the means of obtaining, on certain of the most important points valuable and reliable fishery statistics."

We have also been favoured with a copy of a report made by Mr. Cholmondeley Pennell to the Board of Trade "On the Oyster and Mussel Fisheries of France and the applicability of the French system to British waters."

This very interesting document has been presented to both Houses of Parliament by command, and printed. It may be purchased for the small sum of 4½*d.*, and is deserving the attention of all persons interested in oyster culture. It extends to thirty-five folios, and will be found to contain much valuable information on the subject, both in reference to what has been done and is in progress in France, contrasted with the present state of the oyster fisheries in England.

This report has, I find, become the subject of much controversy, and the columns of the Field and of Land and Water for the last month will be found to contain several interesting communications on the subject. I have been accustomed for some time to consider that the system of reproduction of the oyster and its general culture had reached something like perfection in France, and that in common with other branches of sea fisheries it had lately progressed most miraculously under the fostering hand of a wise Government. The first doubt raised in my mind was from the perusal of one of the commercial reports received at the Foreign Office from one of Her Majesty's consuls in 1868, No. 1, page 17, Mr. Consul Edward Mark, on the trade of Marseilles for the year 1866, at page 24, among other very interesting subjects, refers to the coast fisheries in the following words:—

"Fish, one of the commodities which Providence furnishes in the most bountiful scale, is no longer an article of food, properly speaking. It has become in France of late years rather an article of luxury on the tables of the rich than an alimentary substance for the masses. A general negligence of the fisheries, and the growing preference of the French coast population for occupation on shore is mainly the cause of this limitation of the supply of fish."

Mr. Pennell does not offer so flattering accounts of the success at the "Ile de Re" as we expected. It was the point to which I have been in the habit of directing the attention of several persons who wished to imitate the course pursued by the adventurers in that quarter.

His interesting, and, I am sure, faithful account, will be found at page 15, and his more cheering account of "Arcachon" will be found at page 7. It appears that in that interesting locality, which at one time abounded with oysters, the exhaustion produced by over-dredging some thirty years ago had so materially affected the supply that a very stringent law of January, 1852, had become necessary, and that the natural beds are now gradually and steadily improving.

Indeed, I cannot too highly recommend this valuable report to the perusal of all persons interested in the oyster fisheries. It will be particularly valuable as a guide to those who wisely determine to visit the several localities themselves.

Whatever shortcomings may have been attributed to our Irish Fishery Department, we may with great truth assert that we have omitted no opportunity of promoting the improvement and preventing the destruction of our oyster fisheries, most especially our public beds.

Wherever excessive exhaustion prevailed, and we have had our share, we have exercised the powers given to us in the enactment of by-laws of a most useful and salutary kind, suited to the peculiar circumstances of the country; in some cases, curtailing, and in some few, extending for short terms, the close time for dredging and restraining the removal from the beds of small or immature oysters. By those regulations nearly the whole of our most important natural beds are protected, and are admitted to be improving; the particulars may be seen by reference to the Appendix in any of our reports, but in the present at page 45.

APPENDIX.

Report of Inspecting Commissioner for 1868.

In every instance where a fair prima facie case was made in an application we have, without any cost to the parties, held inquiries, and granted eighty-five licences to qualified individuals to an extent of 15,759 acres to the end of last year. See Appendix, pages 50 and 51.

We have endeavoured to procure from these persons reports of the results of their proceedings up to the end of each year, and in our Appendix, pages 52 to 58, will be found all the information that has been furnished to us.

It is much to be regretted that those concessions have not been followed up more vigorously in many cases, but we have been assured that the very preservation alone, where little else was done, has caused a considerable increase in some of our public beds of which the stock has been increased by the spat from the preserved grounds. We want very much an introduction of small parks, claires, or fattening pits, as described in Mr. Pennell's report, pages 6 and 11. There are many places within the control of the Crown where experiments may be made, and it would not be unreasonable to expect that, so far as a few experiments, the Government would aid by becoming the pioneers of such a system; it would cost but little, if anything, because there is no doubt that some return would be had.

The object is one of vast importance as a source of wealth and employment. It may be judged by the returns which we have had from the only part of Ireland where we have, through the kindness of one individual, been able to establish anything like a reliable system of oyster statistics. The report of Mr. P. Maher, of Arklow, dated the 12th of January (page 58, Appendix), shows that between the 1st of September, when the season opened, and the 31st of December following, the total number of oysters taken was 8,984 barrels, of which 4,100 barrels were taken to London and West Kent, and 4,884 to Dublin and Dublin Bay. The average price at which they sold was 13*s.* a barrel, or £5,839 12*s.*

Since then, notwithstanding that the weather was very boisterous, and the boats of Arklow were occasionally empounded in their unfortunate harbour, the quantity taken was, up to the 30th April, 13,702, sold at an average of 17*s.* 9*d.* per barrel, making £12,148 4*s.*, giving a total for the last open season of eight months of 22,686 barrels, producing £17,987 16*s.* The barrel varies in quantity according to the size of the oysters; but generally runs to about 600. See Mr. Maher's supplementary report to that day, page 58, Appendix 7.

I have no doubt that if we possessed the same means of obtaining statistical information we could from Wexford, from Cork, and from Tralee, present an equally favourable picture of improvement. In the last place we have found the local magistrates most earnestly disposed to aid in rendering the assistance of the Coast-Guard Department highly valuable, and the consequence has been a considerable improvement in their bay. We still continue to permit an encroachment on part of the close season for purposes of brood only—at Clew Bay—the privilege has been complained of by some of the native dredgers, and we have given in extenso the whole of the evidence taken there on the 21st of January last, see Appendix, page 59.

The case stands over for further inquiry.

I have now only to request attention to a more than ordinarily comprehensive appendix, in which will be found, under various heads, the details of the several subjects most interesting to different persons, for the compilation and arrangement of which we are indebted to the intelligence and the industry of Mr. Brophy. We have neither concealed our deficiencies nor exaggerated our improvements, and whatever changes it may be judged expedient to make, I may be permitted, as probably my last words on this subject, to say that no public department was ever better disposed, faithfully and honestly, to administer the limited powers committed to their charge, and that in this large establishment, where the ordinary and especial duties are onerous and important, there is not a single individual who has not at all times evinced the most ready willingness to put his hands to the wheel, and to afford his unpaid services to the occasional advancement of the fisheries of Ireland.

APPENDIX No. 1.

SEA FISHERIES—GENERAL.

MEMORANDUM of a TOUR on part of the COAST. By JOHN P. BROPHY.

A Tour on part of the Coast.

I beg to submit, for the information of the Board, the following report as the result of observations made by me during a rapid tour of part of the coast of Ireland in September and October, 1868, on a duty intrusted to me by the Board's letter of the 30th of July last. Office arrangements did not admit of my leaving town until the 5th of September, on which day I went to Galway, and made that place my starting point northwards, in accordance with my instructions.

Galway.—The Claddagh, at Galway, more than any other place in Ireland, presents the most startling and painful picture of decline in the number, character, and appearance of the people. Before the famine of 1846 the Claddagh contained over 3,000 stalwart fishermen; now the number of men is not more than 200, and of these the great majority are old and decrepid. In fact, it would seem as if there were no intermediate state of existence between youth and old age—but it is a youth haggard and wolfish—an old age wretched and helpless. There are numerous causes for this decadence. The famine gave the first blow, from which these people never recovered. Ever since they have been always poor, half in and half out of the workhouse, no matter how abundant was the take of fish at times. Thrift does not usually attach to fishing occupations, and the Claddaghman was a most notable example of the want of it. One week or fortnight's scarcity of fish or bad weather, and, there being nothing to tide over the period, the nets and lines went to the pawn office, from which, of course, they could not be extracted without the amount of the loan, with interest. We can easily understand the result of this during the series of bad seasons, scarcity of fish, and the almost total disappearance of the herring, for which Galway Bay had been remarkable for some years. But that was not all. There have been, even when the supply of fish was most abundant, numberless instances of great distress and total ruin. In the midst of the plenty a man lost his boat or his gear, or his boat became unfit for further work, and then, there being no fund to appeal to, there was nothing between him and starvation but the door of the workhouse. To these physical causes there may, perhaps, be added others of a moral character, such as ineradicable ignorance, strong prejudices against improved modes of fishing, tenacity in adhering to absurd old customs as to time, place, and order of fishing; but it would be outside my present duty to do more than to allude to these points, upon which so much has been already said and written, without, as it appears to me, settling questions on which there has been a great conflict of opinion both as to theory and facts. There is, however, one thing patent, that the Claddaghmen have disappeared, but the fate of all has not been one of unmixed wretchedness. Many of the young and able-bodied emigrated to America: once a beginning was made in that direction the outgoing tide rapidly increased through the assistance forwarded by the successful, and I am informed that most of those emigrants, particularly about Baltimore, in the United States, have been very prosperous, and are still engaged in the old pursuit.

Boats.—There were formerly in the Claddagh from 100 to 150 boats of the large hooker class, half decked, about fifteen tons, and a vast number of the smaller class of about five tons—termed "pookauns"—the former are now represented by three, the latter by about sixty. The hookers were in many instances sold to strangers under the pressure of distress at a mere nominal price; but a purchaser was seldom to be had, and when the crews—generally consisting of one family each—were broken up by death or emigration, the boats rotted on the beach unclaimed, or were broken up for the purposes of fuel. There are now no traces of them, except five or six battered, rotten hulls lying at the root of the pier and in the new basin.

Supply of Fish.—But the question naturally arises, is the quantity of fish in the bay diminished? The last two seasons has proved that this is not the case. The supply has been almost abundant, and, in consequence of the railway, the prices have been vastly greater than they were in former years. The quantity of fish taken by each spiller and hand-line boat has been, I am informed, as great as in any previous year, while there have been thirteen trawlers of about fifty tons each constantly trawling in the bay, regardless of limits, and constantly taking such quantities of fish as to make this mode of fishing a source of considerable profit to the parties concerned. The hostility to trawling has died away—at least it is not manifested. There are Claddaghmen now working on all these trawlers, and in receipt of fair wages. The men of Aran, Barna, and the northern shore do not allege that there is a scarcity of fish, but they complain of their inability to obtain the proper boats and gear—that, in fact, is the principal cry.

The boats all through the Bay, with the exception of the Claddagh, are neither better nor worse than they were formerly. Of course, the crews are not near so numerous, arising from the causes which have equally thinned other parts of the country; but if those who are left behind were supplied with better fishing appliances, I feel convinced that they would be much better off than ever they were in the old state of things. All, with the exception of the Claddaghmen, hold to the land, either as small farmers, cottiers, or agricultural labourers—the latter in spring and harvest now obtain such wages (2*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* a-day) as to draw them altogether away from fishing during these periods.

Herrings.—The herrings have again made their appearance in Galway Bay, as on most parts of the west coast this year, and the quantity captured was considerable; but though the visit was a short and unexpected one, it has created amongst the fishermen new hopes for the next year, and relieved much depression for the present.

Pier.—The pier at Spiddal will be a great boon to the fishermen on the north side. Its plan and construction are spoken of in the highest terms by all who have seen it and are capable of appreciating a work of the kind.

Oysters.—The fishermen about Oranmore, Kilcolgan, Claren Bridge, Ardfry, and Tyrone, chiefly confine themselves to dredging for oysters, by which they make a fair living. The public oyster-beds in these localities are very productive, and the oysters are chiefly sold for laying on the Clare beds. Much satisfaction is expressed at the late bye-law prohibiting the removal of unsizeable oysters.

Licensed Beds.—The licensed bed at Ardfry (Lord Wallscourt's) has been well and judiciously stocked, and there is every prospect of abundant produce, improved shape of oyster, and profitable return: that on the opposite shore in the same inlet (Mr. Athy's) has been left to stock itself, and is not even preserved. A considerable quantity of oysters has been laid down by the lessee of the Island Eddy bed (Mr. Redington's) and the results are considered satisfactory, both in growth and appearance. An attempt has also been made by Captain Lynch to render his bed prolific, but the shore is too exposed, the seaward wash too great, and the oysters deposited have, to use a familiar, but in many cases an importantly expressive phrase, "changed their residence."

Galway to Clifden.—From the north-western point of Galway Bay to Clifden, there are no fishermen properly so called, and no fishery of commercial value. There are boats in sufficient number for the coast population, but they are employed for other uses than fishing; they are as good as, if not better than, the boats of former years, many of which are still in use, but there are no traces of those which have ceased to be used. They are only occasionally employed in fishing with hand lines to obtain a supply for the families of those who use them. They are, in summer, almost altogether engaged in the carriage of turf, and the collection of seaweed for kelp—an occupation which the men find much more profitable than that of fishing. In the spring and harvest the people devote themselves to the cultivation of the land—either their own land or as labourers on the land of others.

Herrings.—The bays of Cashla, Kilkieran, Bertraghboy, and Roundstone, were formerly the busy scenes of an abundant herring fishery. The herring has not appeared there for several years past until this year, when they showed for a short time; but there were no means of taking them, as the nets had disappeared in their long period of disuse.

Lobsters.—This part of the coast is particularly favourable for a lobster fishery, and there is a considerable quantity taken, brought into Clifden, and despatched thence to Galway for Dublin; but the lobsters are only sought for in a desultory way, and in the intervals of other occupation. I am convinced that that fishery could be prosecuted with great profit and advantage, even in connexion with other pursuits, while the inexpensive nature of the appliances necessary takes it out of the category of those fisheries which are stated to have declined from want of boats and gear: the boats are available, and the ordinary ozier lobster pots are within the reach of the poorest.

Oysters.—The Law Life Society possess a very extensive and valuable oyster bed to the west of Bertraghboy Bay; it is claimed as a prescriptive bed, is managed by an English oyster cultivator, and I am informed that the oysters sold off it last year, realized no less a sum than £5,000, and afforded employment to a considerable number of women and children.

Licensed Bed.—The bed licensed to Colonel Forbes in Mweenish Bay, was abundantly stocked by him in 1862 and 1863, and the oysters grew and multiplied in a remarkable manner; but he was obliged to leave home for a considerable time in 1864, and on his return he found the bed totally cleared of the oysters, old and young, by the people in the neighbourhood.

Mr. Kendall's beds at Mannin and Ardbear have been stocked at great expense, and I understand give promise, both by growth and spatting, of a profitable return. I could not learn that anything has been done with the other beds in that locality.

Piers.—The state of the fisheries between Cashla and Clifden being such as I have described, it is needless to talk of piers and landing places from a fishery point of view, and taking into consideration the requirements of the Acts which regulate the building of fishery piers. The pier at Roundstone is a fine piece of work, in excellent condition, and is of great advantage to the locality for landing of seaweed, and shipping turf, potatoes, and other produce of the country; that of Kilkerran is also very useful for the local trade.

Clifden to Louisburgh.—Between Clifden and Louisburgh the persons who take the fish are more of the fishing, and less of the farming class, than in the two districts through which I have already passed, that is to say, they fish with greater constancy (Galway Bay excepted) and more for the supply of the local markets; but they also have their patches of land, and are in no way different from the class of persons who caught the fish and supplied the markets previous to 1846. No doubt they are less in number, owing to emigration and the vast increase in the price of labour; but their fishing appliances (nets, hand-lines, and spillers), and their boats, are as good as, and in many cases better, than before 1846.

Supply.—It is said generally that the fish have become comparatively scarce upon this coast, but I am of opinion that that statement is made from a comparison of the total quantity of fish sent into the markets—the diminution of takers being overlooked—rather than from a measurement of the quantity taken by each boat.

Boats.—The boats are good and well found, and the fishing is pursued with as much energy and perseverance as it ever will be by a population who, not being totally dependent on it for their subsistence, will only go in pursuit of fish to no great distance from home, and where the circumstances are most favourable and most exempted from hardship.

Shelter.—The physical features of this part of the coast, its protecting islands, its well-sheltered bays—Clifden, Ardbear, Ballinakill, Barnaderg, and Killary—its piers erected, or in the course of erection in these bays, afford to this part of the coast better shelter and security for fishing boats than exist on any part of the west coast. Hence, as may be expected, the fishing is more constant, and the kinds of fish more varied.

Herrings.—The herring has also been always more or less constant in its visits; it appeared this year in considerable quantities, but not for a long time, in the bays I have mentioned; and when it appeared the people had not, as in other places, to stand idly upon the shore. The nets were ready, and the capture commensurate with the influx.

Oysters.—There is a fair public oyster fishery, for its extent, in Ballinakill harbour; and I understand that the oysters put on the ground licensed to Mr Archer have improved in quality, and increased in size and number; but the other licensed beds in the bay have been simply left to such results as would accrue from the exclusion of the public. Nothing has been yet done by Mr. M'Keown towards preparing and stocking the bed licensed to him in Killary harbour; but from the inordinate growth of mussels in this harbour, the base being one compact mussel bed of unknown thickness, I do not think that any attempt at oyster culture, within reasonable limits of expenditure and maintenance, would be attended with success. I recommended Mr. M'Keown to look out for a market for the mussels, which it is quite practicable to obtain, and when obtained, I suggested that he should kill the two birds with the one stone—clear his bed for the oysters, and put money in his pocket for the mussels.

Clew Bay Oysters.—Of the coast comprising Clew bay, Achill, Blacksod bay, and Broadhaven, there is little to be said, except with regard to the oyster fisheries, which, in a commercial point of view, have been improving from year to year, and are now the principal source of wealth and industry on the whole of that coast. First, as to Clew Bay: Some of the men say they do not take so much oysters now as they did five or six years ago, but in making this statement they do not take into consideration that, bulk for bulk, and no counting shells and rubbish, they take far more marketable oysters, and in better condition, of better shape, and more easily convertible into perfect oysters (if there be such things), than they did at the time referred to, and other previous times. Formerly, and up to five years ago, before the English buyers came into the bay, the number of dredging boats was not half as great as at present, while the price obtained for the oysters was about one-fourth the present price.

The present price per buddaghaun of six stone, or about 300 oysters, is six shillings paid to the dredger. There have been about seventy boats dredging for the licensed beds within the bay since the first of July, and the average earning of each, containing two men and a boy or girl, has been about three pounds per week. The average take has been about three buddaghauns per day, per boat, and that upon a bed on which, at the end of last year, the take was reduced to about one stone (equal to one shilling) per boat, per day.

There are three buyers at present, but the season for dredging generally does not commence until the 1st of October.

The number of boats dredging last year was about 800; about the same number will be at full work at the beginning of November. Those who advocate the necessity of constantly dredging for the purpose of cleansing the beds, and destroying the enemies of the oyster, point to this—to the increased quantity taken each year, and to the prices paid—as a proof of the truth of their theory.

Licensed Beds.—The bed licensed to Captain Austin has been continuously and judiciously stocked, and I understand with profit to the licensee. The oysters laid down are from time to time drafted to the Whitstable beds, when of the suitable size, and after about ten months of deposition there, they are sent into the market for consumption, and, I am informed, compete successfully with the best English oysters.

Nothing has been done for the cultivation and improvement of the other licensed beds, with the exception of that at Islandmore (Lord Sligo's), which was well stocked in 1865 by the Messrs. Baxter, the lessees; but I believe the ground has only since been used as a place of temporary deposit and collection for the mature oysters previous to their removal to the English beds or English markets. There are, therefore, several licensed beds in Clew Bay barren of that good to the public, which the Commissioners have always had in view in the allocation of public ground to private individuals.

Boats.—The character of the boats in the bay, Clare Island excepted, is improving, and their number has considerably increased in late years, and as compared with 1846. The corragh has disappeared; there are five or six hookers, of from twelve to fifteen tons, collecting the oysters taken at different points—formerly there were none of that class—the rest are yawls, square-sterned, of a large size, improved build, and better found for the oyster fishing as compared with those formerly employed.

White Fishery.—The white fishery (herring excepted) was never very productive, and was only pursued as a precarious source of supply for the fishermen themselves and the local markets. It is now at as low an ebb as ever, and scarcely deserves the name of a pursuit, except so far as the Clare islanders are concerned; but they are in a rapidly declining condition, owing to want of means to procure boats and gear suitable for fishing outside the bay, seaward of the island, where it is believed the sea abounds with the finest fish, in prime condition, in their proper seasons. This bay was always scantily supplied with fish. When the herring failed the poor Clare Island men were deprived of their chief means of subsistence, and their boats and gear gradually fell away; while the inshore men took to oyster dredging and farm labour.

Herrings.—Until the present season the herrings had not appeared in the bay for eighteen years; now (September) they and the mackerel literally thicken the waters—the sea-birds scream and swoop above them in myriads—but there is scarcely a single net in the whole bay. Those which existed were thrown aside to rot when the herring ceased to appear, because there was no apparent object to be gained by their retention; now the bay is alive with fish, and there is not a single net suitable for their capture. The few things that have been improvised, constructed out of all sorts of odds and ends, have made what, under the circumstances, might be called "miraculous draughts."

Cod.—There was also a large influx of cod in the early part of this year, for the capture of which by long and hand lines there was a moderately fair provision; but in this case, when the fish was caught in abundance and landed, there were no buyers for such an unexpected quantity; a man might load his boat, but could put but little in his pocket; the cod-fish became a drug; and though the locality was for a time benefitted by a supply of very cheap food, the fishermen did not derive a profit commensurate with their labour.

Fishermen.—The fishing is not pursued as the only occupation or means of subsistence of the men, who all hold patches of land or are farm labourers; very many of them, particularly those about Newport, and the shore round to and upon Achill, go to England every year for the spring and harvest work.

Piers.—There is no deficiency of landing accommodation in Clew Bay that could be supplied by artificial means. The bottom bares to a very great distance from the land, even at half-tide, so that, except in one or two places, a useful pier could not be constructed except at vast expense; while, at and near high water, the boats can be beached with great facility upon a low inclined shore.

There is a fine pier and a good harbour at Old Head, near Louisburgh, which is only used for trading purposes; there are some small moles along the south shore that are never availed of by the fishermen. There is a quay at Westport only used by incoming and outgoing trading vessels, and the quay at Newport is applied solely to similar purposes.

Bofin to Killala.—The deep sea round from Bofin, the west of Clare Island, round by Achill, Blacksod Bay, the Islands of Inishkea, the Stags, and eastward to the entrance to Killala Bay, was formerly regarded as the most prolific fishing ground in the waters along the whole coast of Ireland; but it was never fished, except close inshore by the native population. It was the principal resort, in summer and winter, of the fine seaworthy boats from Skerries and Kinsale, which were able to stand the rough weather and heavy sea prevailing on that part of the coast. They cured the fish on shore, and carried their cargoes to Dublin and other markets; but the natives, then as now, were not regular fishermen, and only fished occasionally, when there were signs of great abundance, to supplement their other means, derived either from farming or labour. The Skerries and Kinsale men do not resort to this fishing ground now; not, I believe, because the fish are less abundant, but because they have found profitable fishing and trading nearer home, and less exposed to the risk and danger necessarily involved in the pursuit of fish on a coast so wild and harbourless.

Boats.—The boats, or to speak more properly, the corraghs and skiffs, and the gear, are of the same character as they ever were—very inferior; they are much diminished in number, in consequence of the great amount of emigration which has taken place on the whole of this seaboard; but there are no vestiges of the old boats.

Close inshore the fish are abundant, but the people are indifferent about catching them, except to the extent necessary to supply their own wants; and this, I think, is a state of things that will always exist here, unless the really productive ground outside be fished by strangers, as in former times: first, because of the absence of any stimulant to exertion, arising from the want of a market for the disposal of the fish at anything like a remunerative price; and in this respect the whole of this coast, from Achill Head round to Blacksod, Belmullet, Broadhaven, and to within a few miles of Killala, may be almost considered outside the pale of commercial civilization. Secondly, in consequence of the greatly increased wages obtained for agricultural labour, both in the locality and in England, whither great numbers of the population along this coast are in the habit of going for the spring and harvest work. Thirdly, from the want of proper boats and gear, which will never be supplied by the parties themselves, and which it is not at all likely, under the circumstances, that others will be found to supply on loan. Fourthly, because if even better boats were found, suitable for fishing in the really productive ground outside, their use would be necessarily very intermittent, on a coast scantily provided with proper piers and landing places; small light boats have the advantage of being easily hauled ashore where there is a beach, but those of large size can only exist, or at least be profitably employed, where there are suitable places for refuge, and the discharge of the cargoes.

Oysters.—The oyster fisheries round Achill, and in Blacksod Bay, are now very productive; the character of the oyster has been improving every year for the last five years, and the quantity taken has kept pace with the improvement. Up to five or six years ago, the Achill oyster was a very large, strong-flavoured, coarse fish, unsought for as an article of food by any except the country people; now it is eagerly looked for by the English buyers in Clew Bay, by whom I was informed that they last year obtained from Achill some of the "best samples" of oysters they had ever seen in this country. It would be idle for me to speculate on the cause of that improvement. One will attribute it to the increased amount of dredging within the past few years, thus cleaning the beds, destroying the vermin, and promoting a healthy growth in the oyster, by the removal of those things which placed the oyster in an abnormal condition; another to the establishment and cultivation of the private beds in Achill Sound, licensed to Mr. M'Cormick, Mr. Pike, and Dr. M'Hale. However that may be, the facts are that the dredging, of late years, has greatly increased, and that some of the private beds have been stocked with highly encouraging results, both as to growth and spatting. I am sorry, however, to say that the protection of these beds is a matter of great difficulty and expense, and also that the bye-law of the Commissioners, as to the taking of small oysters, is systematically and openly disregarded, and that small oysters and oyster shells are carried out of the bay in hooker loads, to be laid down at Clare and other places. The Coast Guard do all in their power to prevent this; but they are so situated, and the plans for the collection and shipping the oysters so ingeniously and rapidly executed, by hookers coming in in the night for the purpose, that the efforts of the officers at protection are fruitless. I believe nothing has been done for the cultivation of the beds licensed in Blacksod Bay.

Killala and Sligo Bays to Bundoran.—Of the fishery in Killala Bay, the coast to Knocknaree, Sligo Bay, Mullaghmore, and trending round to Bundoran, there is nothing to be said by way of encouragement looking to the past and the present; but the decline in the fisheries on this part of the coast is not wholly attributable to the decrease in the population, or the temptation of high wages in other pursuits. There has been no change for the worse in boats and gear; the persons who fish are of the same class as those who formerly fished, namely, those only occasionally employed in fishing to supplement either their other food or their other means of subsistence on the land; but taking man for man at equal times and in the same places, the quantity of fish now captured is far less than what it was formerly. The fishing population are of the same class as before, combining fishing and farming, and only taking to the water when they have nothing else to do, or when the fish come on the shore in abundance; but the quantity of fish which now set in on the shore and in Killala Bay is declared by all to be much less than it used to be, so much so that fresh fish is now a rare thing either in Killala or Ballina. There is no difference in the character of the boats, and the gear is such as might be expected where the supply of fish is scant, the pursuit only occasional, and merely taken up, not for market supply, but for the individual wants of those who engage in it. There are no traces of the former boats, but those which exist are not worse than those which preceded them. The herrings visited the bay this year, but owing to the want of both captors and appliances, the quantity taken was not sufficient for the local demand. There are three or four boats occasionally fishing out of Eniscrone, and the same number out of Pollacheeny, Cooanmore, and Portavand; and, no doubt, if there were sufficient fishing interests to subserve, piers at one or all of these places would greatly promote those interests, but as it is the erection of piers for fishery purposes would not be attended with commensurate advantage.

Sligo Bay.—In Sligo Bay there is one trawler from Rachley, about nine tons, which has been making a pretty fair take this year; another from Mullaghmore has come in occasionally, but quickly departed, not finding the catch remunerative. The whole fishery of the bay is confined to the one trawler from Rachley, and nine or ten small boats, about two tons, which are called into fishing action now and then, but chiefly only when the shoals of herrings set in as in the present year. But the flat fish taken by the trawl is hurried off to the Dublin market, while the local one is left to the luxury of salt herrings, of which there is a very abundant supply from Scotland and other places. As a strong illustration of the state of the fisheries and the supply of fish in Sligo Bay, I may mention that a store has been opened in Sligo by Mr. Petrie for the sale of cured herrings, cod, and salmon, all imported from Port Chaleurs, in New Brunswick, where Mr. Petrie has established a regular fishing colony, consisting of Scotch coopers and curers, under the direction of his sons, and living and working in houses built by them. He purchased two vessels, one of 300, and the other of 600 tons, and these convey the freshly cured fish from New Brunswick to Sligo, where the demand for the article exceeds the supply. Of this foreign fis[h] he sold last year, 5,000 barrels of herrings, 10 tons o[f] cod, 100 barrels of pickled salmon, and a large quantit[y] of cod oil. The herrings sold at about £1 per barre[l] of a size smaller than the Scotch barrel; the Ne[w] Brunswick barrels contained about 500 herrings each.

Boats.—There are no traces of the old boats, but thos[e] which now exist are good yawls of the Greencastl[e] build, and are much superior to those which precede[d] them.

The line-men attribute the scarcity of fish to trawl[-] ing within the bay. However that may be, the com[-] parative scarcity was at all events coincident with th[e] commencement of the trawling, and a bad feeling pre[-] vails in consequence.

Except the few who work the trawlers from Rachley and Mullaghmore, and a couple of boats' crews a[t] Rachley, Streedagh, and Milkhaven, the fishing i[s] pursued as an additional means of subsistence, or t[o] supplement the other food at their command.

Oysters.—The public oyster beds of Sligo and Drum[-] cliff Bays are very productive, but they get no fai[r] play—everything is swept off. The bed in Drumcliff last licensed to Sir R. G. Booth, has been let on lease to a Mr. Rice, who has laid down a large quantity o[f] oysters on the grounds.

Donegal Bay.—The bay of Donegal from Mullagh[-] more round to Teelin is almost altogether fished b[y] boats from the northern shore, which is pretty wel[l] sheltered, indented with numerous bays, and well pro[-] vided with landing places, natural and artificial. Th[e] fishery centres are Donegal, Mountcharles, Inver, Dun[-] keneely, St. John's Point, Killybegs, and Teelin.

The three boats at Mullaghmore generally trawl t[o] the west of that point, and in fact trawling may be sai[d] to be now altogether abandoned in this bay. There i[s] one boat sometimes fishes in the small bays within th[e] prohibited line, using a sweep net, so attached to th[e] stem and stern of the boat as to form a bag to the lee[-] ward, the boat running with its head to the wind this is said to act in the manner of a trawl, but it i[s] certainly not a trawl net in the generally received sense. The persons who used to trawl from the north[-] ern shore have left the country, and they sold thei[r] boats to strangers to get the funds for leaving. Fron[m] Mullaghmore to Bundoran there are not any boats, bu[t] at Bundoran there are three or four, the crews of whic[h] are exclusively fishermen. They are, however, very poor, unable to buy boats or gear, and can only b[e] called the servants of persons living in the town wh[o] own the boats, and divide the take with the fishermen. The fishermen on the northern shore are also farmers farm-labourers, and gatherers of seaweed.

There has been a great deal of emigration from thi[s] district, and to this cause alone the decrease in the boat[s] and men would seem to be attributable. The boats now employed are of a better kind than those formerly used the remains of which are strewn on the shore; bu[t] they are very badly found with nets and other gear. I do not, however, think this arises from a poverty consequent upon scarcity of fish,—though neither th[e] herring nor the sprat, both usually abundant in each year, had come in at the time I was there (20th Sep[-] tember), the take of turbot and plaice by the line[s] was very large, indeed; but when some good "shots" are made the fishermen usually take a little leisur[e] on land. But here, no matter what may be the supply of fish in the bay, there never will be an energetic prosecution of the fishery unless the fishing centres are brought within the reach of remunerative markets. No man will ever exert himself in fishing, or have any motive for exertion in a pursuit so exacting unless he is certain of getting a remunerative price for the pro[-] duce of his labour, and that can never be the case unless the produce is within facile communication with good steady markets, where the competitive buyers are nu[-] merous, and the demand generally equal to the supply.

Complaints are made by some few persons of the destruction of unsizable fish of all kinds by the use of seines, fished from and hauled in on the shore, near the Eask and Murveagh Rivers. It is said that, in fishing for sprats and herrings, vast quantities of small fish are destroyed by the seine they use, and are left to rot on the beach, or are turned into manure heaps; but they say that this could be to a great extent avoided by its being made obligatory on the fishermen to fish exclusively from the boats, and not from and upon the shore. I have reason, however, to believe that these complaints are made not with a view to the benefit of the sea fisheries, but solely for the still further protection of the salmon fry, in addition to the protection afforded by the Salmon Fishery Laws.

Teelin to Swilly.—From Teelin round to Lough Swilly the coast population has been very much diminished by emigration; the boats are therefore very much diminished in number, but not altered in character. They are small yawls and corraghs, which can be easily beached, and this a matter of necessity on a coast so wild and rugged, and so unprovided with landing-places. Where, however, there is shelter there is a small fishing community, who, although having small patches of ground, derive their chief subsistence from the sea. These fishing centres are Ardara, Dawros, Portnoo, Burton Port, Gweedore, Ballyness, Portnablahy, Dunfanaghy, and Mulroy. There are from ten to thirty boats in each of these places, and fishing is regarded as a pursuit, and prosecuted with industry, perseverance, and success in capture; but there is no remunerative market, and therefore no stimulant to energy, except the apprehension of want. The take may be as abundant as the most sanguine could expect, but the money results are small. The cadger appears on the scene, pays what he pleases (because there is generally a secret understanding among people of that class), and there the matter ends, without any commensurate profit or stimulus to exertion.

Fishing Company.—A few years ago the hopes of the people from Rutland to Dunfanaghy were brightened by the appearance of a small fleet of well-built, well-found boats, about sixty to eighty tons, attended by two steamers; they belonged to a company formed in Derry, called the "North-West of Ireland Fishing Company." They established a curing-house at Portnablahy; they both fished, and bought the produce of the local men at fair prices; and fortune at last seemed to favour the industrious. But this was very short-lived. The take was an abundant proof of the fertility of the adjacent sea; but from causes not made public, and upon which it would not become me to offer a surmise, the company have ceased as a fishing company; their fine boats are now lying idle at the quays of Derry, and the steamers have been consigned to the tugging trade in the Lough.

Lough Swilly.—In LoughSwilly there is the usual decline in numbers, owing to emigration, but the boats are of a somewhat better character. Trawling has been practised here as long as the memory of the oldest can reach. There are now eight trawlers constantly working, in the Lough, and their crews live entirely by fishing. The small boats called "Druntons," exactly similar to the Norwegian skiff, are used by men who have small farms, or who are agricultural labourers. There are no traces of former boats in the Lough. The fish taken is generally sent to Derry from Fahan by railway, and the quantity so sent this year is about a fair average.

The supply of oysters has greatly decreased; but for this the fishermen themselves are alone accountable; for they have for a number of years been taking all the oysters they could get, large and small, and sending them out of the bay.

Mr. Hart, to whom a large concession has been made with the consent of the owners of the adjoining lands, has set to the work of stocking and cultivation with great energy and skill. In consequence of the high prices demanded in Lough Swilly, he has been obliged to have recourse to Lough Foyle for his supply, and there he had no difficulty in obtaining a large quantity of young brood. The oysters laid down are progressing most favourably. Some that I examined exhibited a marvellous growth within a short period.

Pier.—If the proposed pier at Buncrana be erected, it will be a great advantage to the fisheries of the Lough, from its central position and proximity to the railway terminus. It will be within easy reach of the Ballymastocker men on the opposite shore, who are at present obliged at great loss of time and inconvenience to bring their fish up the Lough to Fahan, and there get it as well as they can to the railway station. It will be remembered that Fahan was one of the places at which it was lately proposed, in a memorial to the Commissioners, to erect a fishery pier, and the claims of Fahan were strongly put forward by the county surveyor. The Commissioners decided in favour of Buncrana. That decision has been accepted by all parties as the right one; and since its announcement, I am happy to say that the want of a landing stage at Fahan is now being supplied by the erection of a wooden structure, running out to about three feet at low water of springs. This is done at the joint expense of the Derry and Lough Swilly Railway Company, and of certain private individuals interested.

Malin to Port Kinnigoe.—The waters of the short stretch of Coast between Malin Head and the east of Port Kinnigoe were always remarkable for an abundance of fine fish, particularly cod, generally known as Malin cod. That fish still maintains its character, but it is stated that the supply has fallen off much of late years. Both from this cause and from emigration the number engaged in fishing are considerably less than formerly. The boats and gear are much superior to those of 1846, and though the take is not so abundant, it has been a considerable source of profit to the fishermen, who work upon the land when not engaged in fishing. There are no broken traces of the old boats, but a few of the boats remain in their integrity, and indicate the superiority of the new.

The principal stations at which the fishing is carried out are Malin, Glenegad, Culdaff, and Port Kinnigoe. All the fish is sent to Moville, where there is a constant market, and whence it is daily sent by steam to England. This proximity and constancy of market has the effect of securing to the fishermen a fair price for their produce; and corresponding effects are visible in the fact that the boats are good and well equipped, and in the appearance of the people, as contrasted with the inhabitants of the western shores of the county.

Lough Foyle.—The number of boats engaged in fishing in Lough Foyle may not be as great as before 1846, but they are of a better class, and the take by each individual not diminished. There are ten to twelve trawlers constantly fishing, and occasionally this number is increased by some of the Lough Swilly boats; but the lessees of the Salmon Fisheries have endeavoured to restrain fishing altogether, on the allegation that it is injurious to the Salmon Fisheries, either by preventing the run of that fish, or by its capture in the trawl. Some time since they obtained an injunction in Chancery against the owners of the boats, but the effect of this was evaded by the boats subsequently changing owners, either bona fide or under cover. However, there is much contention between the parties—one being designated poachers, the other, usurpers of a public right—and there has been a considerable interruption to trawling and dredging. I understand that an offer has been made by the lessees to give permission to the trawlers to fish outside certain limits on payment of a nominal sum each year; but the proposal was rejected, as involving the admission of a right which the public refuse to acknowledge.

Boats.—The small boats are those known as the "Greencastle yawls." They are fine, seaworthy boats, well suited for the Lough fishing. The present fishing population, like the former, are holders of land or tillers of the soil, but they fish with great energy and perseverance at the proper seasons, and the constant market at Moville, whence the fish is every day transmitted to England by steam-boats, secures prices for the fish which stimulate the energy of the men.

There are some of the old boats still employed, and serve as a standard whereby to estimate the superiority of the new. Those which from time to time became unfit for use were broken up and burnt.

Oysters.—The oyster fishery, for which the Lough was at one time so remarkable, but which, through over dredging was of late years reduced to absolute barrenness, has this year shown strong symptoms of revival. After a very long absence the Foyle oyster has again appeared in the Derry market in considerable abundance and fine condition; but I am sorry to say that the past experience has not checked the rapacity of those engaged in this fishery. From what I saw in the streets of Derry, and from the fact which I have already noticed of the facility of obtaining here young brood for the private bed in Lough Swilly, I believe that nothing in the shape of an oyster is too small to be shipped and exposed for sale. The ultimate decision in the case of the Irish Society and the applicants for oyster licences is awaited with great interest and anxiety, and the steps taken by the Board in the matter are spoken of in terms of high praise. I am satisfied, from the evidences of spontaneous resuscitation palpable this year, that if these licences be granted and the beds properly cultivated, and the removal of small oysters prevented, that Lough Foyle will become prolific in an extraordinary degree.

The eastern shore of Lough Foyle is a long, sandy flat, which bares to a great distance at every ebb. There are only a few boats belonging to that side, and they can be easily beached. The opposite, or Donegal shore is that which requires the landing and shelter accommodation; and there is no place along that shore so suitable for and so imperatively requiring a good harbour as Greencastle. It presents many natural physical advantages for shelter, and is easily made by the craft fishing on the outside banks. There is a harbour there at present which must have cost a considerable sum, but it is so filled up that it can only be made use of for entrance or departure from about the last quarter of flood to the first of ebb. I believe it is not placed where it should have been, and that the original design as to structure was never carried out in its integrity.

Magilligan to Tor Head.—From Magilligan, the north-east point of Lough Foyle, to Tor Head, in the county of Antrim, those who pursue the fishing are generally of the small farming class, and they do not in this respect differ from their predecessors. The fishery on this coast was never prosecuted by any great number of persons or with any great vigour, except, perhaps, at Ballintrae, Ballycastle, and off Rathlin. There are a few small boats at Portstewart, about eight or ten at Portrush, a like number at Ballycastle, and a few at Carrickarede; but the fishery can scarcely be said to be of any marketable value, nor was it, I believe, at any time. The coast is wild, precipitous, and not indented with creeks in which the waters might be calmed and shelter obtained, while the tidal run is very treacherous, particularly between Rathlin and the main, where the water is lifted at particular times of tide like a perpendicular wall. The existing boats are an improvement on the old, none of which are to be seen, either in whole or in part.

At Port Ballintrae, near the mouth of the Bush, there was formerly a small fishing community called into activity by the existence of a pier which was formed for trading purposes in the vicinity of some salt works, the manufacture of salt having been a long time ago carried out on a large scale on the north and north-eastern coasts of Antrim. But the pier was swept away some years ago, and the fishermen shifted to Larne, where there was similar accommodation provided for the most part for a similar purpose. They soon, however, gave up fishing for other more profitable occupations.

Tor Head to Black Head.—From Tor Head to Black Head, the western point of Belfast Lough, there is very little fishing, except at Red Bay and Glenarm, where, there being some shelter, the fishing is carried on with some vigour, and proportionate success; but along this coast the sea fishing can never offer much temptation to its prosecution—first, because the race of the tide is so rapid and sudden that no gear could stand; secondly, because from Cushendun round to and at Larne, there is a large carrying trade in limestone, or more properly, chalk, of which all the cliffs are formed, and in iron ore, and this affords an abundant source of employment, both in getting the material in the quarries and mines, which abound on this coast, and in attending to the loading and unloading of the boats. The places I have mentioned presented a busy scene of industry when I was there; there were numbers of large vessels taking in their cargoes, and the crews of the boats which occasionally fish were mixed up with the general body of workmen. Where there is any fishing, the persons who engage in it are also farmers or labourers; the boats and gear are just the same as of old.

Belfast Lough.—In Belfast Lough there is a decided falling off of late years, both in the number of persons employed in fishing, and in the quantity taken by each. Except the men working the trawl boats, all those engaged in fishing are farmers and farm labourers, who fill up their other occupations with fishing. The number of boats has decreased, but there are still too many boats for the size of the lough and the supply of fish. There are sixteen boats constantly trawling outside the boundary, and inside whenever they can, while the bay inside the trawling line is almost always thickly dotted with the line fishing boats.

The comparative scarcity of fish is attributed to three causes—first, excessive trawling about the mouth of the lough, by which the large and small are taken on their entry; secondly, the constant disturbance of the water by the great number of steam-boats passing to and from the town; thirdly, the greatly increased amount of sewage matter discharged into the lough, owing to the vastly increased population of the town. These reasons account sufficiently for the scarcity, and the scarcity of the supply would be a sufficiently obvious cause of the decrease in the number of men; but superadded to that, there is the steady absorption of the young people who might be inclined to the pursuit of fishing into the various industries which have grown up and developed on a gigantic scale in Belfast and the surrounding places.

Donaghadee.—Looking at the harbour alone, one would expect to find Donaghadee the gathering place of numerous fishing boats, but this is not now the case, owing partly to the rapidity of the tidal current which sets down from the channel between the Copeland Islands and the mainland; but in a still greater measure to the desertion of the fish from the Rigg Bank, south of the Copelands, which was formerly famous for the production of the finest turbot and soles. The cessation of the run of fish on this bank is attributed to the disappearance from it of those small crustaceans which constituted the food of the fish; and this appears to have been caused by the gradual deepening of the bank by the rapid tide. There are now but a couple of boats occasionally fishing with lines at Donaghadee, and there are not any vestiges of those which formerly existed.

Donaghadee to Strangford.—The whole coast of Down from Donaghadee to Strangford, including Strangford Lough was, in distant times, largely resorted to, not only by the local boats, which were very numerous, large, and chiefly half-decked, but by the English, Scotch, Skerries, and Rush boats; and the fishing was principally for herrings. Lately, however, the fish of all kinds have changed their ground, and shifted farther south. The number of boats have in consequence of that, of emigration, and of the large extension of the linen trade throughout the whole county, considerably decreased; but those that remain differ in no way from those that have been withdrawn, which, I understand, in many cases were bought back by the Manx men from whom they were originally obtained. The principal fishing stations are Millisle, Ballywalter, Ballyhalbert, Cloghy, Quintin, Tara, and Strangford Lough; but the boats from these places seek the fish in the more southern waters off Ardglass, and go to swell the numbers which of late years make that place their summer quarters during the herring season.

Ardglass.—Ardglass is one of the oldest fishing stations on the coast of Ireland. Long anterior to 1846, which is the year of comparison in this memorandum, the adjacent waters were every year thronged with the Manx, Scotch, and Skerries boats; and the town itself possessed a number of fine smacks and yawls actively engaged in the herring fishery in summer and autumn, and in fishing for cod and haddock in winter and spring. But about 1846, all this activity was paralyzed by the almost total disappearance of the fish, and poverty took the place of abundance. The boats were disposed of, and the few of the larger size that remained were turned to the coasting trade. This dearth and inactivity, with their inevitable results, continued until 1863, when, as at Howth, the herring returned in its former abundance. Then the carrying boats were restored to their former uses, new yawls were purchased, and the fishing was pursued with its wonted energy. Since this revival there have been from 300 to 400 boats, most of them Scotch and English, engaged each year in the summer herring fishery. The amount realized on the quay in 1864, was £14,600; in 1865, £21,500; in 1866, £19,000; in 1867, £22,000; and up to the end of September in the present year, £28,000, and the supply still in abundance. These, as I have said, are the prices obtained for the fish landed and sold upon the quay; but in addition there was a large quantity of fish carried away direct from the fishing ground, of which no account could be taken. Two steamers from England and one from Scotland, attended the greater part of the season for the purpose of conveying the fish away to Liverpool, Holyhead, Workington, and Glasgow; and many of the Manx boats also carried off their own cargoes. Besides, there were several buyers from across the channel, from Belfast, Antrim, Armagh, and Skerries, who constantly bought and transmitted their purchases to their various destinations. But the fishery off Ardglass will never be fully developed until an improvement is effected in the harbour, on which a large amount of public money has been expended, and which improvement is really an object of national interest. About 200 feet of the eastern pier has been carried away, and the outer extremity of what remains is in a tottering state, and only saved from destruction by wooden wedges.

The town of Ardglass has not yet recovered the depression under which it lay for years. There is no stir of life or trade; the houses are untenanted, and everything presents the appearance of torpidity and milldew.

There are eleven fine smacks, of about twenty-five to forty tons, belonging to the place, and an equal number in the adjoining harbour of Killough, which affords good shelter, but dries at half-tide. The boats' crews, of both places, are composed of men who are engaged in farm labour when not fishing.

Newcastle.—There are thirteen yawls, three men in each, constantly fishing with long lines at Newcastle; the men have no other occupation, and make a fair livelihood by it; but the prices paid for the fish are generally very incommensurate with their value, and vary with the number of buyers who present themselves on the arrival of the boats from the fishing ground, which is close in-shore. On the morning of my visit there were but two buyers; each boat had from fifteen to twenty dozen of prime fish, consisting of turbot, britt, plaice, and flounders, and the most obtained for any boat's take was one pound, which was less than a penny for each fish. The boats are better and more numerous than in 1846; and the rapidly approaching railway communication with Belfast will soon supply a remedy for the present want of market.

Annalong.—Annalong contributes five good smacks, Manx built, to the fishing total of the Down coast, and does a large trade in the carriage of granite from the neighbouring quarries. The fishermen are also farmers; and the boats are about the same in number and character as they were formerly. The harbour is a curiosity in its way; and, instead of the "Harbour of Annalong," it more properly deserves the designation of the "Annalong Puzzle," and the operation of entry or exit must be something like that of threading a very fine needle with a very coarse thread.

Kilkeel.—Kilkeel has risen to great importance as a fishing town within the last few years; its boats have increased in size and number; it is close upon the most productive fishing ground, and is largly frequented by the strange boats for the sale of their produce, and the purchase of their provisions, which they obtain at reasonable prices, and without that extortion which is generally practised in places resorted to by fishermen from other countries. When the pier, now in course of erection, is completed to the extent demanded by its importance and necessity, Kilkeel will, from its physical circumstances and the industry of its inhabitants, become one of the most wealthy and busy of the second-class towns on the east coast. Already it is rapidly extending itself, and the whole place presents the unmistakable appearances of material prosperity.

Carlingford.—Carlingford Lough was never remarkable as a fishing place, except for oysters. The supply of round fish has been falling off somewhat of late years; but the boats have increased in number and improved in character, as compared with 1846. Some of the old boats, at least some of the old square-stern build, still remain; but the Greencastle yawls are in the great majority.

The supply of oysters has greatly increased since 1846, when the bay was literally denuded of them by over dredging. For the last four years there have been from 200 to 400 boats constantly dredging during the four open months, and the smallness of the take, at the end of the season, attests the exhaustive nature of the work. The average produce of each boat last fishing season may be taken at £40, or £10 to each man of three, and £10 to the boat; this gives a gross total, for, say 300 boats, of £12,000. The bye-law against the taking of small oysters has been vigorously carried out by the Constabulary, and enforced by the magistrates; but every possible opportunity is taken to violate it, through the insatiable greed for present gain which has always characterized the fishermen of Carlingford.

None of these men depend solely on fishing for a livelihood; they all work on the land, and some make a good living in summer by conveying people across the lough, and carrying the numerous pleasure parties who repair to Warrenpoint and Rostrevor every season.

Licensed Beds.—The oyster beds licensed to Mr. Woodhouse, near Omeath, on the southern shore (fifty-four acres) has been leased by him to a Mr. Pettigrew, from Scotland, on a twenty-one years' lease, with a clause of surrender every three years. The lessee has set to work with vigour and skill. The bed is in progress of stocking with oysters, both from the lough and from Arklow; they are in excellent condition, and are growing rapidly. As the whole bed bares at low water of springs, and a great portion at every ebb; Mr. Pettigrew is constructing, at considerable expense, two large ponds, on the principle of the French "claires," in which the water will be always maintained and kept under control by means of sluices. I am sure that this will be a great success, and that the results will have an extraordinary effect upon the productiveness of the bay.

Lord Clermont's bed, south of Carlingford, is also thoroughly stocked. The young brood laid down last year are progressing most favourably, the new growth of shell being bright and clean, and the numerous boulders and projections of rock are covered with oysters of two and three years' growth. There are evidences here of an abundant spatting last year, and the oysters taken all through the bay showed that this spatting was general.

Dundalk Bay.—The fishing in Dundalk Bay is carried on by boats from Cooley Point and Giles-quay, on the north, Soldiers' Point, Black Rocks, and Annagassen, on the west, and Dunany Point, on the south. About sixty or seventy boats fish for herrings in the bay, and the line boats are of the same kind, though, of course, not of the same number as in former years; some of the old boats still remain. The take is about the same, but of late the herrings run in greater abundance. On the morning of Saturday, the 3rd October, the market of Dundalk was overstocked, and had been so for some time; the fish, as fine as I ever saw, selling by retail, at three pence per dozen, and large quantities going off to the Dublin market. In consequence of the bye-law the trawlers have disappeared, and have taken up their berth at Balbriggan.

Clogher Head and Balbriggan.—There are three or four trawlers at Clogher Head, and fourteen or fifteen at Balbriggan, of about twenty-five tons each, and they pursue the fishing as successfully as ever they did; while, in consequence of the railway communication with Dublin, they obtain far better prices than in former times. The line-boats are more numerous and of a far better class than formerly, and the fishermen pursue their calling as their general means of gaining a livelihood.

APPENDIX.

A Tour on part of the Coast.

Skerries.—Skerries was always remarkable for its fine wherries, and the bold and adventurous character of its fishermen, who followed the fish into every water, and found a home on every coast. It is still the most important fishing village on the east coast—Howth and Arklow alone excepted—and maintains its former character for fine, sea-worthy boats, and adventurous crews. There are forty fine fishing boats belonging to Skerries, ranging up to sixty and seventy tons, besides a great number of other vessels which do a large amount of coasting and cross-channel trade in various commodities, but particularly in limestone, of which there is close to Skerries one of the finest quarries in the three kingdoms. But neither Skerries nor Rush will ever have its resources properly developed, whether as a centre of trade, or a rendezvous of fishing vessels, until an improvement is effected in the harbours, both of which become dry at low water.

I did not call at either Malahide or Howth, for obvious reasons; the former is not an important fishing place; and the weekly statistics furnished from the latter supply all the information which it is desirable to obtain.

In conclusion, I may remark as noteworthy that this year the herrings, in fine condition, both summer and autumn, have been more generally, equably, and largely distributed round the coast than in any year within recollection; and coupled with that is the curious coincident circumstance that the herring fishery was a partial failure on the coast of Scotland, and a total failure at the Isle of Man, usually the most productive of the English herring fisheries.

From all that I have seen, and comparing the present year with that immediately preceding 1846, I have come to the following conclusions:—

1. That, the Claddagh excepted, the boats and gear generally have not deteriorated, but, in many instances, have improved in character.

2. That the answers of the Coast-guard—"no improvement in boats and gear"—must not be taken generally as meaning deterioration, but to convey that the boats and gear are neither better nor worse than they were during the three preceding years.

3. That the decrease in the numbers engaged in fishing, and the gradual diminution taking place from year to year, are the natural and necessary results of emigration; largely increased scale of wages paid for unskilled labour, unattended with so much hardship and risk; absorption of the young into other industries in the vicinity of manufacturing centres; the want of proximity to steady and remunerative markets; and the poverty, absence of energy, and uncertainty which must inevitably follow from such a state of things. Where there is no motive to industry the people will not be industrious or energetic; and there never can be such a motive where there are not markets which give a fair price for the produce of the fisherman's labour, and compensate him for the wasting toil and exposure which are inseparably connected with the active pursuit of fishing. Let the markets be given, and all other improvements will follow—activity and perseverance will take the place of indifference—money will be forthcoming for boats and gear—and the fisheries will soon rise to that importance and extent which will command the erection of the piers and other accommodation so much needed on the coast.

Office of Public Works,
30th July, 1868.

SIR,—I am directed to inform you that the Board are desirous of obtaining, as far as possible, reliable information on the state of the Sea-coast Fisheries in general, and in two points in particular, referred to in the Report for last year, viz., the causes of the diminution in the numbers of boats and fishermen, as deduced from the annual records, and as to what was the character or description of the boats which have been withdrawn from the returns, and what has become of them.

You are, with the view of collecting that information, requested to undertake a tour of the seaboard, taking for your instruction the series of queries circulated annually to the Coast-guard officers, and more especially to those queries added last year.

You will also—as far as circumstances will admit, but as a secondary matter of information—endeavour to obtain information in regard to the Oyster Fisheries, and to the measures which have been adopted by persons to whom licences have been granted for the formation of private beds, as well as their general prospects.

It will be desirable that you commence your inspection and inquiry on the west coast—taking Galway as your point of departure, and proceeding northwards.

You should from time to time report your address (to be) to the Office, so that there may be as little uncertainty as possible in your receiving letters from the Board.

(Signed,) E. HORNSBY, Secretary

J. P. Brophy, esq., Office of Public Works.

Queries for Registering Officers.

1. What appears to be the general condition of the fishing establishment in your district compared with last three years, as to boats, gear, &c.?

Is there any sign of improvement within the last year, and what are the present prospects?

Is there still a spirit of emigration prevailing, or would the fishermen, if fully employed, remain at home?

2. Has the last year been more or less productive in the take of fish, than the preceding, according to the general opinion, and taking into consideration the several modes of capture?

3. What is generally the state of the oyster fisheries in your district; are there any great natural banks upon your shores or in the estuaries; are they improving in supply or otherwise; have any new natural banks been lately discovered; have any steps been taken to stock the ground where licences have been granted by the Commissioners for the establishment of private beds? What is the general quality and price of the oysters, whether from public or private beds?

Can you form an idea of the quantity sold within the year?

4. Have any curing establishments been formed within your district, or any attempts made to cure the fish, or is the fish sold in the fresh state?

Does any curing establishment at present exist within your district, or have any ice-houses been established?

5. Have the instances of conflicts between persons pursuing different modes of fishing been more or less frequent this year than the last? If there have been collisions, what is their cause, and what would you propose to obviate them?

6. Are the general habits of the fishermen in your district at present orderly and peaceable or otherwise, and are the able-bodied men among them generally employed in fishing?

7. Is the registry of vessels within your district perfect; or can you favour the Commissioners with any suggestions for a more improved system of registration?

8. Does the practice of trawling or the use of trammel set nets exist in your district, and where; and has it been the subject of any contention with the line fishers or others? And if you have formed any opinion on the subject of restraints upon those modes of fishing, be pleased to state them.

9. What is your opinion in regard to the effects of trawling on the general fishing interests, and state your reasons for such opinion.

10. If trawling is practised, what are the tonnage and number of the boats so engaged, what is the size of the mesh, and in what depth of water is the trawl usually worked?

Is the number of trawlers greater or less than in the preceding year?

What are the tonnage and number of boats employed in seine, trammel net, and line fishing?

Is the fish captured by the trawl sold in the local markets or sent to distant places?

Is the fish captured by the seine, trammel net, and line sold in the local markets or sent to distant places?

11. State the kinds of fish captured in your locality by the trawl, and the kinds captured by the seine, trammel net, and line, and the periods when each kind prevails and is taken in best condition. Also the periods when found in the worst condition.

12. Do you know where, in what depths, and on what kind of bottom the fish are believed to deposit their spawn?

13. By what means do you think the most accurate statistical information could be had, periodically, as to the quantities of the different kinds of fish taken, and the disposal of it within your district?

14. Are there any suggestions or general observations with which you may be disposed to favour the Commissioners, with reference to the improvement of the fisheries, or the better preservation of peace and good order?

Additional Queries.

1. Looking to the vast disparity in number of fishing boats, men, and boys, stated to have found employment in 1846, &c., and those now stated to find employment, giving the numbers in each district, it is very desirable that it should be ascertained, from local inquiry amongst the seafaring or shore population, what is the cause to which the great falling off is ascribed; what was the character of the former fishing population; whether they pursued fishing as a means of merely adding to their other means of subsistence in conjunction with farming, or to supply the surrounding district or distant markets, or pursued it as their only or general means of gaining a livelihood.

2. Also the class of boats, their condition and fitments for the purpose of taking fish.

3. What has become of the boats, and are there any vestiges of them?

4. It is also very desirable that the feelings of the persons locally interested in the fisheries, as well as of the Coast-Guard officers, should be ascertained in regard to what is the cause of the depressed state of the fisheries and want of energy and perseverance on the part of the people employed in them, and in regard to what is required to give them new vigour and prosperity, and lead to their becoming a source of profitable employment to the population bordering the shores.

120	514	32	229	1,008	87	–	–	–	39	64	79	A slight decrease in number of boats; no sign of improvement. No emigration during past year; but some have gone to sea in the merchant service. Last year less productive in the take of fish than the preceding; but better prices have been obtained. No natural banks of oysters; private beds not licensed; supplied from Arklow—quality good—price 15*s.* per barrel; about £2,000 worth sold in Dublin during the year. No curing establishments or ice-houses; fish sold in a fresh state. No conflicts or collisions; fishermen generally peaceable; able-bodied men generally employed. Registry of boats perfect. Trawling nets at Kingstown and Dublin, but no trammel. Trawling exists without contention. Unable to give an opinion as to the effects of trawling on the general fishing interests. Boats vary from thirty to forty-five tons. Mesh from one to three inches. Number of boats employed in seine and line fishing, 120; tonnage, 230 tons. Fish captured by trawl, seine, and line sold in local markets. Fish taken by trawl consists of cod, flat fish, and gurnet; cod and flat fish by line; herrings by drift net; herrings in worst condition from November to May. Unable to say where fish spawn. Most accurate statistical information could be obtained as to the quantities of fish taken and the disposal of it by a person appointed for the purpose at each place. The fishery at Greystones would be improved by a small harbour. Falling off in number of boats, men, and boys, as compared with 1846, arises from haddock having left the coast about 1846, also increase of wages elsewhere. Dublin fishermen generally follow fishing as a livelihood—Greystones and Bray fishermen in conjunction with farming. Boats at Kingstown and Ringsend good. Those at Bray and Greystones are not so good. No vestige of the boats used in 1846. Depressed state of the fisheries arises from scarcity of fish, and from the boisterous weather of late years.	1
98	526	–	263	1,577	13	–	–	1	87	439	–	Condition of fishing establishment good. Boats and gear much the same as the last three years. No sign of improvement; prospects bad. No emigration. Take of fish less than in preceding year. General state of oyster fisheries good. All natural oyster banks; supply much the same. No new banks discovered since last year. No private beds. Quality of oysters good—sold at 15*s.* per barrel; 6,800 barrels sold. No curing establishment or ice-house. Fish sold in a fresh state. No conflicts or collisions between fishermen, who are orderly and peaceable. Able-bodied men generally employed fishing. Registry of vessels perfect. Trawling exists in Courtown Harbour. No contentions between parties pursuing different modes of fishing. No suggestion to make as to the restraints upon present modes of fishing. Trawling does not affect the general fishing interests. Trawlers, ten in number, from six to seven tons each; size of mesh, three and a-half inches, worked in from four to five fathoms of water. Number of trawlers less than in preceding year. Forty boats employed in seine and line fishing of from two to three tons. Fish captured by trawl sold in distant markets, that by seine and line in local and Dublin markets. Kinds of fish taken—sole, plaice, cod, salmon, trout, codling, pollock, flat fish, conger, and herrings. Fish in best condition from October to January, June and July. Fish spawn in Wicklow Bay from six to eight fathoms, on rough bottom. Best statistical information could be obtained from fishermen. Fisheries would be improved by a better harbour. At Arklow fishing is the sole means of gaining a livelihood; in other parts it is practised in conjunction with other pursuits. Cause of falling off in number of fishing boats, men, &c., is from the boats often being unable to get out from bar harbours. Boats small; condition good and well fitted. Boats converted into stone boats. No depression in state of fisheries.	2

Steps taken to stock the grounds for which licences have been granted. Quality of oysters good—sold at 5*s.* per hundred. Can form no idea of the quantity sold within the year. No curing establishment in district. Fish sold fresh. One ice-house in district. No conflicts; fishermen orderly and peaceable; able-bodied men generally employed. Registry of vessels perfect. Trawling and trammel nets exist in district, but have caused no contention; no additional restraint necessary. Trawling has no bad effect on the general fishing interests. Trawling practised by thirteen boats of twenty tons each; mesh usual size, worked in five to nine fathoms of water. No increase in trawlers since preceding year; 210 boats of one and a-half tons each employed in seine fishing. Part of the fish captured sold in local markets, part sent to Dublin, and part to Liverpool. Turbot, brit, sole, plaice, skate, and gurnet taken by trawl; salmon, sole, herring, gurnet, codling, bass, and mackerel by seine; cod, hake, &c., by line; mullet, bass, &c., by trammel. It is not known in what depth or on what bottom the fish deposit their spawn. Statistical information relative to the fisheries could be had by the appointment of an inspector. By the erection of a fishery pier in the south bay of Wexford, and the improvement of that at Kilmore, the fisheries would be improved, and fishermen would not be anxious to return to shore in uncertain weather, and more capital would be invested. Number of fishermen increased by sixty during past year. Those who keep small boats pursue farming as well as fishing. Boats continue to be of a better class. Fishermen possessing much energy and vigour are greatly wanted on this coast.	3
305	1,115	24	339	1,240	37	1	–	–	–	–	1	No improvement since last year as to boats, gear, &c. Condition much the same as last year. Present prospects dull. Fishermen not particularly inclined to emigrate if employed at home. Take of fish about the same as preceding year. Modes of capture little altered. One natural oyster bank on the decline. No new banks discovered. Private beds stocked at Rinnishark and Tramore, and doing well; the oysters do not breed to any extent in these places. Quality good—price, from public beds, 5*s.* per hundred; from private beds, 5*s.* 6*d.* per hundred—6,000 sold from public beds, 4,800 from private beds. No curing establishments; fish sold in a fresh state. Ice only used by the fishmongers in Waterford. No conflicts; fishermen very quiet and well behaved; the men are generally employed when practicable; at other times a great portion employed in agriculture. Registry of vessels perfect. Trawling practised at Fethard, Arthurstown, and Dunmore; trawling and trammel nets at Tramore. No contentions. No restraints on modes of fishing necessary. Considers trawling injurious to the general fishing interests, owing to the number of small fish and spawn it destroys. Thirty-four trawlers engaged, from six to forty-two tons, each using a mesh of from two to six inches, working in from five to fifty fathoms of water. One trawler less than in preceding year; 198	4

												boats engaged in other modes of fishing; sizes vary from two to five tons. Fish sold in local markets. Plaice, sole, turbot, and brit taken by trawl—in spring best condition, in winter worst; mackerel, herring, and sprat by seine—in autumn best condition, in spring worst; hake taken by trammel nets—best in autumn, worst in spring; cod, ling, haddock, pollock, hake, and conger—best in autumn, worst in spring. Large fish deposit their spawn in banks in comparatively deep water, flat fish in shallow water, and all in clear sandy bottom. Statistical information could be had by the appointment of a person for that purpose. No suggestions to make for better preservation of peace and good order. In 1846 there existed two classes of fishermen on this coast, viz., the bona fide fishermen when the years became bad were unable to sell their fish, and consequently unable to keep their boats and gear in repair, and had either to sell them or let them fall to pieces; those who could sell emigrated—this class fished for local markets. The second class pursued fishing in conjunction with farming; part of the fish cured for themselves and part sent to local markets. The first class boats too small, and not adapted for deep sea fishing. The second-class boats in good condition. Several of the old boats sold out of the district, others broken up, and a few hauled up useless. Cause of depressed state of the fisheries is want of capital to enable owners to procure superior boats and gear, also from the natives getting more profitable wages in large towns, &c. The formation of companies who would provide a better description of boats and gear, and give them on shares, would be an advantage in giving the fishermen vigour, and prosperity would follow.
180	935	17	220	1,191	18	9	27	3	–	–	–	No improvement. The present condition of fishery far from prosperous. Fishermen would emigrate if they had the means, but are in general too poor. Last year less productive—little fish taken. No oyster fishery; good natural banks at Dungarvan, but not worked. No new banks discovered. A licence has been granted to Mr. J. Dower of Dungarvan, but the ground is not stocked. Mr. Boate has taken some ground, but has not stocked it. No curing establishments or ice-houses in district. Fish sold in fresh state. No conflicts; fishermen orderly and peaceable; able-bodied men generally engaged in fishing. To make registry of vessels perfect, a person whose special duty it would be to look after it is required. Both trawling and trammel fishing exist between Helvick Head and Knockadoon. No contention. No opinion to offer as to restraints upon those modes of fishing. No opinion to offer as to the effects of trawling on the general fishing interests. Tonnage of trawlers varies from thirteen to sixteen tons—size of mesh four and a half inches from knot to knot, which are worked in from twelve to fourteen fathoms of water. Number of trawlers same as preceding year. One hundred and eighty boats engaged in other kinds of fishing, varying in size from one and a half to five tons. Where there is no railway the fish is sold in local markets. Turbot, plaice, and sole taken by trawl; hake by trammel; herrings and sprat by seine; cod and ling by line. Flat fish best in summer; others in winter; cannot tell at what depth fish deposit their spawn. To obtain statistical information, it would require the observation of some one whose duty it would be to supervise this matter specially. Good order prevails among the fishing population; the fisheries will improve when the state of the country encourages enterprise and capital. The falling off in the number of boats, men, &c., employed arises from emigration and want of capital. Twenty-six years ago the fishing population same as at present; those employed in small boats pursued fishing as a means of adding to their subsistence in conjunction with other employment; those in hookers to supply distant as well as home markets, and, as a general means of gaining a livelihood. The boats employed are open four to eight oared, in fair condition, and only used for seine fishing and drifting for salmon. No vestige of old boats, decayed and used for firewood. The depressed state of the fisheries arises from want of capital chiefly; but the natural qualities of energy and perseverance are, it is believed by the officer, generally wanting.	5
171	639	6	186	713	6	–	–	–	18	15	16	Fishing establishment declining, except at Ballycotton, where an improvement is visible; but the general condition is unsatisfactory. Prospects of fishermen bad. Spirit of emigration still prevails, which could not be easily checked. Take of fish less than in preceding year. Oyster fisheries very indifferent. Natural beds exist in Queenstown harbour and its creeks—the supply of oysters decreases. No new banks discovered. Three licensed beds in the Ballinacurra river have been stocked. In other parts the general take is small in quantity and quality. Boats seldom take more than 50 to 100 per day; average price 5*s.* to 10*s.* per 100; cannot tell the quantity sold within the year. No curing establishments or ice houses in district. Fish sold fresh. Neither conflicts nor collisions have taken place to any marked extent; the fishermen are orderly and peaceable. The men farm as well as fish. Registry of boats perfect; no suggestion to make. Trawling exists in the harbour, and outside it also; no contention in consequence. Only two trammels used outside the harbour. Trawlers should be forbidden from interfering with or running among line fishers. Trawling is generally believed to disturb and kill the spawn, and should be only practised under restrictions as to depth of water, &c. Trawling is carried on by thirteen boats, from fifteen to twenty-five tons; size of mesh about five and a half inches, worked in from six to ten fathoms and at times up to twelve fathoms of water. Number of trawlers rather larger than last year. One hundred and ten boats engaged in other modes of fishing, varying in size from one to two and a half or three tons. Fish captured by trawl sold principally in Queenstown; that by seine, trammel, &c., in the case of a large take, sent to a distant market; but as a rule, no farther than Cork. Plaice, sole, flat fish, turbot, and dory, taken by trawl; herrings, pollock, bream, mullet, flat fish, sprat, and mackerel by seine; pollock and hake by trammel; bream, whiting, hake, and conger, by line; and at times ling and cod. Fish generally best July to September; bad in the spring. Fish deposit their spawn in from twelve to eighteen fathoms water, on sand and rock. Statistical information could be best obtained from the fish markets at Cork, Queenstown, Midleton, and Cloyne; but particularly from Queenstown and Midleton. Suggests for improvement of fisheries better shelter for boats at Ballycotton. It is generally thought that the number of steam ships going in and out of Queenstown harbour have frightened the fish. Scarcity of fish arises either from the presence of steam ships or other unknown causes. It is believed that the fishers used to be more thoroughly fishermen than now. In Ballycotton there are some men who do nothing but fish; in the rest of the district they combine fishing and farming. Boats seem to improve at Ballycotton; otherwise the condition and fitments are of an inferior order; old boats broken up, and either sold or burnt. Bad success has, no doubt, dis-	6

												heartened the people very much. If a small shelter harbour were constructed at Ballycotton, it would be appreciated there, and very likely lead to its being a good fishing station.
271	1,425	55	309	1,680	59	–	–	–	71	352	55	Condition of fishing establishment at Kinsale improved in size of boats and quality of gear; in other places no improvement. A marked improvement at Kinsale within the last year; in other places none. Present prospects not favourable in consequence of bad weather. A strong spirit of emigration prevails at every station with the exception of Kinsale; believes the fishermen would remain at home if fully employed. Take of fish less than preceding year, with the exception of mackerel at Kinsale, which was more productive. One or two small natural oyster banks in district; but not productive. No new banks discovered; no means taken to stock the ground or licences granted. Quality of oysters fair; price varies from 4*s.* to 5*s.* per 100; no idea of quantity sold, which is very small. Four curing establishments exist at Kinsale; also one ice house. No conflicts between parties pursuing different modes of fishing; fishermen orderly and peaceable. Registry of vessels perfect. Trawling exists at Kinsale, Courtmacsherry, and Robert's Cove; trammel set-nets at Courtmacsherry and Kinsale; no contention on the part of the line fishermen in consequence. Trawling in shoal water is very injurious to fish, as it destroys the spawn and small fish; in deep water it does not much harm. Trawling carried on at Courtmacsherry by two boats of fourteen tons each, in from three to seven fathoms; at Kinsale by three yawls, about twenty tons each, in from six to seven fathoms. Number of trawlers same as preceding year. At Kinsale, twenty-nine hookers of 669 tons, and eighteen yawls of 45 tons are used in other modes of fishing. At Courtmacsherry eighty boats, from three to four tons each. Fish taken sold at local markets. Herrings, mackerel, pollock, sprats, and sand eels captured by seine; ling, cod, conger, hake, haddock, bream, and whiting by line; cannot say in what depths or what kind of bottom fish deposit their spawn. The most accurate statistical information could be had by appointing an officer, who would be constantly visiting each fishery station for that express purpose. No suggestions to offer with reference to the improvement of the fisheries. With the exception of Kinsale, there are very few fishermen in the district who live entirely by fishing, unless the weather is fine they seldom go to sea. In 1846 there were more men who depended on fishing than now. Four and six oared yawls are those employed in fishing, they are well fitted and adapted for fishing. Numbers of wrecks of the old fishing boats are in most of the creeks and harbours along the coast. Depressed state of the fisheries arises from scarcity of fish and bad weather. Hake, haddock, and cod have been decreasing for the last seven years; other kinds are also scarce, except mackerel, which last year was very plentiful.	7
535	2,296	159	547	2,376	168	–	–	–	3	203	18	Fishing establishment of district in a very bad condition. No improvement in class of boats, gear, &c. No prospect of improvement. A spirit of emigration prevails; but some of the fishermen about Cape Clear and Long Island say they would remain at home if fully employed. Last year less productive in line fishing; more productive by seine net. During some of the autumn months great quantities of pilchard, scad, and pollock were about the coast, but the fishermen do not like to shoot their seines amongst pilchards, as they say that the oil rots their nets. They do not know the use of pilchards. A gentleman informed the officer that he saw a take of 5,000 pilchards, which the fishermen buried in the sands as worthless. Oyster fisheries in a very poor condition. A natural bank exists off Crookhaven, but not worked; and some beds at the mouth of the river Ilen, from which a few oysters are taken. No steps taken to stock the ground where licences have been granted. Quality of oysters good; price in Skibbereen, 5*s.* per hundred. Cannot tell quantity sold. Curing houses exist at Crookhaven; no ice-houses. Fish generally sold fresh in local markets, or cured for local use by fishermen. No conflicts; the fishermen are orderly and peaceable; no regular fishermen in the district; they work at agriculture also. Registry of vessels perfect; cannot suggest a better system. Trawling exists in Ross Bay and Long Island. Trammel set nets in the bays and creeks along the coast, and they have not been the subject of any contention. There should be no restraint upon any mode of sea fishing, except in narrow waters, and then merely for the sake of order. Trawling does not affect the general fishing interests if trawlers keep clear of the long lines and set-nets; knows this from practical experience as Naval Superintendent of Fisheries on the Scotch coast. Trawling practised by about thirteen boats of about 260 tons, using a mesh of three inches from knot to knot, working in from five to twenty fathoms of water. Number of trawlers same as preceding year. Tonnage of boats employed in other modes of fishing varies from one to three tons. Fish captured by trawl sold in Cork and local markets: that taken by other modes sold in local markets. Turbot, sole, plaice, skate, and haddock taken by trawl; mackerel, pilchards, scad, pollock, mullet, and sprats by seine; hake by trammel; bream, codling, conger, haddock, and whiting by line. All kinds of fish best in the autumn The fishermen of Long Island Bay say that there is a great deal of spawn deposited upon the sea-weed there, in about four or five fathom water. Statistical information as to the quantities of the different kinds of fish taken, &c., could be had by the officers of the Coast-Guard. If mussel beds were laid down in convenient localities, the winter-fishing would be greatly improved. Order among the fishermen excellent. The cause of the falling off in the fishing may be ascribed to scarcity of fish, and consequent inability to procure proper boats and gear, to emigration and poverty. The former fishing population are stated to have been more industrious than the present; they were half farmers and half fishermen. Very few of the present boats are fit to go outside the headlands; they are not well fitted for want of capital. None of the old boats left. The spirit of emigration is strong among the young men, and few remain at home who can find money enough to emigrate. Depressed state of the fisheries arises from emigration, want both of capital and a thorough knowledge of the fishing trade. The officer says—"Having served for three years in command of Her Majesty's ship Jackal as Naval Superintendent of Fisheries on the west coast of Scotland in connexion with the Scotch Board of Fisheries, I concur with Commander Jones that an appointment similar to that would be extremely useful on this coast."	8

The able-bodied men are employed in fishing and farming. Registry of vessels perfect. Would recommend a distinction being made between boats used as bona fide fishing boats and those only occasionally used. Trawling and trammel nets used without contentions between Bere Island and Whiddy Island. Trawling not injurious to the general fishing interests. Trawling carried on by two boats of about thirty tons, with mesh from one to six inches, worked in from twenty to thirty fathoms of water. Trawlers occasionally come from other places. Number of trawlers one less than preceding year. 204 boats engaged in other kinds of fishing varying from one to seven tons. The choice fish caught by trawl sent to Dublin; coarse fish sold in local markets, as well as that captured by seine, trammel net, and line. Sole, turbot, brit, plaice, and several coarse fish taken by trawl; scad, mackerel, herring, and mullet by seine; hake by trammel net; hake, cod, ling, haddock, &c., by line. The fish taken by trawl in prime condition from November to May; other fish in good condition from May to November. The opinion is that there is no spawning ground in the district. Statistical information respecting the fisheries could be had by frequent local inquiry. Can offer no suggestion with reference to the improvement of the fisheries. The cause of falling off in the number of fishermen, &c., arises from emigration and poverty. Boats and gear in a wretched condition, and crews not to be had for one-third of the registered boats. Fishing pursued formerly in the same manner as at present. About 100 of the present fishing population pursue fishing as their chief means of gaining a livelihood; the remainder rarely employed. Trawlers in good condition; seine boats in fair condition; 194 boats occasionally used in very bad condition. Old boats broken up. Depressed state of the fisheries arises from emigration, poverty, and latterly from scarcity of fish on the coast.
536	2,908	402	542	2,938	408	–	–	–	–	–	–	No marked difference in boats and gear since last year. No manifest improvement. Take of fish rather less productive than preceding year. The spirit of emigration fluctuates according to reports received from America. Oyster fisheries limited. No great natural banks; no new banks discovered. No steps taken to stock the ground where licences have been granted. Quality of the oysters good—sold for 6*d.* per dozen; quantity sold not easily ascertained. No curing establishments in the district; the fish taken are either sold fresh or cured by the country people. No collisions; fishermen peaceable. Registry of vessels perfect. Trawling not practised. There are forty boats engaged in seine fishing of 240 tons; 496 in trammel and line fishing of 1,000 tons. Fish captured by seine, trammel net, and line sold in the local market. Hake, cod, haddock, dog-fish, plaice, and skate captured in the locality. Fish deposit their spawn on a clean sandy bottom at various depths. Knows of no other system of obtaining statistical information than through the Coast-Guards. The fisheries may be improved by the formation of companies in which the fishermen should hold shares as an incentive to diligence and a guarantee for fidelity. As regards the decline of the fisheries, the opinion generally entertained is, that the fish of the various sorts have deserted this part of the coast. Dog-fish are found to be on the increase, and it is supposed that they have caused a decrease in the better class of fish, especially haddock. Many of the fishermen farm as well as fish. The people are indigent. No change in the class of boats used. Old boats worn out. The depressed state of the fisheries arises from want of capital.	10
72	428	20	78	446	24	14	74	13	–	–	–	Very little improvement in the boats and gear within the last three years; the fishermen are well off, and do not care to improve their boats or gear; very little improvement. Very little emigration at present; all the employment the men could get would not prevent it. Fish very plentiful, but the weather very bad. Very large demands for oysters this year from Kenmare, Templemore, and Sneem—about 10,000 sold per week, varying in price from 5*s.* to 10*s.* per hundred. No curing establishment or ice-house in the district. No conflicts between persons pursuing different modes of fishing; fishermen orderly and peaceable. Registry of vessels perfect. The trawlers seldom injure the trammels as they fish in different places. Can form no opinion as to the effects of trawling on the general fishing interests. Six vessels engaged in trawling, varying in size from ten to twenty tons each, with a mesh of six inches, and worked in from five to three fathom water. Two more trawlers engaged this year than preceding. The boats employed in seine, trammel net, and line fishing vary from three to four tons. Some of the fish captured by trawl sold in the neighbourhood, and some in Dublin and Cork; that captured by other modes of fishing sold both in the neighbourhood and in Dublin and Cork. Sole, plaice, john-dory, salmon, hake, pollock, and whiting captured in the locality. Cannot tell on what kind of bottom fish deposit their spawn Correct statistical information relative to the fisheries could be had by employing proper officers and paying them for their labour. Cannot suggest anything for the improvement of the fisheries. The fishermen were badly off in 1846; now they are well off, and only fish for adding to their substance. None of the old boats in existence. Yawls are now only employed. No vestige of the old boats.	11
200	800	100	200	800	100	–	–	100	5	20	–	A general falling off in every way as regards boats, gear, &c. No sign of improvement; prospects bad. No emigration at present; but the fishermen are doing very little—they are principally employed in farming, &c. Last year less productive in the take of fish than any year for a long time, except for scad, large quantities of which were taken. No oysters taken in this district, nor any banks attended to. No oysters sold within the year. One small curing establishment in district; the fish are sold in a fresh state—at times small portions are cured. One ice-house exists at Killorglin for salmon. No conflicts; fishermen most peaceable; the able-bodied men employed in fishing and farming. Registry of vessels correct; but a paid agent is much required. No trawlers or trammel nets in this division. Trawling is injurious to spawning fish inside of headlands. 200 boats employed in seine, trammel net, and line fishing, varying in size from two to four tons each; most of the fish so captured sold on the spot. Ling, cod, and hake in best condition from January to April; worst condition in summer. Ling and cod are supposed to spawn on sandy bottom in fifty fathoms of water; flat fish and hake spawn more in-shore. Correct information relative to fisheries could be had by having a paid agent, and one who could at the same time instruct the poor ignorant fishermen to improve their gear, &c. Thinks trawling inside headlands injurious to fisheries on the coast. If loans on fair security were granted, the fishermen would improve their present boats and gear. Small companies on the co-operative principle might be established.	12

												Fishing is falling off every year owing to the fish of the different kinds becoming more scarce; boats and gear are getting worse. Boats bad, and in general kept in bad repair. Some of the old boats have fallen to pieces, and some are used in collecting sea-weed, and for fishing at times. The general opinion of the officers and men is that the depressed state of the fisheries arises from dearth of fish on the coast, want of quick conveyance to market, and want of general prosperity in the country; and most of the people find ample employment of late years in farming, as the fishing has become very bad and unremunerative. The population has been greatly reduced by constant emigration for many years.
140	560	–	156	636	6	–	–	–	–	–	–	General condition of boats and gear fair. No sign of improvement. Emigration still prevails; the men would remain at home if fully employed. Capture of fish about the same as preceding year. No oyster fishery in district. No curing establishment or ice-house. The fish captured are dried on rocks, walls, &c. No conflicts between persons pursuing different modes of fishing; the general habits of the fishermen quiet and peaceable; the able-bodied men are generally employed in fishing. Registry of vessels perfect. Can suggest no improvement in system. Trawling and trammel net fishing exists in Dingle bay. No contention between those pursuing different modes of fishing. There ought to be a close season. Trawling is the most productive of the various modes of fishing. Trawling carried on by vessels of twenty-five to sixty tons; mesh three to seven inches, worked in twenty-five fathom water. Number of trawlers same as last year. Canoes are used in seine, trammel net, and line fishing. Fish captured by trawl sent to Dublin; also that taken by other modes of fishing. Soles, turbot, brit, plaice, and coarse fish taken by trawl; scad, mackerel, herrings, and pilchard taken by seine; hake by trammel net; hake, cod, ling, haddock, &c., by line; fish in best condition from 1st November to 1st May; worst from May to November. Fish spawn on stony ground in shallow water. Best statistical information could be had by the man in charge of the boarding boat, who boards all the fishing vessels on their return. Can suggest nothing for the improvement of the fisheries, or for the better preservation of peace and good order. The great falling off in the fisheries since 1846 is attributed to emigration; the population then pursued fishing for their own subsistence, and for supplying distant markets. One or two of the old boats still in existence. Depressed state of the fisheries arises from poverty and natural indolence. To give vigour and prosperity to them, a better class of boats, gear, &c., should be provided.	13
24	60	12	47	120	22	–	–	–	–	–	–	No improvement in boats or gear; no sign of improvement. Emigration prevails to a small extent. A slight improvement in the take of fish as compared with last year. The take of oysters better than last year. No licences granted. Quality of oysters good; sold at £1 per 1,000. About 915,000 sold within the year. No curing establishments or ice-houses. No conflicts between persons pursuing different modes of fishing; fishermen peaceable and orderly. The able-bodied men are employed in fishing only a few months. Registry of vessels perfect. No trawling or trammel nets used in the district; the fish are captured by hand lines. Can give no opinion as to the effects of trawling on the general fishing interests. Fish captured sold in the local markets. Cod, whiting, and mackerel, captured by line; fish in bad condition in November, December, and January; herring and sprat in fair condition in summer months to September. Fish spawn near the shore in sand and gravel in from one to two fathom water. Accurate statistical information could be had by the appointment of some local agent. The fisheries would be improved if loan societies were established, who would advance money at a moderate rate of interest. The officer finds that the number of boats was overrated in 1844. The falling off in the number of boats since that period is attributed to emigration, and to the fish having in a great measure deserted the coast within the last few years. The boats used vary from five to seven tons each of a very poor description, badly found in every way. Old boats broken up and used for firewood. The depressed state of the fisheries arises from want of means to enable the fishermen to carry out fishing in a more profitable manner.	14
197	648	30	197	648	30	5	72	–	–	–	23	Kilcredane station.—No alteration in boats and gear. No improvement, or sign of it. Emigration prevails, but does not seem to affect the fishing. Last year very bad in take of fish with the exception of a little herrings taken in September. One small oyster bank off Carrigaholt; the supply of oysters does not seem to improve. No steps taken to stock the bank; the few oysters taken are solely for the use of the proprietor. No curing establishments formed; fish sold in the fresh state; a few mackerel and herrings cured by fishermen for their own use. No ice-houses in district. No conflicts or collisions between the fishermen, who are orderly and peaceable. Can offer no suggestions for an improved system of registration. No trawls or trammel nets. Can give no opinion as to the effects of trawling on the general fishing interests. Canoes from half a ton to a ton employed, with nets and hand lines. Herrings are taken by drift nets; cod, ling, and skate by line; the fish taken are in best condition in February, March, and April. The chief impediments to fishing are scarcity of fish, rough weather, and a dangerous coast. Can offer no opinion with reference to the improvement of the fisheries. The fishermen pursue fishing as a means of adding to their other means of subsistence. The canoes used are in good condition. The cause of the depressed state of the fisheries is attributed to a dangerous coast and bad fishing ground. The return of fish at Cappa not so good as any of the last three years. Number of boats as great as any previous years. No sign of improvement owing to the want of gear and encouragement to fishermen. Fishermen would not emigrate if they could get employment at home. Take of fish less productive than preceding years. General state of the oyster fisheries in district bad; no natural banks. No new banks discovered; no steps taken to stock the ground where licences have been granted. Quality of oysters fair; sold at from 2*s.* to 3*s.* per 100. No curing establishment in districts; one ice-house. Fish captured sold in a fresh state. No conflicts; fishermen orderly. A great many of the able-bodied men not employed for want of means. Registry of vessels perfect. No trawling, line fishing, or trammel set nets in district. Seine boats engaged are about four tons each. Some of the fish captured by seine are sold in the local markets, and some sent to distant places. The salmon captured are best in the commencement of the season, and worst in the end of it. The falling off in the fisheries arises from scarcity of fish. The former fishing population were orderly, and pursued fishing both as a means of adding to their resources, and to supply the surrounding district. Second class boats engaged; fitments, &c., bad. Some of the old boats are broken, and some remain. The cause	15 of depressed state of the fisheries is want of means and men. At the Tarbert station the fishery establishment indifferent. No sign of improvement. Fishermen would remain at home if they could get employment. Last year very bad as regards the take of fish. General state of the oyster fisheries indifferent; no new beds discovered. Quality of oysters good; varying in price from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.* per 100. Three ice-houses in district—two in Glin and one in Foynes; fish sold in a fresh state. No collisions: fishermen orderly and peaceable. Registry of vessels perfect. Drift nets and hauling nets exist in district. Fifty-seven boats engaged in fishing, about two tons each. The fish taken are sold in the local market. The salmon taken from February to 1st June are the best; those taken from 1st June to 1st July the worst. Fish are supposed to deposit their spawn in the inland rivers. If the stake weirs were abolished, it is the general opinion that there would be more men employed, and that they would make a better livelihood. In 1846 stake weirs and bag nets were used; in 1863 these were abolished, by which the fishermen got more employment; since then they have been again erected, which has caused a reduction in the number of fishermen employed. Second class four-oared boats used, which are tolerably well equipped. Some of the old boats were sold. It is the opinion of the fishermen in the locality, that if the stake weirs were abolished fishing would become a source of profitable employment. From Farraghy to Bealnaglass no improvement in the fishing establishment. Emigration does not prevail amongst the fishermen. Take of fish more productive than preceding year. No oyster fisheries in the locality. No curing establishments formed; no ice-houses. No conflicts amongst the fishermen, who are orderly and peaceable; those employed in fishing are generally able-bodied men. Registry of vessels perfect. No trawlers or trammel set nets in district. The only boats used in line fishing are canvas corragh; the fish are sold when fresh in the local markets. Cod and ling are captured by line, principally from August to November, and are in best condition during those months; in worst condition from December to May. The best statistical information could be had by the officers of the Coast Guard stations in the district. Can give no suggestion with reference to the improvement of the fisheries or for the better preservation of peace and good order.

112	297	–	112	297	–	14	38	–	–	–	–	Fishing establishment on the decline. No sign of improvement; present prospects bad. A spirit of emigration still prevails; if the fishermen were fully employed many of them would remain at home. Last year far less productive in the take of fish than preceding year. No oyster fisheries in district; no natural banks. No curing establishments or ice-houses; fish sold fresh. No conflicts; fishermen well disposed towards each other. General habits of fishermen orderly; the able-bodied men are, to a certain extent, employed in fishing. Registry of vessels imperfect; it will be necessary to compel the fishermen by law to register and mark their boats. No trawling or trammel set nets in use. 112 boats (corraghs) engaged in fishing; gross tonnage about fifty-six tons. Fish captured by seine and line either sold to hawkers on the spot or in the immediate neighbourhood. Mullet are taken by the seine in November and December; cod, ling, haddock, and conger by spillards, from December to March; bream and pollock from May to September; mackerel, September to November; fish in best condition in their respective seasons, in worst condition at other times. Cannot say at what depth fish deposit their spawn. Owing to the irregular manner in which fishing is prosecuted, it would be impossible to get accurate information as to the state of the fisheries. With better boats and gear, and an energetic spirit, the fisheries might be improved. The great falling off in number of boats now, as compared with 1816 and subsequent years, is attributed to famine and emigration, most of the boats being sold to add to the means of those who suddenly found themselves without either boats or gear, and fled the country. It would appear that at no time did the fishing population pursue fishing as a sole means of subsistence. Canoes and corraghs generally employed in this district; in bad condition, but are best adapted to this wild and rocky coast. The old boats have totally disappeared. The depressed state of the fisheries arises from poverty, apathy, and a general feeling of insecurity as to the possession of their small holdings, and it cannot be disguised that disaffection prevails amongst the coast population. It is very difficult under these circumstances to suggest any means of improvement. If the fisheries could be vigorously worked with suitable appliances, they would be found a source of remunerative employment.	16
654	2,161	100	767	2,694	143	–	357	–	165	–	37	Fishing establishment on the decline; boats and gear in bad condition. No sign of improvement; prospects gloomy. The spirit of emigration still prevails; if the men were fully employed they would remain at home. Last year, on the whole, less productive than preceding year. The general state of the oyster fishery is in a flourishing condition. No new banks discovered. The beds granted to private parties have been lightly stocked. Quality of oysters good—sold at 6*s.* per hundred. No idea of quantity sold within the year. No curing establishments or ice-houses in district; fish sold in a fresh state. No conflicts; fishermen orderly and peaceable; able bodied men not generally employed. Can suggest no better mode of registry. Trawling carried on in Galway Bay; no trammel nets. A small degree of bad feeling exists between line fishermen and trawlers. Trawling does no harm, as there are as many fish taken by line as in previous years. Thirteen vessels engaged in trawling, of from thirty to sixty tons each; mesh, two and a-half to six inches, worked in from twelve to forty fathom water. Five more trawlers than preceding year. Boats from eight to ten tons employed in seine, trammel net, and line fishing. Fish taken by trawl sold in distant markets: other fish sold in the neighbourhood. Cod and ling are captured by line, and are in best condition from December to April; bream and pollock taken by trawl in best condition between June and September; turbot, sole, plaice, gurnet, and sundry other sorts of fish in worst condition from March to November. Unable to say in what depth fish spawn; but thinks in the bay on gravelly bottom from nineteen to twenty fathom water. It is impossible to obtain correct statistical information, the fish being landed on so many different parts of the coast. Can offer no suggestion for the improvement of the fisheries. There has been a general failure of the fisheries on the west coast of Ireland since the famine of 1847, for which no particular reason can be ascribed. The population of Claddagh fishermen has fallen away considerably since that period. The character of the fishermen was generally good; but they were very reckless and lawless towards those who would introduce any new mode of taking fish contrary to those established. The Claddagh men depended entirely on fishing as a means of gaining a livelihood; other fishermen in the bay fished in conjunction with farming. Hookers were employed in deep sea fishing. The old boats are nearly extinct; some were sold to other parties for trading purposes in the bay. The fisheries would be improved if loans were made to the fishermen to buy gear, &c.	17

452	1,961	–	488	2,074	–	19	827	–	–	–	–	Boats and gear good; boats are good sea boats, and well-formed. No sign of improvement, and no better prospects. Emigration still prevails; if the fishing were more profitable some would probably remain at home. Take of fish more productive than preceding year. Oyster fisheries small, but improving; one natural bank at Ballinakill harbour. No new banks discovered. Steps taken to stock private beds. Quality of oysters good, which are sold at from £1 to £1 6*s.* per barrel, 1,200 barrels sold. No curing establishments or ice-houses; fish sold fresh. No collisions; fishermen orderly and peaceable. The men only occasionally employed in fishing. Registry of vessels perfect. No nets of any description used in district. Four hundred and eighty-eight boats engaged in fishing. Fish captured either used at home or sold in the local markets. Bream, pollock, mackerel, and gurnet are taken in summer, cod and ling in winter. Fish in best condition at these seasons, and worst at other seasons. Fish deposit their spawn in from forty to fifty fathom water on bottoms of sand and shells. Information relative to the fisheries could be obtained by appointing persons to watch the local markets; but the quantity taken is so small it would scarcely repay the trouble. The fisheries would be improved if more capital were employed to supply a large class of boats that the fish might be followed into deep water. The great cause of the falling off in the fisheries is attributed to emigration and scarcity of fish. The former fishermen were employed in farming and fishing. Present class of boats very good, and well fitted. Many of the old boats still remain; many were used for fuel during the famine years. The depressed state of the fisheries arises from scarcity of fish. The people find farming and kelp burning more profitable than fishing.	18
200	603	26	216	628	32	–	–	–	10	50	3	Fishing establishment declining. No sign of improvement. No emigration. Last year less productive in the take of fish than preceding. Public oyster banks nearly worn out. No new banks discovered. Steps taken to stock private beds. No curing establishments or ice-houses; fish sold fresh. No conflicts; general habits of fishermen very orderly; able-bodied men occasionally employed in fishing. Registry of vessels perfect. No trawling or trammel set nets exist in district. Fifteen boats of thirty tons each occasionally employed in line fishing. Fish captured sold in local markets. Mackerel, cod, and ling are taken by line; they are best in July and August, and worst in October and November. Unable to say how the best statistical information could be had with regard to the fisheries. The falling off in the fisheries is attributed to emigration. The former population pursued fishing as an additional means of subsistence combined with that of farming. The present class of boats are first and second class, badly fitted out. The old boats are broken up. The present depressed state of the fisheries is attributed to the absence of any person to give employment.	19
180	700	20	182	706	22	–	–	–	34	174	8	General condition of fishing establishment bad; boats and gear less in number. No sign of improvement; present prospects not favourable. No wish to emigrate. A few go to England in summer and return again. If fully employed they would remain at home. Take of fish about the same as last year. Oyster fisheries good, and the take greater than last year. Quality of oysters good; about 400,000 sold at about 2*s.* the hundred. There is one natural bank; no new ones discovered. Mr. Pike has stocked his ground and redistributed the oysters. No new curing establishment. Part of the fish cured by the fishermen, the remainder sold fresh. One curing establishment managed by Mr. Hector. No ice-house. No conflicts or collisions. Fishermen orderly and peaceable. Occupation divided between fishing and farming. Registry perfect, but there is great difficulty in getting the boats marked and numbered. No trawling or trammel fishing. Three boats of two tons employed in seine fishing; 117 of one and a half tons in line fishing. Part of the fish sold on the island, the rest sent to distant places. Mackerel taken by seine in best condition from June to August. Cod, ling, coal-fish, and haddock best from December to March. Cannot say where or at what depths fish spawn. The cause of diminution in the number of fishermen is scarcity of fish, and partly emigration. Fishing now as formerly is pursued to add to other means of subsistence in conjunction with farming. The boats used are four-oared yawls; condition and fitments bad. There are some vestiges of the former boats. The scarcity of fish on the coast of late years is, in the opinion of the people, the cause of the depressed state of the fisheries.	20
178	589	30	178	589	30	–	–	–	–	–	–	Great falling off in boats and gear. There appears to be a general wish to improve, and this would take place, no doubt, if the fishermen had funds. There is not a spirit of emigration, but, on the contrary, several families have returned from America, and many who have emigrated would have remained at home if they had the means of carrying on their fishing. Last year far more productive both in number and condition of fish than for some years before. Mackerel were in great abundance, but quantities lost through bad gear. Large quantities of oysters dredged at Belmullet and Blacksod Bay, where excellent breeding ground exists. No new banks discovered. Licensed beds protected. Quality of oysters generally good. Sold at from 8*s.* to 10*s.* a barrel. No steps appear to have been taken to stock licensed beds. Cannot state quantity sold, as great quantities, particularly undersized, carried to Westport, Clew Bay, and Galway. No curing establishment. Fish taken to Ballina and sold fresh. Fishermen orderly and peaceable; no conflicts; fishermen all able-bodied. Registry perfect, and system good. No trawl or trammel nets. Trawling in Blacksod or Broadhaven would materially injure the small fry and spawn, and should not, therefore, be allowed. There are so many salmon rivers running into Blacksod Bay, that trawling would be most injurious. The boats average two tons. The greater quantity of the fish sold in Ballina, the rest in the local market. Cod, turbot, ling, haddock, bream, herrings, mackerel, soles, and plaice are the kinds of fish taken. The fish spawn in from thirty to fifty fathom water. Impossible to obtain information periodically as to quantities and kinds of fish taken, and how disposed of. The only possible way to improve the fisheries is by a new supply of nets and gear to a respectable class of men who would carry on the fishing, the supply to be made on the security of the landlords, payable as the Commissioners might direct. The great falling off in the take of fish arises from various causes, the principal being bad gear. The men farm more or less. The general opinion is, that there has not been on any part of the coast anything like the quantity of fish that there was in 1846. Fishing pursued as a means of adding to the subsistence derived from small farms. The boats generally used are corraghs, which are found best adapted for fishing. No vestige of the large boats, which were allowed to rot for want of means to keep them up.	21

												Want of money and gear and laxity of energy is the great and only cause of the depressed state of the fisheries. Those principally employed in them are very badly clothed and fed. Were these poor creatures assisted, a good deep sea fishery might be established, and poverty, with all its misfortunes and evils, would soon yield to the energy and perseverance of the fishermen.
207	931	–	209	936	1	25	171	–	–	–	–	Boats and gear about the same condition. No improvement; prospects good. Not much emigration. Full employment would not, it is thought, prevent emigration. Last year about as productive in take as the year before. Oyster fisheries bad. No curing house. At Porturlin it has happened that from 15,000 to 20,000 mackerel have been taken and detained there, as the road to the main road could not be traversed by horses. Fishermen peaceable and orderly. No conflicts. Fishermen able-bodied; very many only fish when prevented from working their ground. Registry perfect. Between Killala and Lacken corraghs are mostly used. The effects of trawling are bad as it destroys the small fry. Two vessels of twenty tons trawl in seven to eight fathom water. Number of trawlers same as last year. Two hundred and seven boats of 396 tons engaged in seine and line fishing. The fish taken by these are sold in the local markets and Ballina. The fish taken by the trawls is not sold—the trawl boats are pleasure yachts. Pollock, bream, mackerel, turbot, sole, plaice and gurnard best in the warm months; herrings best from September to November; cod from November to January. The fish spawn about six miles off the land on sand banks in about forty to fifty fathoms water. Statistical information best obtained by a person appointed for the purpose. Inability to purchase gear is the impediment to improvement. Fishing is merely added to other means of subsistence in conjunction with farming. In some places the old boats are lying on the shore rotting. Poverty of the people and inability to procure gear is the cause of the depressed state of the fisheries.	22
84	427	1	84	427	1	2	2	–	–	–	–	No improvement in boats and gear, nor any sign of it. Prospects bad. Most of the fishermen would emigrate if they had the means. No bona fide fishermen. The small quantity of fish caught is by farm labourers. Take much the same as last year. There are several private beds between Cullinamore and Ballyaclare, producing excellent oysters, which are sold at 5*s.* 6*d.* per hundred. The oyster fishery might be very much improved if the private beds were protected from undue fishing. Boats dredging in the channel encroach on the private beds, and destroy the buoys. No steps taken to stock the beds for want of protection. No great natural banks. No curing house; fish sold fresh. There is an ice-house for salmon near Ballisadare. No conflicts; fishermen peaceable. Registry nearly perfect. No trawling. About four boats employed in trammel fishing of about two tons each. Fish sold in local markets. Turbot, plaice, and brit caught by trammels; in best condition in August and September. Cod, pollock, ling, conger, and rough fish caught by long lines and spillers. Cod best from December to April. Statistics best obtained by the appointment of a person who would devoted his time to their collection. Formerly, as now, fishing was pursued in conjunction with farming. The cause of depression is in the fact that there is but little fish on the coast as compared with former years. The boats used are four-oared yawls, indifferently fitted. The former boats are broken up and destroyed. As there are no fishermen, and but little fish, and the present coast population are indifferent to fishing, it would be difficult to suggest what would give new vigour and prosperity to the fisheries. Should fish appear again in large quantities trained hands would be useful as instructors.	23
216	1,154	46	221	1,170	46	63	356	–	–	–	6	Boats and gear much the same in all respects. Prospects not hopeful. Only four new boats registered during the year. Emigration prevails; probably a prosperous fishery might keep the men at home. Take of fish less productive even than last year. Take of herrings was very small, and line fishing miserably deficient. On the whole, the oyster fishery is extending and improving. Several licences for new beds have been granted. All the beds have been stocked. No new natural banks discovered. In spite of the enormous quantities of oysters dredged in 1866-67 on the Cummeen natural bank, 200,000 small were sold from it this season for stock, and 10,000 for market. From Oyster Island 10,000 large; Lissadill, about 100,000. Is of opinion that if fairly and properly done the more regularly beds are dredged the greater the produce. The average price paid for the oysters was—for the small, 15*s.* per 1,000; for the large, 50*s.* per 1,000. No curing house; fish sold fresh. An ice-house for salmon at Ballyshannon. The only collision was in spring between a trawler at Rachley and the line fishers of Ballyconnel, who destroyed the trawl and damaged the vessel. The cause of this collision is jealousy and ignorant prejudice, and to stop such outbreaks the officer would encourage trawling and punish breaches of law severely. The general habits of the fishermen are peaceable, but in two localities the men are generally lawless and ill-disposed. Believes the registry to be as perfect as possible. Trawling carried on at Rachley, Mullaghmore, and Ballyshannon. Further experience alone will enable the officer to form an opinion as to the effects of trawling. Trawlers alone catch fish in remunerative quantities. Line fishers say they have caught no fish in Sligo Bay with decided profit since the trawler worked it. Off the Hosses Point station during last summer the Coast Guard took fine sole and plaice in good numbers by long lines, and never did so before for the last eight years. Whether the trawler drove the fish out of the bay to shelter in the harbour is an open question. Five trawlers of forty-six tons trawl in from three to six fathoms. The number of trawlers is greater by one than last year. Two hundred and sixteen boats of a total burden of 300 tons engaged in seine and line fishing. The fish taken by the trawl sold mostly in distant markets, that taken by seine and line in local markets. Turbot, plaice, sole, and dory taken by trawl; herrings by seine; cod, ling, haddock, whiting, mackerel, and flat fish of all kinds by line. Hake rarely seen. Fish in worst condition from December to April. Formerly it was generally believed that fish spawned in moderate depths, but where they really do deposit the ova is not very clearly established. Statistics would best be obtained by paying agents at certain points even moderate stipends to collect information, and report to registering officers. Large boats such as hookers are absolutely necessary for the improvement of the fisheries, but these could not exist without shelter piers, the boats to be furnished to responsible crews by the Crown or associated bodies, the piers to be built by the counties. No doubt the primary cause of the decay of the fisheries was the famine—hence emigration, poverty of landed proprietors, languishing of employment, depression and pauperizing of the people; lastly, the	24

												dispensations of Providence ordaining the astounding diminution in the quantity of fish and their disappearance from the coast. The former fishermen both farmed and fished. The boats used are a bad kind of small yawl, fished with hand lines and seines. A few specimens of the old boats remain laid up to rot. The sole means of rousing the fishing class from their apathy and listlessness, ignorance, and old prejudices would be to lure them by hopes of profit, to be gained only by large hookers enabling them to go to sea; encouraging skilled strangers, who must be efficiently protected from personal violence; to guarantee them a certain amount of wages whether successful or not. The officer believes that nothing less will effect a reformation, because, as a class, the fishermen are utterly devoid of enterprise, too listless, ignorant, and prejudiced to strike out anything new for themselves.
377	1,718	332	387	1,756	332	13	88	–	–	–	12	Boats, nets, and lines in very good condition, but no sign of any improvement. Prospects very indifferent. Still a spirit of emigration, and more would go if they had the means. Full employment would be a check to this and a great inducement to remain at home. Last year more productive in take of cod, ling, and glassen, but less in small fish, such as herring and mackerel. No oyster fishery. No beds, public or private. There is a curing establishment at Teelin for cod and glassen, and a good number of fish cured—the rest sold to the villagers. No ice-house. No collisions or complaints; the fishermen are a very peaceable and orderly people; all able-bodied men; only a certain proportion are fishermen, others are small farmers. Registry complete, no improvement needed. No trawls or trammels; 377 boats employed occasionally in seine and line fishing. Some of the fish sold at the curing house, the rest fresh in the local markets. Herring and mackerel taken by seine in summer; cod, ling, and glassen by line in January and February; in worst condition in March, April, May, and June. A small payment should be made to some local official to collect statistics. Suggested for the improvement of the fisheries that a small steamer should be stationed off the coast to assist in saving boats and nets during bad weather, and some local officer be empowered to offer small rewards for the greatest take of fish, as the fishermen require encouragement. The disparity in the number of boats, men, and boys, as compared with 1846, arises from the fact that for many years there has been and is a gradual decrease in the smaller kinds of fish, especially herrings, and consequently men are thrown out of employment. More would emigrate if they could. The character of the former and present fishing population is the same; they fish to add to their other means of subsistence. Boats, lines, and seines generally in very good order. The boats when they become useless are generally broken up and burnt. The falling off in the fisheries arises from the fact that the fish are by no means so plentiful as in former years. This scarcity has caused a want of perseverance. The decrease of fish has been gradual but sure. This statement is made on the authority of some of the oldest fishermen, who all agree on this point.	25
110	290	70	110	290	70	–	–	–	–	–	–	Little or no change in boats, gear, &c., during the last three years. No sign of improvement. There has been no emigration this year nor would there be at any time if there was employment; three months in the year there is none. Last year's fishing less productive than 1867, the weather being unfavourable during the fishing season. No oyster fishery. No curing establishment. Each man cures his own fish. There are ice-houses for salmon. No conflicts amongst the fishermen; they are orderly and peaceable. The majority of them are holders of small farms, and are consequently obliged to attend to their cultivation as well as to fishing. The registry of vessels is not perfect; it should be carried out for the district at Burton Port. No trawling; no seines or trammel nets. About 110 boats engaged in line fishing, of about two tons each. Can give no opinion as to trawling in regard to fishery interests. The boats used are four-oared yawls, which are in good condition, but fitments bad. Lobsters are sent by steamer to Liverpool, but owing to the uncertainty of shipping them, not more than one-fourth get safe to market. Part of the fish captured sold in local market; the rest cured by fishermen for themselves. Cod, ling, and haddock are taken by line, in good condition in February, March, and April. It is not known where the fish spawn. More accurate statistical information as to quantities, qualities, &c., of fish could be obtained by appointing parties for the purpose of collecting it. The number of fishermen is not diminished this year. They require funds to enable them to carry out their vocation to advantage. The falling off in the number of fishermen from 1846, is ascribed chiefly to emigration. The fishermen generally held small farms, but some of them gained a livelihood by fishing only. When boats become unfit for use they are allowed to fall to pieces. The depressed state of the fisheries is ascribed to emigration and the want of markets convenient to the fisheries. The boats at present in use are not suitable, on account of the roughness of the coast; it is not safe for the present boats to go far off, for the sea gets up in a very short time, with very little notice.	26
260	810	86	260	810	86	–	–	–	8	8	20	There was a falling off in the fisheries last year. Vessels employed by the North-western Fishing Company have been withdrawn. No prospect of improvement. No emigration. The take of fish not so productive as it was in 1867. Fish appear to have diminished on the coast—herrings in particular, of which scarcely any have been taken. No oyster fishery. The fish-curing establishment of the North-western Fishing Company at Portnablaghy not used this year; no other curing establishment. The fishermen cure some, but the fish is generally sold fresh. No conflicts among the fishermen; they are orderly and peaceable. The registry of vessels perfect. Only a few of the able-bodied men generally employed fishing. There has been no trawl nor trammel net used this year. The trawling last year was not prejudicial to the fishing interests. Skiffs two and a half tons each, and corraghs half a ton, are used in fishing. The fish sold in local markets. Cod, ling, and haddock are taken by line, December to April, in best condition. Flounder, sole, turbot, and plaice August to November in best condition. The fish spawn on sandy bottoms in three to five fathoms. More accurate statistical information on the subject of fisheries could be obtained by appointing paid persons at Dunfanaghy and Downies Bay. Fishing not likely ever to improve here. Bad boats and gear; also want of safe harbours. Dunfanaghy and Ballyness are bar harbours, and can only be crossed after quarter flood, and not then if blowing fresh and any swell. Want of good harbour a general complaint. The falling off of the fisheries is mainly ascribed to scarcity of fish, in consequence of which fishermen now turn to other employments, viz., farming. Fishing combined with farming is the general means of livelihood on the coast. Boats, not generally good; equipments bad; the boats mainly consist of skiffs and corraghs. There are at Tory and Inis-	27

												bofin Islands a few Greencastle yawls, good, and well adapted for fishing. Some vestiges of old vessels remain rotting on the strand. If boats and gear were to be supplied to the fishermen, to be paid for by instalments, it might lead to a better state of things. It is understood that the proprietor, A. J. R. Stewart, esq., of Ards, would be willing to assist if such a step were taken.
39	188	5	39	188	5	–	–	–	63	228	42	Boats and gear in the same condition. No sign of improvement. The fish appear to be getting scarce in the lough. Very little emigration, the men being fully employed in farming. Last year not so productive in the take of fish as the preceding. No oyster fishery. No curing or ice-house. No conflicts; fishermen peaceable and orderly. The able-bodied generally employed in fishing. Trawling is practised, but not trammel net fishing. Registry perfect. Trawling not considered in any way injurious to the general fishing interests. The fish caught by trawlers sent to Derry; those caught by line sold in the local markets. The kinds of fish taken are cod, codling, whiting, and at times plaice and ling. The fish are supposed to spawn on a sandy bottom in two and three fathom water. The best means of obtaining statistics would be by the fishermen keeping a rough tally and handing it over to the Constabulary or Coast-Guard each day. The former fishing population pursued fishing to help the farm, so that all able-bodied men were fishermen, and fished when there was no work on the farms; now that the farms have become larger, the men who formerly fished have been obliged to give it up, finding plenty of occupation on the farms. Second class boats in fair condition. The boats not now engaged in fishing are used for carrying purposes. By some it is thought that by doing away with the trawling the line fishers would increase, but the officer does not think it advisable to try the experiment, as the line fishers, being also mostly farmers, would fish just when they pleased, and demand their own price, and thus fish would become scarce and expensive.	28
293	1,465	–	317	1,537	5	85	242	–	–	–	9	Boats and gear much the same. Line fishing better. Fishing depends on the state of the weather, as this is an iron-bound coast and there are only a few boat-ports, and these not good. A few emigrate; but it is not thought that the fishing affects them. The take of cod more plentiful than in preceding year; other fish much the same. Salmon less, on account of prohibition of bag-nets and dry season. Oyster fisheries good in Lough Foyle, Lough Swilly, and about Magilligan Bank. There are natural banks at Rumaran Point and about Inch Island. Mr. Hart has stocked his bed in Lough Swilly, and the oysters both fatten and breed. A few oysters in Lough Swilly; but the fishing for them is not followed to any extent. Public oysters fair. The men state that in September they average 1,500 per boat in Lough Foyle; October, 800; November, 500; December, 400. Four-oared boats employed dredging Lough Foyle. Price of oysters, 4*s.* to 5*s.* per 100; small, 7*s.* 6*d.* per 1,000. A good deal of small sold to stock Mr. Hart's bed in Lough Swilly. No curing establishment at work. There is one at Moville, and one at Greencastle; but not in use. One established by the new Fishing Company given up in the summer of 1848. That Company failed, it is believed, because the boats were not worked on shares. Fish sold fresh and carried to Glasgow and Liverpool by steamers daily in summer, and twice a week in winter. No conflicts, except the servants of the lessees of the Irish Society shot a net twice round trawlers. The Irish Society claim all the fish in Lough Foyle, without exception, and it is said they intend to stop the trawling. The habits of the fishermen are orderly. The men are employed both in fishing and farming, and they fish in fine weather on the coast. The registry is pretty perfect; but there is some little difficulty in getting the sails of second-class boats marked. It is suggested that block figures be supplied in out-of-the-way places. Trawling carried on in Lough Foyle, Magilligan Bank, Down Hill Bay, and Lough Swilly; no contention with line fishers. Injunctions have been obtained by the lessees of the Irish to prohibit trawling. The more trawling the better, as it stirs up the food, and the fish resort to the spot. It also keeps the ground clean and ready for the fish to spawn, and allows accumulation of weed to be carried away by the tide. There are twenty-four trawl boats of from eight to forty-five tons, using a four to four and a half inch mesh in from two and a half to seven fathom water. The number of trawlers same as last year; but some are laid up in Lough Foyle, afraid to trawl. 293 boats engaged in line and herring fishing. No seine or trammel nets. One-eighth of the fish sold in the local markets; the rest sent to Belfast, Glasgow, and Liverpool. Cod, turbot, ling, sole, haddock, ray, conger eels, and flounders taken by trawl; turbot, cod, ling, ray, and conger eels by line. A few lobsters and crabs taken in summer. Large quantities of dog-fish sometimes caught about Malin Head in July and August, and are very remunerative for the oil used by tanners. The fishermen got £1,500 for the oil one year. Sole, plaice, turbot, and ray in best condition from July to October; worst, March to June. Cod and ling best in winter, worst in summer. Cod and ling are supposed to spawn on broken ground, in sheltered places, and in estuaries; plaice and sole in sand, and are sometimes found on oyster beds in from three to five fathom water. The best mode of obtaining correct statistics is by making the men keep an account, and rewarding those who do it best; also getting the number of boxes shipped off the pier at Moville, and circulating the Commissioners' reports amongst the leading fishermen. As to the improvement of the fisheries, it is suggested that some regulation might be made against over-dredging. But too little dredging is as bad as over-dredging, as the ground fouls and sea vermin destroy the oysters, as may be perceived in an old bed, where large shells are got without any fish. Money might be advanced to buy lines in the backward parts, as the Government could supply them for half the price now paid. The men are orderly, but wanting in thrift. They do not understand their not being allowed to trawl in Lough Foyle as formerly, and they conceive they have a right by usage. Lough Foyle is a mine of wealth unworked. The diminished number of boats, if any, can only be accounted for by the men turning their attention to agriculture. There is more grain and flax grown now than before. The men both fish and farm now as they did before; but they prefer the latter, as it is more remunerative. They formerly fished to add to their other means of subsistence, and supply the adjacent markets. The line boats are open Drontheim boats, from one to one and a half tons. The men are used to them, and prefer them to others; they are good pulling boats, and quickly beached. The boats usually last from six to seven years, and then are burnt or destroyed. There are no vestiges of old boats. Dredging is performed by row boats, with five men in each, instead of having small sailing boats of about three tons, which could be managed by a man and boy. As the men divide their labour between farming and fishing, neither is followed to the best advantage. Two men have made as much as £12 per	29

162	537	7	163	540	7	–	–	–	20	39	30	There has been no improvement in the fisheries during the last three years. Boats and gear the same. No sign of improvement. There is no emigration. The produce of fish equal to last year. No oyster fishery. No curing establishment. Fish sold fresh. No ice-houses for sea-fish. No conflicts amongst the fishermen, who are orderly and peaceable. Registration of vessels good. No trammels used. One trawler works in from three to five fathoms. 162 boats engaged in line fishing, of one ton each. Fish sent to market in local and distant places. Herring, glasson, bream, and scad are caught by seine in summer months; cod and ling by line, from October to May; herring, glasson, bream, and scad, winter; cod and ling from June to September. The fish spawn about ten miles off land, in about fifty fathoms of water. More accurate statistical information on the fisheries could be had by appointing a paid person to record it. It is desirable to improve the boat-ports along the coast. In 1846 the men were cleared away by potato disease. The men now find farming more lucrative than fishing, and consequently they have taken small farms. Yawls chiefly used taking fish. None of the old boats, or vestiges of them, to be seen; cannot tell what became of them. The fishermen think a bounty for fish would be a stimulus and encouragement to exertion.	30
162	392	51	176	434	51	40	204	3	–	–	–	Fishing establishment much the same as the three preceding years. Glenarm and Carrickfergus are the only places where fishing can be said to be carried on. Boats and gear poor. No improvement. Prospects bad. No emigration. Take of fish the same on the average as last year. There are natural oyster banks at Carrickfergus; rather improving. A new bank lately discovered. No steps taken to stock the ground. No licences granted. Quality of oysters good. Average price, 9*s.* per hundred. No curing establishments, nor ice-houses. No attempt to cure the fish, which are sold in the fresh state. No conflicts or collisions; fishermen orderly and peaceable. Able-bodied men fishing and farming alternately. Registry of vessels perfect. Trawling practised in Belfast Lough; trammel-nets occasionally. No good feeling between trawlers and line-fishers. Millions of small flat-fish are sold in the market—this should be restrained. Trawling is very injurious to the general fishing interests whilst allowed to retain such small fish, which they obtain by trawling on prohibited ground. Trawling practised by large boats, with a mesh of one three-fourth inches, worked in two and a half to six fathom water. Number of trawlers greater than last year. Boats of from one to one and a half tons employed in seine, trammel net, and line fishing. Fish taken by trawl sold in local markets and Belfast; that captured by other modes of fishing sold in the local markets. Sole and plaice are captured by trawl. Cod, conger, ling, pollock, and herrings by other modes in summer. Flat-fish in autumn; cod in winter. Flat-fish spawn on soft bottom, in two or three fathom water. Accurate statistical information could be had by compelling the owners of registered boats to report on their fish, and appointing a man to examine their size. Fish of a certain size only should be sold. The great falling in the fisheries since 1846, &c., is to be ascribed to the facility of finding employment on shore, and to the scarcity of fish, which arises from illegal trawling, and to the streams being poisoned for salmon by flax. The present class of boats are large; condition and fitments fair. The fisheries might be improved if very small fish were not allowed to be sold.	31
583	1,072	181	654	1,333	205	10	42	1	–	–	–	No material alteration in boats or gear. No sign of improvement; present prospects bad. No spirit of emigration. The take of fish much the same as in preceding year. One natural oyster bank in district, which has not improved. No new banks discovered. No private beds. The oysters are coarse; price, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 5*s.* per hundred, of which about 150,000 or 200,000 were sold in the year. No curing establishment nor ice-house. Fish sold in the fresh state. No conflicts; fishermen peaceable. The able-bodied men are generally farming, if not fishing. Registry of boats perfect. Trawling carried on, but has caused no contention. Trawling is not injurious to the general fishing interests if carried on on legitimate grounds in proper season. It is practised by six or seven boats, from eight to twelve tons each, with a four-inch mesh, working in four to eight fathom water. There is a slight increase in the number of trawlers this year, as compared with last year. 145 boats, from one to three tons each, engaged in line-fishing. The fish taken sold in the local markets; that taken by line sent to Belfast. Turbot and plaice are taken by trawl; in good condition from March to October. Cod, ling, and conger taken by line from November to March. Flat-fish deposit their spawn in shallow water; cod and ling in deep water. It would be difficult to obtain accurate statistical information relative to the fisheries unless the fishermen were compelled to report to some constituted authority. Can offer no suggestion with reference to the improvement of the fisheries. The good wages given by farmers to labourers is the cause of the great falling off in the fisheries. The former fishermen pursued fishing as a means of living, by supplying the neighbourhood and distant markets. The boats at present used are in fair condition. Most of the old boats are broken up and destroyed, and some are lying on the beach in a rotten state. The depressed state of the fisheries arises from the scarcity of fish near the shore.	32

No conflicts; fishermen orderly and peaceable; the able-bodied employed as farm servants. Boats all registered, but belong to farmers. No trawl or trammel fishing. Fifteen boats employed at intervals by farmers in hand line fishing and collecting seaweed. Fish all used at home. Plaice, whiting, cod, ling, eels, and blocking best from August to November. There are no fishermen to man the boats, and cannot suggest anything for the improvement of the fisheries.
85	239	29	108	399	41	7	–	20	–	16	–	The general condition of the fisheries, boats, gear, &c., about the same for the last three years. No sign of improvement; present prospects bad. No emigration. Herring fishery about as productive as last year, but a considerable falling off in other fish. No oyster fishery. There is said to be an oyster bed off William's Harbour, about five miles from Newcastle, but it is not dredged. The fish is generally sold fresh. No curing establishment. No conflicts amongst the fishermen; they are orderly and peaceable. Some of the able-bodied are generally employed in fishing. The registry of vessels perfect. Trawling exists to a small extent off Ardglass, which causes no contention. Trawling is said to injure spawn and interfere with other modes of fishing. Number or tonnage of trawlers not known, as they do not belong to this division. There are eighty-five boats, average fourteen tons, employed in other modes of fishing. The fish sold in local markets. Plaice, turbot, and soles are captured by trawlers from March to October. Whiting, cod, haddock, ling, in best condition in winter; worst condition opposite period. Herrings spawn in some place in-shore on rocky ground in shallow water; other round fish on hard ground, in from twenty to thirty fathoms. Statistical information, as to the different kinds of fish and quantities taken, could be more accurately recorded by the appointment of a person to each harbour for that purpose. There is little doubt that the scarcity of fish is to be accounted for by their having changed their ground. A larger class of boats would enable the fishermen to follow them, but there is a want of energy about the population, that it is to be doubted if larger boats were provided, whether they would follow up the calling of fishermen with the vigour necessary for such an occupation. The falling off in fisheries is attributed to emigration and scarcity of fish. The former population were divided into two classes, one who did nothing but fish, the other, a combination of fishermen and farmers; the former sent fish to the adjoining markets, which was their only means of livelihood. There are two classes of boats—first class average fourteen tons each, condition fair, fitted with herring nets; second class, whale boats, condition fair, fished with hand lines and long lines. There are some vestiges of old broken up boats on the beach.	34
278	989	23	284	1,029	26	–	–	18	10	55	–	Fishing establishment generally on the increase with regard to small boats, gear, &c. No sign of improvement. Oyster fishery on the decrease. Emigration still prevails; if employed, the fishermen would remain at home. Take of fish nearly the same as preceding year. One natural oyster bank in district on the decrease. Private beds are stocked by Lord Claremont, and Mr. William Pettigrew. Can form no idea of quantity of oysters sold within the year; price from 7*s.* to 8*s.* per 100. No curing establishments or ice-houses in district. Fish sold in a fresh state. No conflicts; fishermen peaceable. Registry of vessels perfect. Cannot suggest a better system of registration. No trawling or trammel nets in district. Some of the fish taken are sold in the local markets; but the greater portion of the herrings in the inland towns. Herrings are in best condition from September to November; whiting, codling, and cod during the winter months. Unable to say where, or at what depth fish deposit their spawn. Statistical information relative to the fisheries could be had if the harbourmasters kept a record at each place. The people pursue fishing as a means of adding to their other modes of subsistence. The boats used are nearly all yawls and skiffs, and are in fair condition as to fitments for herring, long line, and oyster fishing. The old boats have been broken up and used as firewood. Suggests that only one side of the lough should be dredged each year; many of the people are in favour of this plan; but the fishermen at Omeath will not agree to it; if something is not done soon there will be no oysters in the lough. The officer at Omeath coast-guard station considers the open season too long, and that the month of February be taken from it; also that the practice of taking oysters with "grape" be prohibited. Suggests that a water bailiff be appointed, to be paid by the fishermen, and that the whole fine be inflicted on any person seized with small oysters in his possession.	35
212	725	18	215	744	21	–	39	–	3	–	–	No decrease in boats and gear. Slight improvement. No emigration of fishermen. The produce of fish less by one-half this year than in 1867, unless salmon, which was more productive. No oyster fishery. No curing establishment for fish, which is sold fresh. No ice-houses. No conflicts amongst the fishermen; they are orderly and peaceable. Registry of vessels perfect. Trawling carried on in deep water, which causes no injury to the fisheries. There are three trawlers, of fifty-three tons, using nets with meshes three and a half inches, fishing in from seven to twenty-five fathoms. Seine, trammel, and line fishing carried on by 212 boats, of 400 tons. Fish sold in local markets, except salmon, which is sent to Dublin. Plaice, sole, turbot, skate, &c., taken by trawl; salmon, flat fish, codling, dabs, sole, by seine. By appointing a person to record statistics, relative quantities and qualities, &c., of fish taken, returns may be more accurate on the subject. In part of the district there has been no falling off in boats or men; and where there is a falling off, it is partly ascribed to emigration and partly to scarcity of fish. Some fishermen follow fishing as a means of subsistence; others in connexion with farming. The old boats have been either burned or converted into pig-houses, &c. It is thought the formation of a fishing company would infuse vigour into the fisheries, by giving employment.	36
38	148	21	114	624	98	2	13	–	–	–	2	The general condition of the fisheries, as to boats, gear, &c., unchanged during the last three years. No sign of improvement. No emigration. The fishing more productive the last than the preceding year. There is a private oyster bed at Malahide, and steps have been taken to stock it. Fish sold fresh; but there are two curing establishments at Rush. No ice-houses. No conflicts among the fishermen; they are orderly and peaceable. Registry of vessels perfect. Trawling exists; but causes no contention, although it is said to interfere with long-line fishing, by carrying away the lines. Eighteen boats trawl occasionally, of from seven to eighteen tons, using nets having meshes two inches square. There are 21 boats of from one and a half to two tons em-	37

												ployed in seine, trammel, and line fishing. Fish taken by trawl cured in summer at Rush, and sent to Dublin in winter; and the produce of the seine, trammel, and line-fishing is sent to Dublin markets. Cod, ling, plaice, sole, and skate are taken by trawl. Plaice and sole in worst condition from November to February; cod in season from November to June; ling from June to November. The most accurate statistical information relative to the fisheries could be obtained from boat-owners. More fishing would be carried on at Rush if the harbour was good. The fishermen with families are not inclined to emigrate, or go in trading vessels; but, if the harbour was improved, would carry on the fishing as briskly as ever. The fish are not so plentiful as in 1846, nor can haddock be got in this locality now, which at that period abounded. Young men prefer going to sea, and only fish during the herring season, the want of good harbour at Rush being greatly against fishing. No falling off in boats; rather improving by lengthening. All the old boats sold or broken up.
13	46	1	61	369	41	–	2	1	1	–	–	The general condition of this district—fisheries, boats, gear, &c.—as compared with the three previous years, is very good. There are signs of improvement, and fair prospects. The spirit of emigration is ceasing; more fishermen are required. Taking the several modes of capture into consideration, the last year has been more productive than the preceding. It has been one of the best herring fishing years for some time. Prices very high for the fish. There is one oyster bed here made by Mr. Kane. Very little fish has been cured at Howth, it being sold and taken away by train and smacks. The Irish Sea Fishing Company have sold off. A small curing shed on each pier. No conflicts amongst the fishermen, who are much improved. They are very orderly, and all the able-bodied men are employed in the fishery. If the registering of vessels in this district was removed to Howth, it would be more convenient; but the registry is very good at present. No trawling carried on; it would be injurious to the long-line fishermen, and is injurious to fisheries generally, as the trawl destroys the small fish. The long-line fishers capture cod, ling, haddock, and whiting. Cannot give information as to the habits of fish as to spawning-grounds, &c. The best means to obtain statistical information as to quantities of different kinds of fish taken, and the disposal of same, would be by a Fishery Registry, kept at the Coast Guard station, where accurate returns could be obtained at any time relating to the fisheries. It is suggested that a small steam vessel should always be kept in attendance, and follow the fishing fleet from port to port, and the Acts of Parliament strictly carried out, &c., &c.; and it is strongly recommended that those parties that have taken the west pier should be made to build curing houses and other stores for the improvement of the fishery. The fishing population, since 1844, has decreased, owing to the famine, which caused many to emigrate; and fishing is their only means of obtaining a livelihood in this district. The general class of boats are from eighteen to twenty-five tons; good boats and well found. There are three of the old class of boats remaining, which are generally employed in line-fishing. The want of means is one of the principal reasons for the decline of the fishery, and the very great want of energy in the fishermen is a great drawback to the prosperity of Howth as a fishing station.	38

Clew Bay, County Mayo. (1st April, 1865.)	That, for the sole purpose of replenishing and supplying licensed Oyster beds and other Oyster beds, the exclusive property of any person or persons within Clew Bay alone, in the County of Mayo, and for no other purpose whatever, it may be lawful for any person to dredge for and take Oysters from any natural public bed in the said Clew Bay lying below the level of the lowest water of spring tides, between the 1st and 15th April and the 20th June and 1st October in each year, such periods being respectively included within the Close Time at present fixed for the Oyster fisheries within the said Clew Bay: Provided always, that if any Oysters dredged or taken during such part of the Close Season shall be brought to shore, or sold or offered for sale, or be found in the possession of any person on land, or be used for any other purpose than the replenishing or supplying any such artificial or other bed as aforesaid, every person so offending shall forfeit all such Oysters, and be subject and liable to the same penalties and forfeitures as by said first-recited Act (5 and 6 Vic.) prescribed in cases of offences against the provisions of the said first-recited Act for the observance of the Close Season in respect of Oysters.

Date. Week ending—	No. of Boats.	Total No. of Mease.	Gross Amount realized. £ s. d.	No of Days.	OBSERVATIONS.
June 13,	17	23	24 0 0	4	The quality as well as the quantity of herrings taken at Ardglass this season was very good. The fishermen from Scotland, England, the Isle of Man, together with those of our own country (Ireland), were highly gratified at the take. The price kept up well, owing to there being generally four steamers in the harbour carrying them to the sister country. The harbour is getting worse every year.

APPENDIX, No. 7.

LICENSED OYSTER BEDS. OPERATIONS and RESULTS, as COMMUNICATED by the LICENSEES or their REPRESENTATIVES.

CIRCULAR ISSUED TO LICENSEES.

Office of Public Works, Dublin,
9th November, 1868.

SIR,—With reference to the Oyster Licence granted to you on the I am directed by the Board to request that you will furnish them with a statement of the steps taken to cultivate the Oyster ground appropriated to you. I am also to remind you of the length of time that has elapsed since the granting of the Licence, and to call your attention to the 10th Section of the 29th and 30th Vic., cap. 97, a copy of which is sent herewith, which gives the Board authority to rescind a Licence where the bed is not properly cultivated.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
Secretary.

29th and 30th Victoria, Cap. 97.

Section 10.—"That notwithstanding anything in any Licence heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted by the Commissioners, the same shall be determinable by a Certificate of the Commissioners (which certificate they are hereby empowered to make) certifying to the effect that the Commissioners are not satisfied that the Licencee is properly cultivating the Oyster ground within the limits of such Licence; and on any such certificate being made the right by such Licence conferred shall, by virtue of this Act, and of the certificate as aforesaid, be absolutely determined, and all the provisions of the Acts hereinbefore recited and referred to, or of this Act, shall cease to operate in relation to such Licence as an Oyster Fishery or otherwise; and for the purposes of this provision the Commissioners may, from time to time, with respect to such Licence or Oyster Fishery make such inquiries and examinations by an Inspector, or otherwise, and require from such Licencee such information as the Commissioners may think necessary or proper; and the Licencee shall afford all facilities for such inquiries and examinations, and give such information accordingly."

Bed No. 3.—Off Dawrus Point, County Kerry.

Offices, Killarney,
5th day of December, 1868.

SIR,—I am in receipt of yours having reference to the Oyster Licence granted to me so far back as the 9th of June, 1848, and requesting to be furnished with a statement of the steps taken by me to cultivate the oyster ground.

In reply, I beg to say that by the fall of a life, I have long since lost the oyster bed, which has reverted to Lord Lansdowne.

I am, your obedient servant,
FRANCIS HENRY DOWNING.

Bed No. 4.—Kenmare River.

Dromore, Kenmare,
November 20.

SIR,—With reference to the circular from the Board of Works, inquiring what steps I had taken towards establishing an oyster bed in the Kenmare River under a licence granted to my father in 1851, I beg to state that nothing material has been done, inasmuch as the site was badly chosen and contains very little ground suitable for such purposes, so that, of late years, I have not even protected it. Having come to learn something more, however, of the cultivation of oysters, we have found a place within the limits of the above-mentioned bed, which seems favourable for making a small breeding park of about two acres. It would be done by building a wall and suspending hurdles on wire in the French manner, which I would propose to do next season, if licence of that portion should be continued. I have indicated the place I refer to in blue on the enclosed map, the part suitable for the purpose being enclosed within the red line where the current are slack, but the adjacent parts are coloured in blue for the sake of protecting the breeding pond from any boats that might be dredging in the vicinity.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
R. MAHONY.

Bed No. 7.—Clew Bay.
Re Garveys Minors.

Westport, November 24, 1868.

SIR,—Mrs. Garvey, of Murrisk Abbey, has handed me a letter inquiring as to the Oyster licence granted to the late J. C. Garvey. I beg leave to inform the Commissioners that Mr. Garvey, many years ago planted the ground, and it has been carefully protected ever since, and is now let on lease to an English gentleman; the lease made by the Court of Chancery.

Your obedient,
J. SIDNEY SMITH, Receiver.

Bed No. 12.—Blacksod Bay.

Clarinda Park, West, Kingstown,
December 2, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 9th of November on my licence being granted I divided that shore granted into parks with stone fences; I then purchased £120 worth of oysters for seed, which I placed in parks. They remained for upwards of a year on the beds. I did not find I had spat at all in proportion to my expectations, though the locality was certainly one of the best in that neighbourhood. I had the oysters turned and the beds kept clean. I also built a slated house opposite the bed for a caretaker, all of which can be seen. I sold most of the stock so placed in the first instance for £80, leaving a fair supply for breeding purposes. Since then the beds have been robbed once or twice at low water, by night, during spring-tides, notwithstanding my caretaker. However, I have had a fair supply for self and friends. I kept the beds buoyed. Muscles increased. The oysters have not succeeded to my wishes. Something is due to unfavourable seasons. This is all I can say on the subject, unless that in the deep water of Elly Bay, where there was a good bed when mine was granted, there are little or none now, and that not, certainly, from over-dredging.

Your obedient,
J. W. RICHARDS.

Bed No. 13.—Berehaven.

Clonakilty, December 4th, 1868.

SIR,—I regret that yours of the 9th ult. to Lord C. P. P. Clinton, respecting the oyster ground at Waterfall, Berehaven, should have remained so long unanswered. His lordship sent me your communication, but owing to my absence it could not have been answered sooner.

As to the oyster bed and the licence granted on the 30th of July, 1856, I beg to assure you that since I became agent over the property I paid the greatest attention to the oyster bed, and expended some money in its preservation and in the propagation of the oysters, but owing to floods which rush from the adjoining mountains and which covered the entire strand all my efforts were rendered useless. I then erected a strong embankment at considerable cost, and this resisted the floods of the last winter, and is likely to do the same this winter. When last at Waterfall I examined the bed and found that it had increased, and the caretaker got strict orders to watch it carefully, and to protect it from all plunder. It is right to admit that I am not skilled in the growth or culture of oysters, but I shall be most happy to follow any suggestions that may be given, and to carry out any useful directions; I did not think that it was necessary to obtain a new licence, and I am convinced that nothing has been done or left undone on the part of Lord Clinton by which the old licence ought to be forfeited.

I shall feel obliged if you are so kind as to suggest to me what is necessary to be done, and if at all possible I shall carry out your suggestion.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS R. WRIGHT.

Bed. No 19.—Valentia Harbour.

Valentia, 18th December, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to yours of 9th ult., which I ought to have answered sooner, I beg to say that I have done nothing to the oyster ground since I last wrote to you, because I have now reason to believe that the nature of the bottom is unsuitable. If under these circumstances you withdraw the licence I cannot complain.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

P. FITZGERALD, Knight of Kerry.

Bed No. 22.—Ballinakill Harbour.

Rosleague, Clifden, Co. Galway,
16th November, 1868.

SIR,—Your circular letter dated the 9th instant having been directed to my former place of residence only reached me here on yesterday (Sunday). In reply I beg to say that I have always taken much pains to cultivate my oyster ground by supplying it occasionally with young oysters and preserving it as much as possible from poachers, who had almost exhausted the beds, and in order to give them rest I have allowed but very little fishing for the last two years. The prospect this season appears to be good, but as the usual time for oyster fishing in this locality is about or after Christmas, I am not at present quite aware what the produce may be.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWARD BROWNE.

Bed No. 26.—Mweenish Bay.

Rusheen, Carna, Co. Galway, Nov. 23rd, 1868.

SIR,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 9th November instant, and in reply beg to offer the following statement:—

In 1861-62 I had two large hooker loads of young oysters laid down on part of the beds assigned to me, and for the following three or four years I was gratified to see the result of my care and attention rewarded by a plentiful supply of fine oysters, but unfortunately towards the end of 1864 I was taken severely ill, which obliged me to leave my home for eighteen months. On my return again I made it my first care to examine the beds again, and then, to my great surprise and vexation, I found the best part of them entirely stripped, and the only information I could get was that the oysters had all died. When I pointed out to them that even the shells were not forthcoming, the reply I received was we know nothing about them. I thought I left a trustworthy man—my late steward in charge, but this is "Connemara."

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your most obedient servant.

W. FORBES.

N.B.—What still remains to me of the oysters will, I hope, enable me in course of time to repair my losses.

Bed No. 28.—Belfast Lough.

Belfast, 4th December, 1868.

SIR,—I have this day received your intimation of 9th ult., addressed to Mr. James Walker, Carrickfergus.

That gentleman is still residing in Natal, near the Cape of Good Hope, and consequently no steps have been taken to cultivate the oyster ground appropriated to him for the last four years.

On his behalf I have to request that you will be so good as not to rescind the licence for six months longer, so that I may have time to communicate with him on the subject.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM HARTLEY.

Bed No. 29.—Tramore Bay.

Eastlands, Tramore,
27th February, 1869.

SIR,—In reply to your circular received by me in due course, and in which you request me to furnish you with a statement of the steps taken by me since my last report to the Commissioners, to cultivate the ground appropriated to me, and in which you call my attention to the section of the Act of Parliament which gives the Commissioners authority to rescind any licence where the bed is not properly cultivated. No doubt this is a wise provision.

I beg to say that I laid down last year about thirty thousand oysters from one to three years' growth, both in the tanks inside my embankment, but the greater portion in the feeding beds outside, which I caused to be cleared out thoroughly, so as to allow the tide to run freely over them, and also in the natural bed called the "Oyster Hole," where there was a small fall of spat; but on account of the race of the tide very little of it took effect. The oysters which I had previously laid down continue to increase in size and become very fat, several thousand having been dredged for the Waterford market, where they are much appreciated.

I regret, however, to be obliged to say that notwithstanding all my efforts and experiments in artificial oyster culture so successfully carried out in England, having constructed small tanks or ponds inside my embankment from which the action of the tide is excluded, I had not the slightest sign of spat in them, although the season was most favourable. The cause, perhaps, may be that the breeding months were very warm, and maybe too much so, my tanks being very sheltered; and we are now told by Mr. Francis Pennell of Hearne Bay, that excessive heat is injurious. The opinions heretofore of scientific men having been, that the temperature of the water in breeding ponds or tanks could not be too high. However, as there is nothing like perseverance, I purpose continuing my efforts, and endeavour to succeed in getting a fall of spat. In addition to the hurdles, tiles, shells, &c., heretofore used as cultch, I purpose trying garden wire netting, supported as the hurdles, about twelve inches from the bottom, on which I shall place shells, as collectors, for the spat to adhere to. I shall also, for the first time, try furze bushes (an article easily procured in Ireland) used with some success by Mr. Hart at Hayling, and Mr. Francis Pennell at Hearne Bay.

I have the honour to remain, sir,

Your obedient servant,

EDMUND POWER.

Bed No. 30.—Achill Sound.

Perrystone, Ross,
14th November, 1868.

SIR,—I decline to furnish any statement to the Board.

Some steps I have taken, but from the absurdly restricted nature of the grant, I doubt their producing any good result.

The Board has my free consent to rescind the licence which, owing to the ignorance of those who conducted the inspection, is comparatively useless.

Your obedient servant,

GEO. CLIVE.

Bed No. 31.—Tramore Bay.

Summerville, Waterford,
19th December, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your circular with reference to the oyster licence granted to Lord Fortescue in 1864, I have little to add to my previous reports on the same subject.

Owing to repeated failures in the deposit of spat for which this locality does not appear to be favourable, I have of late confined my operations to laying down oysters from the natural banks at Wexford, and selling them in Waterford when fit for use.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

D. F. FORTESCUE.

Bed No. 34.—Newport Bay.

Newport, Mayo,
January 5th, 1869.

SIR,—In reply to yours inquiring concerning the oyster bed licensed to Captain A. W. Wyndham, I beg to say that all the money expended on it was utterly thrown away, inasmuch as the portion licensed was totally unfit for oyster culture. Had the remaining portion applied for been licensed, it would have been different. As it is I have strongly advised Captain W. not to throw away money in any further attempts; whether he will or not I cannot at present say.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN ORAM.

Bed No. 35.—Westport Bay.

CLEW BAY OYSTER LICENCE.

The Precincts, Canterbury,
January 4, 1869.

DEAR SIR,—Your circular has been long in reaching me, or I should have before replied to it.

I am happy to be able to report to you, for the information of the Board, that I have succeeded in establishing there, on the ground granted, a very large and thriving oyster fishery, and that it is now, and has been for the last two years or more, in full operation, and is, I believe, by far the largest private oyster fishery in Ireland.

A very large sum is annually expended there, and a large capital invested. Some details will be found in my annual reports to the Fishery Department of the Board, and published in their reports.

I am, dear sir, your very obedient servant,

GEORGE AUSTIN.

P.S.—I will, if necessary, furnish you with detailed information on any point required.—G.A.

Bed No. 36.—Ardbear and Mannin Bays.

Union Bank Chambers,
Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C.,
16th November, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your communication of the 9th instant, received this day, I beg to inform you that I am still cultivating such parts of the ground comprised in my oyster licence as are fit for oyster culture. My greatest enemy is mud; but by careful dredging I am doing my best to cultivate and extend the ground.

I have had a good fall of spat upon a portion of the ground this season.

Any further information I shall be happy to afford you, and my agent on the ground will be happy to show it whenever desired.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN KENDALL.

Bed No. 43.—Ballinakill Harbour.

Killidrenan, N.-T.-Mt.-Kennedy,
November 16th, 1868.

SIR,—With reference to the subject-matter of you letter of the 9th, received the 14th, I beg to say tha during last season, and the short period of this whic has elapsed, I have collected as much oysters as I coul procure or purchase on the bank in Ballinakill Bay, Co Galway. That I have employed a competent and trust worthy man to superintend the work, who reports very favourable progress in the spawning last summe I tried partially the French system of faggots to collec the spawn, but it has not succeeded. A quantity, how ever, has been collected on tiles, flags, and stones.

I would feel obliged for a work or report containin accounts of the most successful means of accomplishin that very important object; and am,

Sir, your obedient servant,

CHAS. P. ARCHER.

Ballinakill, Clifden, Co. Galway,
December 9, 1868.

SIR,—Your letter of the 9th November last was pre vented being answered sooner by my absence fro home.

With reference to oyster licence granted to me i 1864, I have only to remark that I have taken all th steps I could do to cultivate the oysters on the groun appropriated to me, which I also did for several year previously, as it is my own property; it has never bee disputed with me, or those preceding me, as owners of th property. At low tides most of my beds dry out, ex cept the muddy parts; and all parts of said beds ar surveyed and bounded by my fee-simple estate.

I have from time to time dredged the beds, takin off dirt, weeds, &c., sea-grass and such like, at consider able expense, laying down all seed-oysters again in th best places for them, and also all large oysters, except ing a few used for my own private use. I never sol any off the beds but one year, and that was the year took out the licence, my endeavours being to increas and multiply the oysters as much as possible, all whic I have done for years before the licence, with the sam success. I also put down on the beds some fresh seed oysters the last two seasons. But the winter storms i my bay make the water extremely rough, consequently I find that large amounts of oysters are driven up b the rough weather, and destroyed so as to cause m very considerable loss. However, for my own sake a well as for licence, I am doing all I can to improv them, and shall so continue to do.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS YOUNG PRIOR.

Bed No. 46.—Killala Bay.

Belleek Manor, Ballina, Co. Mayo,
November 27, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 9th of Novembe 1868, I have the honour to make, for the informatio of the Board of Works, the following statement, as re gards the condition of the grant made by them to m in 1864 (31st of December) for the purpose of formin oyster beds.

Not until March, 1865, did we receive official notifica tion of the grant, and even then there existed an u certainty as to security of such grants. The followin session, however, the Act relative to such grants t private individuals having been amended, immediat steps were taken to put the bottom of the groun selected, or at least a portion selected, as most favo able for the purpose, into a fit state for the receptio of seed oysters, by thorough dredging and cleaning th bottom from obstructions, sea-weed, dirt, crabs, sta fish and other natural enemies of the oyster. Th operation involved some considerable time and dif culty, more particularly owing to the questionable legality of using an oyster dredge, even for these purposes, during the close season. The result, however, tended quite to confirm our previous conviction that the ground was particularly suitable for our purpose. It was not thus until 1866, that we were prepared to make layings, which we did, procuring the brood oysters at much difficulty and expense from Clew Bay chiefly. This difficulty arose from the fact that, owing, apparently, to the public beds in that vicinity having been at some previous period apparently over-fished, the supply is not larger than finds a ready market on the spot from Captain Austin and others, who are extensively engaged in forming oyster beds there and in the vicinity. Last season we made further layings, and are happy to say the oysters have, even in a single season, improved so far in size and flavour that we have every reason to be satisfied with our prospect of success in growing oysters. Whether the locality will suit equally well for breeding them is a question we are as yet unable to decide, but we shall give it trial, and hope ultimately to be able to report our success in this branch also.

We are at this moment endeavouring to obtain a further supply of brood oysters from Blacksod and Clew Bays, and hope, should we succeed in obtaining the quantity we seek, to extend the limits of the ground at present stocked, so as, by next season, to have occupied and tested the capabilities and merits of all available ground within the limits of our grant.

Our beds being but in their infancy I can give the Board no information as yet as to produce or market prices. The only other oyster beds in the immediate vicinity are those of Cortoon, the property of Major Knox, of Castlerea, and are in the estuary of Rathfran River. They have been in existence for a considerable length of time, but as regards their condition or produce, I am unable to afford any information.

The only suggestion I would offer for consideration of the Board would be the propriety of permission being given for owners of private oyster beds or layings being at all times and seasons permitted to use the dredge for the purpose of cleaning the ground and separating and distributing the growing oysters, it being at the same time most distinctly understood that no oysters of any size whatever, or upon any pretext, should be removed, even to other beds.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
C. J. KNOX GORE,
On part of Sir A. Knox Gore, Bart.

Beds Nos. 47, 52, 55, 62.—Clew Bay.

Estate Office, Westport,
November 30, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 9th of November instant, relative to the oyster licences granted to Lord Sligo, I have to state—

1st—That the ground north of Islandmore (licence dated November 2, 1865) has been duly planted, and a letter from the Board of Works, dated January 10th, 1866 (Fisheries, 305), was sent to Lord Sligo, certifying that such had been done in accordance with the terms of the licence. This bed is regularly preserved and worked.

2nd—The ground east of Innishlyre (licence dated December 1, 1865), was leased to Mr. W. F. Dobson (Beardsted House, Maidstone), on conditions as to planting, &c., but Mr. Dobson having written to say that he finds, after planting a large quantity of oysters thereon, which have perished, that it is unsuitable to the purpose. A surrender of his lease has been agreed to, and the licence has been already practically abandoned. There can, of course, be no objection to the formal revocation of the licence.

3rd—The other two licences granted to Lord Sligo, dated respectively April 13th, 1865, and April 20th, 1866, were leased to Mr. Leonard Wray, of Eagle House, Ramsgate, on stringent conditions as to the planting and working of the ground in accordance with the terms of the licences. I regret, however, to say that Mr. Wray has not as yet complied therewith, notwithstanding several letters of remonstrance relative thereto. These two licences, however, each allow five years for the planting, and Mr. Wray continues to promise compliance with the terms of the licence within the specified time.

I believe that the stringent condition of the money market for the last two years is the principal reason of Mr. Wray's not having planted the ground before this.

Your obedient servant,
J. SIDNEY SMITH.

Bed No. 51.—Clew Bay.

Ballynahinch Castle, via Galway,
26th December, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your communication of the 9th ultimo, relative to the planting of an oyster bed in Clew Bay by the Law Life Society, I have to inform you that no steps have been taken by the society in planting or cultivating oysters there, in consequence of the very limited area of grounds laid out by the Commissioners for planting. But if the licence extended to all the grounds claimed by the Law Life at the time of application, they would now have the beds in course of cultivation, and very probably be one of the finest oyster fisheries in the kingdom.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
G. ROBINSON.

Bed No. 58.—Ballisodare Bay.

Tanrago, Ballisodare,
16th November, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your circular of the 9th instant, I beg to state that the young oysters laid down by me, two years since, have grown and are doing well; a considerable number of them are of a marketable size, but I will not take any up for sale till next September, to give them the opportunity of spawning.

I this season put out a considerable quantity of stones on the bare parts of the bed to form shelter, as the current is very strong, and to give a hold for the spat; this, with constantly collecting any scattered oysters into the most favourable situations, is what I have as yet done. I consider there is every prospect of the bed being valuable, and paying well in the course of time.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
R. J. VERSCHOYLE.

DEAR SIR,—I have got the valuable pamphlet, published by the Commissioners in 1864, on the Irish oyster fisheries. I shall be obliged by your informing me if any later information has been published by them.

I suppose we will have a report published of the information collected in France recently.

Yours truly,
R. J. VERSCHOYLE.

Dromore, Kenmare,
November 20th, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 9th, inquiring what steps I had taken towards cultivating the oyster ground granted to me in December, 1865, I beg to state that we have laid down about 60,000 oysters, and have attended to them to the best of our information on the subject, and have reason to believe that the undertaking will succeed, as there is evidence of the fish having spawned in '66 and '67, though not to any great extent; there is much difficulty in preserving the bed, which I trust will be obviated should the Commissioners think fit to grant to Mr. K. Sullivan and myself the adjacent ground applied for by us in the spring of the present year.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
R. MAHONY.

Bed No. 60.—Killary Harbour.

Leenuan Hotel, Westport,
7th December, 1868.

SIR,—I have not done anything up to this towards stocking the oyster beds. Several things acted against my making a beginning; there was a doubtful clause in the Act which has lately been made right; this, with not up to the present being able to collect enough practicable information on the subject, prevented me of making a beginning; but if the Commissioners will be good enough to renew the licence, I will be prepared to lay the beds next year.

Your obedient servant,
R. M'KEOWN.

Carne, Belmullet,
November 23, 1868.

SIR,—As Miss Fowler, immediately after she received the Commissioners' grant for the oyster bed changed her name, the communications relative to it went astray; I am happy to be able to inform you it has succeeded much better than was anticipated. There are now a very fair stock of breeding oysters on the bed, and although owing to its being almost in the direct passage of the quay of Belmullet, the expense attending the preservation of the bed is greater than it would be in any other locality; still it pays a fair percentage for the money expended, and will be, in a little time, the best oyster bed upon this coast.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,
HENRY J. F. MORAN.

21st November, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your circular of the 9th instant, I beg to state that I have buoyed out the boundary of the fishery, and am taking what I conceive to be the proper course to cultivate the oyster ground appropriated to me. I have during this season had the oyster bed partly harrowed with a harrow fastened between two boats, and have enclosed with wicker-work, a portion of the shore to form beds in which to place oysters to breed, and have also purchased and placed some small oysters in the beds, so as to increase the stock which was nearly exhausted, and am still making such purchases.

This is the plan recommended by Mr. Buckland, whom I consulted, and also recommended by parties in this country.

I hope the Commissioners will see from the above statement that the conditions under which they have granted the licence have been fulfilled.

I am, sir, yours faithfully,
T. SANDES.

SIR,—In accordance to your circular letter respecting the oyster fishery for which I obtained a licence, dated 10th July, 1867, I beg to state that I am in treaty with a person for the proper cultivation of the oyster ground therein named.

SIR,—In reply to your inquiry as to what steps had been taken in reference to oyster licence granted on 10th July, '67, for Long Island, the property of Mr. J. C. Longfield, I have to inform you that, before applying for the licence, I had made an agreement to let the oyster ground to Mr. Wray as soon as the licence was obtained; but that, when I informed him that the licence had been granted, he declined to carry out the agreement, assigning as a reason that the Commissioners had cut off part of the ground applied for, and shortened the term for establishing the oysters, and also that, on close examination of the ground, he found it not suitable for the proposed purpose. I laid the matter before Master Fitzgibbon, under whom I act, and he decided that, under the circumstances, it was not advisable to take legal measures to oblige Mr. Wray to carry out his agreement.

I have since tried to get other persons to take the oyster ground, but I have not succeeded.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
SAMPSON T. W. FRENCH.

SIR,—In reply to your communication, which has been forwarded me by Townsend Kirkwood, esq., I, as his agent, beg to state that the oyster bed, for which a licence was granted on the 10th of July, 1867, has been buoyed off and carefully planted, and to all appearance promises to be a very good bed.

Claremont, Howth, 17th February, 1869.

SIR,—In compliance with your letter to me of the 9th November last, I have to inform you for the information of your Board that in the spring of last year I laid down upwards of 10,000 oysters (on the ground specified in my licence), which I obtained from the county of Clare, and 5,000 oysters from the county of Sligo, but I regret to state that owing to the late storms that visited the coast a considerable portion of the oysters have been killed by an accumulation of sand being driven on part of the beds. I hope, however, in the ensuing season to have these replaced, but I regret to say that I can trace very few young oysters on the beds, except those which seem to adhere to the shells of the old ones, but these are more numerous than they were the previous year, which leads me to hope for better results in future.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
RICHARD D. KANE.

SIR,—In the absence of Mr. Christopher Talbot Redington your letter of the 9th instant has been forwarded to me as his agent.

In reply thereto I beg to state that the oyster bank at Island Eddy, alluded to, has been let to Mr. Leonard Wray; that he has purchased 200,000 oysters and placed them on the beds there, and has employed caretakers to prevent any trespasser dredging on those beds. I have been assured that the improvement in the quantity and quality of the fish is very great.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 9th instant I am directed by Mrs. E. Bury (whose agent I am) "of Island House, Little Island, Cork," to state to you that on the oyster ground appropriated to her there has been, during the months of February and March last, over 16,000 oysters spat of good quality carefully laid down, which, in addition to the old bed or stock, on which there was a fair supply, has been strictly watched and preserved, so that the entire gives encouraging hopes of a remunerative return.

I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

Bed No. 76.—Middleton River, County Cork.

Rathcoursey, Ballinacurra, County Cork,
November 19th, 1868.

SIR,—In answer to yours of 9th ult., I have laid on my bed a very large number of oysters; they are improving very much, making fine even growths of shell and presenting a most healthy appearance, the oyster itself being of first class quality.

I have them laid to the lowest part of the shore stranded at spring tides, outside that being rocks and mud, consequently the bed is long and narrow and easily approachable at all low tides for cleaning and removing the oysters. It has been divided with stakes, having branches woven between to keep off the heavy beat of the sea, which otherwise acts beneficially by keeping them clean.

I have made no attempt as yet at taking the spat artificially, and have up to the present depended on purchasing stock from dredging boats. I have a large quantity marketable, which I hope to dispose of this year.

Soliciting an inspection of the bed, when I hope it will meet with the approval of the Commissioners, and anxious to take any suggestion from them as to its more profitable working,

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN SMYTH.

Bed No. 77.—River Shannon, Co. Kerry.

Tieratleer, Tarbert, 16th November, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 9th, received on the 14th, I beg to state in reply that I proceeded, after obtaining the licence of the 15th July, 1867, to have buoys laid down to define the boundaries.

Complaints were made to the Harbour Commissioners of Limerick touching the buoys I have so laid down. The matter of the complaint was inquired into, and it was found to be groundless. Statements of a similar nature were subsequently transmitted by, as I believe, interested parties, to the Ballast Board in Dublin, as I have been informed, and forwarded thence to the Harbour Commissioners, Limerick, who gave orders to have the subject examined into, and last June I met Mr. Randal, the Limerick Harbour Master, who had been sent down to examine into the matter on the spot. I pointed out to him the buoys, and Mr. Randal, after a careful inspection by boat, informed me that he also considered the complaints groundless.

I had to proceed against parties who entered and dredged upon my shores, and they were fined.

Thus some time has been wasted. I was reluctant to take, pending these interruptions, any very active measures. I got into communication with Mr. Buckland, of London, on the subject. He requested to have samples of the oysters found on the ground as well as samples of the beds on which the oysters lay transmitted to him to London, which I had done, and have now by me his report, dated last February, upon which I intend acting. And I am taking measures for the purchase of seed oysters, which I hope to obtain in considerable quantities this season and to lay on the ground allotted to me. I am also preparing to build a residence for a caretaker, to protect the premises.

I am, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

STEPHEN E. COLLIS.

SIR,—With reference to the oyster licence granted to me and dated the 16th July, 1867, and my proceedings relating thereto, I beg to state that I have just been laying down some parent oysters for spawning, as I've done previously from time to time since getting the licence, and that in this way I have proceeded continuously along the shore adjacent to my land from the east end towards the west end, about a fifth part of the intervening distance. In this way I hope to lay down the eligible portions to the eastern end, and to succeed in doing so by the expiration of the time allowed for that purpose by the Commissioners, as there are considerable portions of the remaining distance which I consider unfit for the purpose from its rough rocky bottom.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

Bed No. 81.—Midleton River.

East Rathcoursey,
March 16, 1869.

SIR,—In reply to yours of the 13th instant, asking about the oyster bed, I have not as yet fully stocked it. I have placed some on different parts, and they all are doing well. I find that the oysters placed on a portion of the strand where a well of fresh water pours its overflow, are extremely healthy, and making great growth. Oysters are at present very scarce; but I hope at the opening of next season to get a large supply, as I am now convinced that this bed is well adapted both for the growth and the spatting of the oyster.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

RICHARD LYONS.

Bed No. 82.—Coney Island, Shannon.

Bayview House, Clontarf,
17th March, 1869.

SIR,—I beg to state, for the information of the Board, that I have marked out the oyster bed, according to the map, with a buoy and poles. I also put down stakes and branches to catch the spat, and laid about 10,000 oysters on the bed. This has been done for a year or nearly so. I am now preparing to make a breeding tank, as I find the stakes already put down are too much in the tideway to catch many spat. I hope to have the tank finished this year, and well stocked with breeding fish, and to have the main bed fairly stocked with growing fish by the time allowed; but I cannot expect that so large a bed can be fully stocked for at least two years more, say four years from this time. I consider three years quite too short a time for the development of a bed of any size; the fact being that oysters should, in my mind, be three years old before they are fit for use, and I don't think they breed until they are this age.

I remain yours, truly,

CHARLES SANDES.

Bed No. 83.—Lough Swilly.

Fahan, near Londonderry,
17th March, 1869.

SIR,—Since my receipt of the Commissioners' licence, about the middle of February last year, I have placed on the best portions of the ground, upwards of a million and a half of oysters (13,532 long hundred, of 123 to the hundred), principally of the spat of 1866. Owing to the high price of mature oysters I was not able to lay down, before the breeding season of last year, more than about 20,000 of an age to serve as breeding stock. Half of these which I brought from Sligo have hitherto proved useless; but the others have spatted, though not abundantly.

The younger oysters have been thriving in a very satisfactory manner; and I think I may reasonably hope that the more advanced of them may yield a spat during the approaching season.

APPENDIX.

Cultivation of Oyster Beds.

I have lately constructed a few parcs, in which I propose to try the mode of breeding which has been found successful in France; and I have almost completed an enclosed pond of about two acres, to serve as a depot for stock received into and sent out of my oyster farm during the open season, and in which I can, during the spatting time, try the system of breeding by which the South of England Oyster Company obtained an enormous crop of young oysters in 1867.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your most obedient servant,
W. HART.

Bed No. 84.—Dunmanus Bay.

Bandon, co. Cork,
March 18, 1869.

SIR,—In reply to your letter which I received on the 14th instant, I beg to inform you respectfully that my oyster licence, dated March 13, 1868, was not seen by me until the middle of the following April. Shortly after the receipt thereof, I laid down poles to mark the boundaries of my oyster bed, and was opposed by some of the neighbours who held land adjoining. This led to litigation and proceedings before the Petty Sessions Court at Carrigbay, in which the magistrates decided the case against me. I appealed from their order to the Quarter Sessions Court at Skibbereen, held in September, 1868, and the Chairman, Mr. Pigott, quashed the order of the magistrates. These proceedings prevented me doing much in cultivating my oyster bed last year, as the season was too far advanced. However, I laid down some thousands of oyster brood, and marked out my bed with poles and buoys; and I am now engaged in laying down beds and covering them with hurdles and fascines for breeding young oysters, which have become very scarce here. I think the shore granted to me by the Commissioners is very favourable, being hard gravelly and shelly for the breeding of young oysters; and I hope next year to have my beds in a forward state and successful state of progress.

I have the honour to be, very faithfully yours,

STEPHEN BROWNE.

Arklow, 12th January, 1869.

SIR,—I feel great pleasure in sending you the following report on the oyster fishery at this town up to the 31st ultimo, in continuation of my report dated the 8th of last June.

Oyster dredging commenced on the 1st of last September, and was brought to a close on the 17th of last October, in consequence of herrings having appeared off the north coast about that time. The total quantity of oysters taken during the period stated was 8,984 barrels, and they were disposed of as follows, viz.:—

London and Kent,	. 4,100 barrels.
Dublin and Dublin Bay,	. 4,884 „

The average price at which they sold, was 13*s.* per barrel=£5,839 12*s.*

On comparing the returns for the three years ending the 31st ultimo, it is very satisfactory to find a considerable and a progressive increase in the total catch of oysters for the two last years, and a corresponding increase in the sum total which they realized. The following are the returns referred to, viz.:—

1866, total catch,	15,790,	realized	8,693	0	0
1867, „	25,924,	„	13,001	4	0
1868, „	30,628,	„	19,440	16	0

I regret I cannot show so satisfactory a report respecting the herring fishery. In fact the present winter's fishing here was nearly a failure—the total catch did not exceed 3,000 mease, and the average price was 14*s.*=£2,100.

Notwithstanding this unproductive fishing, the fisher fleet is now in that efficient and satisfactory stat for which it has been so remarkable for some year past, i.e., since the harbour was improved; but I hav to state (as I did this time last year) that the buildin of new boats and enlarging of old ones has ceased, an is likely to continue so for the present.

Dredging for the present year began last week, an there was a fair average catch considering the seaso and the state of the weather. Some English buyer have already arrived, so that the season just opene offers to be remunerative to those engaged in this im portant branch of industry.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

P. MAHER.

Arklow, 30th April, 1869.

SIR,—I feel much pleasure in forwarding you th following report on the oyster fishery of this town fo the present year.

Dredging commenced on the 6th January, and close on this night. The total catch during that period wa 13,702 barrels, and they were disposed of as follows viz.:—

	Barrels.
London and Kent, ...	7,848
Dublin, Clontarf, and Sutton, . .	5,854
	13,702

The price in the commencement of the season was 13*s.* per barrel, but in the last week of March some sold as high as 25*s.*, and the average price for the whole may be stated at 17*s.* 9*d.* nearly, the sum total which they realized being £12,148 4*s.*, exclusive of freight and carriage to railway.

The number of boats engaged was from 106 to 108, and my return would now show a much larger total catch but for the unfavourable state of the weather nearly all through, particularly in the early part of the season. The following detailed monthly return will more clearly show the state of the weather for oyster dredging than perhaps any statement on the subject I could make, viz.:—

	Barrels.
January, total catch, . .	1,200
February, „ . . .	1,200
March, „ . . .	4,708
April, „ . . .	6,594
Total, . .	13,702

In the commencement of the season, owing to the cause stated, the boats were obliged to confine their operations to the inner or old beds where oysters are still scarce, but as it advanced they were enabled to venture out into deep water near the Arklow banks, to the recently discovered beds where oysters have been found much more plenty.

My opinions, sir, respecting the wisdom of the steps you have taken to prevent over-dredging on these beds remain unchanged, and I hold these opinions in the interest of the fishermen themselves, who have not only increased the number of dredging boats by one-half on this coast within the last few years, but also the means of catching oysters four-fold within the same period. The effect of this increased means of dredging on these beds was acknowledged by none more clearly in 1865 than by the fishermen themselves.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

P. MAHER.

APPENDIX No. 8.

OYSTER FISHERIES.

MEETING to consider an APPLICATION made to the COMMISSIONERS to RESCIND the ORDER issued on the 1st April, 1865, giving PERMISSION to DREDGE FOR OYSTERS in CLEW BAY, during part of the Close Season, for the supply of Private Oyster Beds in that Bay.

COURT-HOUSE, WESTPORT, Thursday, 21st January, 1869.

J. REDMOND BARRY, esq., presiding.

There is a large concourse of fishermen in attendance.

Mr. Charles O'Malley, instructed by Mr. A. B. Kelly, appears in support of the application.

Mr. Barry.—It is proper to inform you, gentlemen, in the first instance, that this meeting has been called in consequence of a certain relaxation of the strict laws of the Legislature, in reference to the stocking of private beds within Clew Bay. There exists at present a by-law restricting the taking of oysters of unstatutable size. No oysters can, during the open or close time, be removed which are of dimensions less than 2½ inches, that is, that will pass through a ring of that dimension. The Order of April, '65, permits dredging on the public bed during the close season, for the purpose of stocking the private beds in the bay, and this is the Order which it is now sought to repeal. It has been in operation now for nearly four years. It is alleged that considerable abuse of the relaxation of the Order has taken place. It has been alleged that the public beds have been exhausted to a most extravagant extent, and that if this state of things continue, Clew Bay will become altogether barren. It was not without due consideration and deliberate inquiry the Commissioners adopted this relaxation, which it is now sought to repeal. Several intelligent persons of capital and skill having established beds in this bay, it became necessary to afford them all possible facility for the stocking of these beds. The parties were therefore permitted, during a limited period of the close season, to take oysters from the public beds for the purpose, solely, of stocking the private beds formed in the bay. Whether that restriction has been observed is a most important question. If the beds were dredged, under that permission, indiscriminately for all purposes, for the purpose of exporting to distant places oysters of every description that could be had, it has been distinctly an abuse of the relaxation which was intended for the benefit of persons having beds in the bay, by enabling them to stock their beds. Applications have been made, from time to time, by individuals in other places, to request that permission be given them to take oysters out of bays, to stock beds out of those bays. To these applications we have given a direct negative. We have decided that, during the relaxation, no oyster shall be removed out of the bay; and that the oysters that may be removed, in the open time, must have acquired the statutable size, so that they shall have done their duty by spatting, and thus benefit and increase the stock generally in the bay. Again, I must observe that complaints have reached us that the relaxation has been abused in this bay. It is alleged, on the one hand, that oysters taken in the close season, have been taken out of the beds, and transferred directly to England and other distant places. It is further alleged that parties purchased oysters of an immature description, and having laid them on beds have been in the habit, before the oysters had attained that degree of maturity that would enable them to fructify and increase the stock generally in the bay, of taking them off in that immature state, and shipping them to England and other distant places. Whether that had been done or not, we will be informed on authority. This was communicated to us, as far back as June, last year. The memorial now before us, signed by numerous operative fishermen, and by three or four highly influential and highly respectable individuals, was received by the Commissioners. I need hardly observe that such an authentication is always important, but especially in cases of this kind, for all the other signatures would appear to be in the same hand. The memorial is of the ordinary class, but a memorial carries weight with it when authenticated by the signatures of such respectable individuals. The individuals to whom I allude, and whose names are appended to the memorial, are the Rev. M. O'Donnell P.P., Kilmeena; Sir George O'Donel, D.L., J.P., Newport House; the Rev. Richard Prendergast, P.P., Newport; and there is a further authentification by the Rev. Giles Eyre, Rector of Kilmeena. The signatures of these gentlemen are calculated to give currency to any memorial to which they may be appended. I may tell you that, at the time that memorial was received, the whole process of oyster legislation was in a state of mutation. A Bill was going through Parliament which we attended to. Many provisions of the Bill were sustained, and there were provisions, also, which we saved the country from. I should mention that this legislation was adopted on the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners, authorized to inquire into the fisheries of both countries. Measures were adopted with regard to England, and have been consented to with regard to France. It is specially called the French Convention Act, entered into with France, instead of another Convention that was considered too stringent in its operation. We attended to this Bill in all its stages, and we can flatter ourselves that the changes we were enabled to effect were, in some degree, beneficial. What these referred to was the close time for oysters. The Act was commonly called the Convention Act of last Session. I have alluded to it because its whole tendency was against restriction, and for freedom of trade in the capture of oysters. If we were implicitly to adopt the views taken by the framers of that measure, we should, perhaps, be rather disposed further to relax than to diminish the degree of relaxation which we had been unwillingly induced to adopt. In this memorial we are called upon by practical men—by the operative dredgers of the country—by those who are supposed to know the subject; and we are also called on by gentlemen of high name and character, to annul that degree of relaxation that we adopted in 1865. Although we may be still in favour of some stringent restrictions, and for the time for rest originally decided on, it does not by any means follow that we should not think that there are cases of exception, where relaxation may be judiciously adopted, as well as cases where such relaxation would be attended with effects mischievous, if not abusive. It will be for the applicants to prove whether it was through these mischievous practices the stock decreased in the bay; and if it be, and that their mind is thoroughly convinced that it is so, I anticipate that the Commissioners, with whom I act, will have very little difficulty in repealing the Order complained of. But, I tell you very candidly, we will have to get strong proof, because, in repealing it, we have to beard the most intelligent and experienced persons in England and France; by increasing the restrictions we have to beard an Order of the day. I will now proceed to read the memorial and the Order, and I will then call upon those gentlemen who are at the head of the memorial, either by themselves or by their professional men, to prove the contents of the memorial. I am, indeed, glad to find that my learned friend (Mr. O'Malley) is engaged in the case, for I know he will do everything on this occasion consistent with his professional habits, and that he will select the most intelligent of his witnesses, and not inundate us with evidence of minor importance.

The memorial and notice of meeting are here read.

Mr. O'Malley said—The memorial represents a great number of people for whom I appear, sir; persons to whom the oyster fishery is important, who derive their chief means of support from it, and who are not like those who have other means to depend on. Those people come here to-day with the full confidence they have ever felt when coming before you, sir. They ask the Commissioners to restrict the dredging altogether in the close season for all beds. They feel that the oyster beds should have rest; and they put it to you in this way, sir; and it certainly appears very natural and very reasonable. The people say that if you want a field sown with corn to give grain, it must not be continually harrowed by any party; and they say if you want oysters to come from the ground, that ground must not be continually dredged by any party. These men come before the Court in great numbers to-day; they have large families who are engaged in the oyster fisheries, and who are trusting to their industry for support. They ask you to restrict the dredging on the public beds by the owners of private beds, and all parties in the close season; and that seems to me, sir, to be a very reasonable request. What I would wish to impress on you, sir, is this, that it appears very satisfactory to see the people so much alive to their own interests. They want to restrict all parties in the close season. The parties whom I will produce will point out to you, sir, that most ingenious efforts are made to pick up the oysters off the public beds in the close season. Long poles are used with leather bags, bound with iron rims and a hook attached, with which the beds are scraped for oysters in the close season. The poor people seeing that, come naturally with their honest appeal before the Commissioner, asking entire restriction during the close season. I am glad to see such a proof of their anxiety not to interfere with, or unduly press on, the oyster grounds in the close season. This is a most laudable feeling to find now existing amongst the people. They do not want to take the oysters just coming to maturity; they wish to allow the spatting to take place undisturbed. I am not aware, sir, that the application of these men whose living depends on the fishery, and who should be supported and encouraged, is opposed by any party having an estate on the shores of the bay. The people come here under the name and approbation of their parish priest and of the minister; and they come here, too, sir, under the name and approbation of one of the most respectable gentlemen in the province, Sir George O'Donel. I will not occupy your valuable time, sir, by examining all these people, but give you the evidence of two or three witnesses, and that will be sufficient for all my purposes.

John Nolan sworn, and examined by Mr. O'Malley.

You deal in oysters and are a dredger?—I am. I am dredging since '21 down to the present.

You know Clew Bay well?—I do, well.

Have you observed the progress of the dredging since parties resorted to dredging in the close season?—Yes, sir.

Will you tell the Commissioner what effect that dredging in the close season has on the oyster trade?—I think the dredging at that time drags up the ground and drives off the spat to the sea.

Since the parties were allowed to dredge in the close season, have the oysters diminished or got less?—They have got less, sir.

Have you attributed the oysters becoming less in number to the dredging in the close season?—Yes; we have not the number of oysters we had before they dredged in the close season. I dredged in '22, and it was a smart year; and where I dredged twenty buddaghans, now it is dredged in the close season of the year and I could not get a dozen oysters from it.

Do you remember the way in which parties have been dredging in the close season?—Some of them be picking up the oysters with poles.

Describe how it is done?—It is a lath they have with a bag and a hook at the end, and they could pick them up at twelve feet deep.

Who are the parties?—A good deal of the neighbours. I saw them going to the beds.

Are not a good deal of them carried out of the bay in the close season?—And to their own beds.

But can they be carried out of the bay if the partic like?—They can; but if the oysters are disturbed i the spawning season it will destroy all the beds, an they will become barren altogether.

Are the people anxious generally to extend the clos season?—They are anxious to stop fishing at the en of January.

What place do you reside?—At Ardkill; myself, m father, my grandfather, and great grandfather, lived i that townland.

Mr. Barry.—On what side of the bay is that?—O the west side of the chapel of Island.

Mr. O'Malley.—I will not trouble you, sir, with an more questions. I do not wish to be taking up tim and I know the witness is safe in your hands, to as him any further questions you please, sir.

Mr. Barry.—Do you continue to dredge yourse still?—Up to this, sir.

Do you dredge whenever you are permitted durin the year?—There was permission of late to dredge dur ing the close season, but I did not dredge, because i would destroy myself.

Mr. Barry.—Very right, if you thought so. I wis every one would do the same, and not avail themselve of any law, if they believed in their conscience it pre judiced the bay. Do you ever leave this country?—never left it but once.

When?—At the beginning of the bad times.

Latterly you did not?—No.

You were at liberty to dredge at any time the la permits it, and you did not?—I did not.

What is your principal pursuit in life?—What is m principal pursuit? Faith myself and my family, an the most of that crowd of people, your honor, would b in the workhouse only for the oysters.

And is it your opinion that the dredging in the clos season is injurious?—I am sure it is the ruin of it.

Your reason for that belief is that the dredging i the close season raises the shells and destroys the spat?—Yes, sir.

You think it injures the bed itself?—I know it de stroys it.

What would you think of the man who would be fo not having a close season at all?—I would say to th man who would say it, that that man would be wrong

Have you any reason to believe that any of thos oysters that are taken in the close season are taken ou of the bay?—I do not know where they be taken.

But you do not know of any vessels coming into th bay and dredging on the beds, and then taking awa the oysters?—Some were taken by the Murrisk people but I cannot say where they took them to.

Have you any reason to believe they took them ou of the bay?—No.

Mr. O'Malley to witness.—The oysters may be sen to England for all you know?—They may send then where they like.

Mr. Barry.—Would a row-boat take them to Eng land?—No.

Are there oysters generally taken by row-boats o by large vessels?—By row-boats.

Do the hookers dredge for oysters?—No, they buy them.

Have you seen hookers loaded with them in the clos season, and take them away?—I have not, sir.

Mr. Barry.—Any person taking an opposite view o this case, is at liberty to ask this witness any questio he may think proper.

William Casey sworn, and examined by Mr. O'Malley.

Where do you live?—In Culleen Island, in Clew Bay

How long are you devoted to dredging oysters i Clew Bay?—Twenty years.

Do you remember the time before the leave wa granted for dredging in the close season?—I do, sir.

Now, since that time, what has been the effect of tha permission on the oysters? Have they increased o grown less?—It is dredging in the close season sinc that time, for these three or four years outside, tha made us leave it this year, for we could not get an oy ter.

That is, the beds that have been dredged in the close season?—With these poles.

And with dredgers?—They dredge every way.

Are you in the habit of going to England?—No.

Do you dredge in the close season yourself?—No.

You could if you liked; what is the reason you did not dredge in the close season?—In the hopes that we would not do away with these beds altogether; that they would not grow barren altogether.

You try to prevent dredging in the close season?—I do.

Did you ever prevent them?—We did; we were going to prevent the people from Murrisk, but it was against the by-laws, and we did not like to stop them. When October came, where we should always get oysters, when we went to this place, where the Murrisk people were, we could not get 1s. a day; and in the places we used not to go to, in the inner beds, on Newport side, we could earn a £1 a day, and more.

Mr. Barry.—Have you seen the people dredging in the close season?—Yes.

What class of boats are used?—The Murrisk people had the boats that Mr. Gann had, the common row-boats.

Did you ever see any hookers on that ground at the time of dredging?—Not at the time when dredging.

Where are the oysters put?—Well, I don't know. On Mr. Gann's first; they are put on the private beds first.

Have you ever known any case of oysters being taken off the public beds in the close season, and put into hookers and taken out of the bay?—We heard it; I did not see it done, but I always heard it.

Why did you not see about it?—We saw smacks coming for oysters; some of them came at this season and took oysters away.

At this season?—In part of the close season.

You have seen smacks coming and taking away oysters during part of the close season?—I did.

Whose were the smacks?—Mr. Gann's, I suppose.

Did they take them out of the bay in the close season?—I do not know.

Did you ever see them taken directly out of the public bed, and taken away out of the bay?—I did not.

Is it your opinion that, if dredging be continued in the close season, the public beds will become useless?—It is, sir, and all that crowd of men there about you are of that opinion; from what I saw of the beds for these last years, if the dredging in the close season be continued, they will become altogether useless.

Mr. Barry.—I may mention to you a very important fact that I have learned in Sligo within the last few days. It was stated by one of the largest cultivators in that part of the country, Mr. Michael Barrett, who, I suppose, is known to some of you. I incidentally asked him what was the supply of oysters this season?—"Well," said he, "it pleases me beyond measure, for all these grounds that we thought were poached were this year the most productive. We did not think we would get a single oyster there, and this year they were most productive."

Mr. Gann.—He states he saw smacks on the ground during the close season.

Witness.—Not during the close season; in part of the close season.

Mr. Gann.—I should like to know what year, or if he ever knew that a smack of mine left with oysters from April to October?—I saw a smack two or three years ago.

A Dredger.—I saw them going last April on board the steamer; Tom Grady told me they were yours.

James Macnamara, sworn.

To Mr. O'Malley.—I live in the lower bay and devote my whole time to dredging in the open season. I could dredge if I liked in the close time, but I do not, because I know it would destroy the beds; I have tried to prevent others from dredging in the close time. I did all I could to prevent it; I am aware that oysters have been taken out of the bay during the close time. I saw oysters shipped by Mr. Gann on board the steam boat on the 8th April last. I swear it is an injury to the public property to dredge in the close time. If dredging is carried on in the close time, the beds will become totally useless. They use every means of dredging in the close time, dredges, windlasses, and poles with a knife and bag. I have often dredged at the commencement of the open season in places which had been dredged in the close time, and I found it not worth my while to continue there, as I could not earn 1s. a day. I am not in the habit of going out of the country for harvest work. I went to Scotland last summer twelve months, and for a short time last summer, but I am not in the habit of going, and could dredge in the close time if I wished.

(To Mr. Barry).—I have constantly seen the dredging going on in the close time. The boats used then are the ordinary rowing-boats, such boats could not carry oysters out of the bay for the purposes of export. I have not seen smacks carrying oysters out of the bay during the close time. I believe that the oysters taken in the close time are sold for stocking private beds; but, on the 8th April, I saw oysters put on board the steam boat at the quay at Westport, and I was told that they belonged to Mr Gann. I have tried the ground that was fished in the close time and could not get anything; I then went to other beds, three miles off, that were not fished in the close time, and found them very productive.

Thomas Geraghty, sworn, examined by Mr. O'Malley.

I live in the parish of Kilmeena, I am an oyster dredger; since Captain Austin began to take the oysters in the bay I have frequently seen parties dredging with poles in the close time, and taking up everything, large and small. I have not dredged in the close time, because I know it would be the destruction of the beds. I have prevented others from dredging in the close time for that reason; why should we let the bread be taken out of our mouths? dredging has disimproved the beds. It is the universal feeling of all the people that it is highly injurious to dredge in the close time. The boats used in the close time are not hookers, they are the common row-boats, and smaller than row-boats.

James Browne sworn, examined by Mr. O'Malley.

I am acquainted with the oyster dredging in the upper bay. I am an overseer of a bed belonging to an Englishman. The mode of proceeding is when they take away all they can with the dredge, they come with poles with knives and bags attached, and pick up every oyster that is left. I have twenty-two years' knowledge of this bay; and it is the general feeling that the beds dredged in the close time are injured and will be ultimately exhausted. It is the general feeling of the people that dredging in the close time is most injurious. I have had several communications with the people about dredging in the close time, and they admitted that they made very little of it. I said to them that they were only injuring themselves, and they said we don't care, when we clean out our own beds we will go down to the lower bay. I have seen beds dredged in the close time, and I saw that the people made very little of them in the year after.

Patrick Heraty sworn, examined by Mr. O'Malley.

I live at Rossmeennia. I am not in the habit of going to England for work. I have been in the habit of dredging for several years. I would not for anything dredge in the close time, because it would be injurious to the oysters and destroy the beds. I have frequently seen persons dredging in the close season. The beds dredged in the close time are injured very much by the process. I dredged upon some of these beds yesterday, and I could not earn 6*d*. where I used to earn £1 in the day. If the practice is continued for one year, we will not have an oyster in the bay. All the oysters taken in the close time are not sold for stocking the private beds. I have frequently seen them taking oysters with poles in the close time and selling them to the bathers who come here in summer time.

To Mr. Barry.—I know it is the practice with some people to take the oysters in the close time and sell them on the shore for eating. I have seen this done frequently; dredging is my principal occupation. I have often gone to fish upon ground fished in the close time, and I could not get anything, and then I would go to other places not dredged in the close time, and there I would get plenty.

James Browne sworn, examined by Mr. O'Malley.

I live at Rossmeennia and know this bay well. I am in the habit of dredging. I dredged last year in the close time for the first time, because they came dredging close to the place where I live. I tried to prevent them, but when I could not succeed I dredged myself in order that they should not get all. When that dredging was over and in a short time there was no oysters left, and we were forced to go six miles away from home, where we found plenty of oysters.

To Mr. Barry.—After the permission was given the people dredged in the close time. The upper bay has been dredged every year since in the close time, and the supply has decreased every year, and more so this last year. The public would not be allowed by the people to go down and dredge in the lower bay during the close time. It is the common practice to prevent it in the lower bay, and that is the reason of the lower bay being so much better than the upper. The feeling of all the people upper and lower is against dredging in the close time. The people in the upper bay object to it as much as the lower, except the Murrisk men.

Mr. O'Malley.—I think I need not trouble you with further testimony. I have a hundred witnesses here who are prepared to give similar evidence, but what has been stated by these witnesses is the universal feeling of the people. Are you all of opinion that dredging in the close time is injurious to the fishery, and that the Commissioners should not allow it to continue?

Here there is a universal cry of "we are," and strong feelings are expressed.

Mr. O'Malley then closes his case.

Mr. William Gann sworn.

I have been here three or four years, and have seen the dredging in the close time, and watched the results. In the first two years after the permission was given there was very little dredging, in consequence of the threats of the people who did not wish to dredge. For the last two years we have been allowed to dredge round our beds for about a mile, and upon these beds some of the boats have earned £20 each by dredging in July, August, and September. It is not to be expected that a bed will yield as good a supply after being dredged for some time as it did at first, but if dredged down so as to yield only a very small quantity, it will be more prolific next year than if it had not been dredged at all. There are places that were dredged down to a stone and a stone and a half in 1867, and upon the same places in 1868, each boat got from three to four buddaghan a day for about three weeks or a month, when of course the supply again became slack, and that will and must be the case with every bed. It is the same in the lower bay. At the beginning of the season they caught from two to five buddaghan a day per boat, and now they cannot get in the same place more than from three to six stone. But the quantity of oysters in the bay has been steadily increasing. I have made a careful calculation from my own books and by inquiry from others, and I find that the quantity of oysters sold by the dredgers in Clew Bay was, in 1866,	.	10,050 buddaghan.

1868,	.	15,900 „

The buddaghan is six stone, and the price paid was 6*s*. per buddaghan, or 1*s*. a stone. That was the quantity sold all through the year, close time and all. It is the practice to try the same ground every year, and from year to year to dredge it down to a very small yield, say a stone per boat per day, and then coming upon the same ground in nine months after in the following season, they get from two to four buddaghan per boat per day for about a month, and then the quantity grows less; the dredging is stopped after some time, and resumed the following season with the same results. It is my firm belief that this dredging in the close time is a decided benefit to the bay, for you not only catch the oysters but you prevent the growth of weeds, you cleanse the beds, and fit them for the reception of the spat which must inevitably be lost if it falls upon dirt or dirty shells. I do not believe that it is the practice to send out of the bay oysters taken in the close time. I have never heard of oysters being taken out of the bay in the close time. There is not a general or any export of oysters out of the bay in the close time. I do not believe that it is the practice of any person having a private bed in the bay to send oysters out of it in the close time, or to send small oysters out of it at any time. The oysters for export are always culled and the small left upon the ground. Small oysters would not live through the passage to England, and those that might survive would be killed by the first frost. I believe it is the practice to deposit on the private beds the oysters taken in the close time. I do not believe that over ten buddaghan are taken on shore throughout the whole close time. They are all deposited on the private beds, and not taken from these beds for export until they are the statutable size. I believe that an oyster of that size has done its work by spatting but it has not done all its work.

I wish to observe with regard to the statement made by the witness as to the shipping of oysters on the 8th of April, that these oysters were taken and ready for shipping before the first of April, but the steamer did not sail until the 8th, consequently the oysters were delayed until that date. I positively swear that they were all taken before the 1st of April.

Mr. Barry.—You say it is the practice of these people who fish during the close season, for the purposes of brood, to fish every year over the same ground?—Yes, it is.

Do you find it mischievous?—Not at all.

Is it your positive belief that this system of dredging during a portion of the close season has been injurious or otherwise to the general oyster fishery in Clew Bay?—It is my belief that it has been a benefit because during the close season it is the same as working on land, but I will not put it quite so stiff as Mr O'Malley put it. In dredging the beds you not alone catch the oyster but you destroy all weeds, and you clean the beds; whereas if you leave them undisturbed when the spat comes there is nothing but dirty shells for them.

Mr. Barry.—There are two important questions, which to you—the owner of an oyster bed—may not appear very delicate on my part to put to yourself, but I ask you as to the whole of these persons who have private beds in the bay, and with reference to the system that has been permitted of dredging during the close season. Do you believe that it has been the people's practice to take out of the bay the oysters that have been dredged during the close season?—No; I saw the men coming ashore, and I never saw as much as an oyster in the boat. I am not bound to search them, but I never saw an oyster with them.

But do you believe that there is a general export?—No; no shipping at all.

Do you believe it is the practice of the parties—I am not speaking of yourself—I do not ask you to state anything affecting yourself, because that would be contrary to law, and it would be unfair to ask you to criminate yourself. But do you believe it is the practice of those who have private beds to remove unstatutable oysters to be exported for the purpose of brood?—No, they never do; the large are culled from the small, and the small allowed to grow. I do not think that any man having a private bed would do so, because the passage to England is too long, and, if sent to England, they could not live on the journey, and they could not be taken to market. If a hard frost set in they would die.

I will wind up with one question. I ask you is it your belief that the great body of oysters dredged during the close season are taken to the private beds and that, though removed unmatured, they are left in the private beds until they have attained the size of statutable oysters?—I believe that they are taken to the beds in the bay until they reach that size, I believe the small oysters do not go to any place but to the private beds in the bay.

Mr. O'Malley.—I did not interfere, sir; this is all a matter of belief with him.

Did you tell this to men here to-day, that you would not oppose this memorial?—All I said was that I was going to speak the truth.

Mr. Barry.—I can very well understand why he would not say anything.

Mr. O'Malley to Witness.—You spoke of an account of the oysters taken in these places?—I have been on board of the watch-boats when the oysters were brought to me; I saw them dredging at Anagh, and I saw them catching the stuff.

When you buy in the close season do you buy shells and all sorts of things that are brought to you?—Not when I can help it.

Witness Casey.—Do you buy spat shells?—

Witness.—That is nothing to you. I did for the purpose of cultivating my own beds, from June to October. I buy small shells during the close season for the stocking of my own beds.

Here there was a strong ebullition of feeling. Some person cried out they would put a stop to it if the law did not, and this declaration was received with sympathizing shouts.

Mr. O'Malley said that Mr. Gann's words were no answer to the application: The entire people who lived by the fishery were there of one mind and on the one word. Only one person, and that a person who benefited by the system, came forward to oppose the application. There were hundreds of people whom he (counsel) could examine, but he would not trespass on the time of the Commissioner by overloading him with evidence.

Mr. Barry.—I will ask one question, which should be answered, and not by a shout.

Mr. O'Malley, to the people.—Answer the Commissioner respectfully.

Mr. Barry.—We are come to inquire into a representation that injury has been done by dredging in the close season. It is alleged that no person but Mr. Gann is here to oppose that representation, and to oppose the application that the dredging in the close season for stocking private beds be discontinued. I ask now if there is any man here whose earning or livelihood is increased, and who would be likely to be benefited if the permission for this dredging lasted.

John Groden.—I am one man who differs from what has been said.

John Groden here came forward and was sworn.

To Mr. Barry.—I am an oyster dredger for the last twenty years, until the last two years; now my place is taken by my two sons. I know the regulation as to dredging in the close time; upon my oath the exercise of the permission granted by the Commissioners has not tended to injure the oyster fishery of the bay, but, on the contrary, it has improved the fishery. I have known beds in the bay which we have dredged down to two stone a day and then gave it up, and coming on these very places again we would dredge from two to four buddaghan a day, and then in about two months we would reduce the supply to about two stone again, and the supply again in the following season would be from two to four buddaghan a day. It is my firm belief that the dredging in the close time makes the ground wholesome; we dredge for our own benefit and not as servants to Mr. Gann. We sell all the oysters we get to Mr. Gann. Upon my oath I never removed any oysters out of the bay in the close time, nor did I ever know any to be removed. I believe that all the people who dredge in the close time, dredge for stocking the beds alone. I never knew of oysters being taken out of the bay in the close—

To Mr. O'Malley.—I live at Murrisk. I am a tenant of Mrs. Garvey, who is the mother-in-law of Mr. Gann. I have not been dredging there these two or three years. I did not dredge this year upon a bed that had been dredged in the close time, but my sons did and I got the fruits of their labour.

Have your sons gone down as far as Achill this year?—They did.

Why did they go down if the beds were so good that were dredged in the close season?—I suppose for their own benefit.

How many miles did they go down Achill?—I could not say.

Did they go forty?—I could not swear.

Was it twenty?—I could not say.

You could not swear forty?—I could not swear the exact distance.

You will not swear that they did not get these buddaghans of oysters you speak of off the beds that were belonging to those people here?—I will not

Where are your sons?—They may be in Murrisk, and they may be in Achill.

A safe answer, Master Groden; your sons dredged the whole of the open season?—Not the whole of the time.

It was generally in the lower bay, and in Achill they dredged?—I would be down in the lower bay were it not for these threats.

Were your sons not down in the lower bay, sir?—They were.

I will not ask this man any more questions. Go down, sir.

Michael Roddy, sworn, examined by Mr. Barry.

It is my firm belief that there is not any mischief to the oyster fishery in the bay by this permission to dredge in the close time; that is my firm belief. I have dredged in the close time, and in this ground where it is dredged in the close time I have found it is more productive than the other places in the following season. I dredged in beds, in the close time of 1867, until I could get no more than four stone, and I dredged there again this last year, and I got from two to four buddaghans a day.

To Mr. O'Malley.—You cannot always continue in this same place, and when you clean out one place of course you must go to another?—I went to Achill this year to benefit myself in the open sea. I am a tenant to Mrs. Garvey. I sold my oysters to Mr. Gann.

To Mr. Barry.—I am sure that, as far as my knowledge goes, by the dredging in the close time the beds are cleared of weeds and dirt, and the oysters then rest upon the hard ground, and are not carried away by the floating weeds. The quantity I got in 1868 was greater than I got in '67, in the same ground.

To Mr. O'Malley.—I dredged at Achill in the open sea, as well as in other parts in 1868. I dredged at Achill in '67 also. I never heard it said by the Murrisk men that they would exhaust the Murrisk beds first and then go down to Achill. I did not go to Achill before '67, because it was only then we heard, for the first time, that there were oysters there in plenty. I did not go to the lower bay in '67 or '68, I went to Achill.

This closed the inquiry.

The two last witnesses gave their evidence manifestly under great apprehension. Mr. Barry endeavoured to re-assure them, and threatened the utmost severity of the law if any violence was offered to these men; but, before leaving Westport, I learned that Roddy was assaulted on his way home.

J. P. BROPHY.

24th January, 1869.

I annex a letter from Captain Austin, dated 18th January last, received at Westport on the morning of the meeting.

J. P. B.

The Precincts, Canterbury,
January 18th, 1869.

SIR,—I regret to find that the state of my health unfortunately precludes my taking the long journey to be present at the meeting about to be holden on the 21st instant, at Westport, to inquire into the advisability of rescinding the Order made in April, 1865, giving permission to dredge for oysters in the close time in Clew Bay.

I should regret very much that the meeting should be held without my being enabled to give my opinion on the subject, being so deeply interested in the result. I have, therefore, to request you will be good enough to give this letter to the Commissioner attending the meeting, that it may be added to other evidence then given.

Appendix.

Oyster Fisheries, Clew Bay.

The wise measures adopted by the Commissioners in fostering the Clew Bay Fishery, have enabled me to establish there the largest private oyster fishery in Ireland, in which I have sunk a very large capital—the annual amount expended in labour, &c., exceeding £5,000. This is, and has been, an immense boon to the inhabitants of the bay; and amongst the measures adopted by the Commissioners, the Order made on the 1st April, 1865, has been in many ways one of the most beneficial; and I earnestly trust the Commissioners will not rescind it, and thus injure a thriving fishery, without grave consideration. It has been of the greatest service to me in enabling me to plant and supply the licensed beds, and to the surrounding poor, in finding them employment at a time when any other kind of work is difficult or impossible to be found; and experience has proved that the summer fishing has been most beneficial to the public beds thus worked in close time. They have continued to produce year by year a larger quantity of oysters as well as a far better quality. This is merely the result anticipated by myself, and is a well-known and established fact in all English fisheries, and will be seen proved by the evidence given before the Deep Sea Fishery Commissioners, at meetings held in those places in 1865.

When the Order was made in 1865, a number of the fishermen throughout the bay wished to take advantage of it and dredge, but a large majority decided that the by-law should be practically annulled, and they threatened to drown the occupants and smash up the boats of any person found dredging, and I derived therefore very small benefit for that year and the following season of 1866; but in 1867 and 1868 the fishermen in the neighbourhood of my beds succeeded in being allowed to dredge, and I obtained in those years between four and five hundred barrels. I believe that the parties wishing to rescind the Order give out tw reasons—

1st. "That the public beds are being exhausted."

2nd. "That none but those living in the close neigh bourhood to each respective public bed, have right to dredge thereon."

They, therefore, complain that other fishermen wh have dredged on other beds near them in the summe time have claimed to join and have joined in the fish ing of the public beds near the complainants.

As regards the first point, one fact is worth many argu ments, and I will show by the figures to be presente to the Commissioners, that so far from the beds havin been exhausted, there has been a continuous and ver rapidly increasing production each successive year sinc 1865, and indeed since the fishery has been established

As regards the second point, I believe the Commis sioners will not for a moment entertain the point, tha the particular villagers living opposite a public be have the sole right to fish there and exclude all other

I should be very unwilling in any way to injure s valuable a fishery; and I have always done my utmos to forward the interests of the fishermen of the ba without altogether studying my own pocket. It ha been this feeling which has prevented me accepting th services of a fleet of Essex boats, which has been man times offered me for service in Clew Bay.

I trust that the Commissioners will consider that th only ground given by the petitioners for rescinding th Order, viz., the exhausting of the public beds, will hav been refuted by the returns presented at the meetin I have been at great trouble to collect from my book and other sources, and to verify the returns, and I a sure there is no other person who has been in a pos tion to obtain such information.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your very obedient servant,

George Austin.

Sea Fisheries Act, 1868. Correspondence with the Board of Trade with regard to the Registry and Marking of Boats.

H. 3993.

Board of Trade (Harbour Department),
Whitehall, S.W., November 10, 1868.

Sir,—I am directed by the Board of Trade to acquaint you, for the information of the Public Works Commissioners, that upon the Royal assent being given to the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868, Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. Pennell were instructed to prepare and submit a draft of proposed regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of that Act with regard to the numbering, lettering, and registering boats.

I am further directed to transmit to you copies of the report made by those gentlemen to the Board of Trade, to which is appended a Draft of the Regulations proposed by them for consideration and to request that the Commissioners will favour this Board with any observations they may have to offer upon the proposed regulations, and especially with any suggestions as to the machinery and instruments for carrying them into effect.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

Sea Fisheries Act, 1868.

Regulations Proposed by the Board of Trade.

Office of Public Works,
Custom House, Dublin,
16th December, 1868.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 10th ultimo, enclosing draft of proposed regulations and requesting the observations of this Board thereon, and especially a suggestions they may have to offer in regard to t machinery and instruments for carrying these regul tions into effect, I am directed to state that as it a pears that under the Act of 1868 the certificates registry for the several classes of fishing boats must issued, and the record of registry kept by the Collect of Customs in their several collectorates, the Board s nothing to object to in the machinery, namely, t District Officers of Coast Guard, by which it is p posed to give effect to, and carry out, the system.

The Board beg to observe, however, that some i convenience may, and probably will, arise from t limits of the several collectorates and of the Coast Gua districts not being conterminous, as shown by the c closed map, and the same inconvenience will extend the returns from, and correspondence with, the Inspe ing Officers of the Coast Guard districts, to whom t Board must still look for local information regardi the fisheries, and without which information and turns they would, in fact, be unable to ascertain the isting condition of the Fisheries, or institute th comparisons between their past and existing st which are of so much statistical value.

In connexion with this subject the Board would l to refer to their Fishery Report for 1865 for their vie as to the manner in which the more efficient aid of Coast Guard Officers might be secured, and which t continue to think a most desirable object.

The Board have only to add that, in their opini the exception from the regulation for the marking buoys and fishing gear, which it is proposed to auth in the case of boats when employed in the Sco herring fishery would, with much advantage, at least the present, be extended to Irish boats engaged in the Irish fisheries generally; and they request that favourable consideration may be given to the proposition they accordingly submit.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

E. Hornsby, Secretary.

The Assistant Secretary,
Harbour Department,
Board of Trade, Whitehall, London.

H. 4461. Board of Trade (Harbour Department), Whitehall, S.W., 23rd Dec., 1868.

Sir,—I am directed by the Board of Trade to acknowledge your letter of the 16th instant, offering the observations of the Commissioners of Public Works upon the draft of the proposed regulations for carrying into effect the provisons of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868, as regard numbering, lettering, and registering sea fishing boats.

In reply I am to request that you will convey to the Commissioners the thanks of the Board of Trade for their valuable assistance and co-operation, and at the same time to transmit herewith for their information three copies of a reprint of the proposed regulations, in which are incorporated some suggestions made by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, which it is trusted will improve the working of the measure.

With regard to the inconvenience which the Commissioners of Public Works appear to apprehend may arise from the limits of the several collectorates and of the Coast Guard districts not being conterminous, the Board of Trade desire me to remark that they do not think that, at the present moment at least, there is sufficient reason to remodel the regulations, and they consider that it would be better to wait until the difficulty alluded to by the Commissioners practically arises. Should such a difficulty arise the Commissioners may rely upon the Board of Trade doing their utmost in concert with them to remove it.

With regard to the suggestions offered by the Commissioners, that the existing exemption from the regulation for the marking of buoys and fishing gear, which it is proposed to continue in the case of boats when employed in the Scotch herring fishery, would with much advantage, at least for the present, be extended to Irish boats engaged in the Irish fisheries generally. I am to state that after careful consideration the Board of Trade have come to the decision that it would be inexpedient to create fresh exceptions.

I am to request that in laying the enclosed printed papers before the Commissioners of Public Works you will state that any further suggestions or observations upon the amended regulations which the Commissioners may desire to offer will be received with pleasure by this Board, and that as it is extremely desirable that the regulations should be brought into operation as soon as possible, the favour of an early communication will be much valued.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

C. Cecil Trevor.

Appendix No. 10.

South of Ireland Fishing Company.

South of Ireland Fishing Company,
91, South Mall, Cork,

5519/'69. April 20, 1869.

Sir,—In compliance with the request contained in your favour of 5th instant, asking that information should be supplied for the Irish Fishery Commissioners as to the working of this Company since our last report, I beg to state in general terms that the Company is steadily progressing, and that the Directors, as well as those who have the conduct of the Company, have every confidence in its ultimate success.

Since our last report we have increased the number of our vessels and materially extended our operations. Having purchased the vessels and plant of the Messrs. Montgomery, at Howth; we have taken over the buildings and stores erected by them on the West Pier, and have secured the services of those experienced gentlemen as general managers of our Company.

Our fleet now consists of twenty-two luggers, fully found with trains, long lines, &c. Up to the present we have had to confine our operations to the three or four months' mackerel fishing at Kinsale, but having now acquired the concerns at Howth, with a resident manager there, it is our intention to follow up the mackerel fishing at Kinsale by the herring fishing on the east coast. We also contemplate trying the cod and ling fishing on the west coast, and establishing a curing house in some suitable locality there; our object being (while carefully protecting the interest of our shareholders) to develop, as far as we can, the Irish coast fisheries, and test as it were, bit by bit, their commercial value.

We have recently commenced manufacturing our own ropes, and making our own sails, which insures to us an article more suited to our wants than we otherwise could procure, and we have now under consideration the advisability of erection of machinery for the purpose of making our own netting.

The mackerel showed off this coast unusually early this season, fully a fortnight before the usual time, and the season opened most auspiciously, the crew of the first vessel that went in search of them having earned £100 in two nights' fishing.

As usual, the quantity of fish off the coast has varied with change of wind and weather, sometimes appearing in enormous quantities, and then almost disappearing altogether for days. In one night, recently, our vessels took 101,000, and might have doubled that quantity had the weather been moderate; but owing to the weight of fish meshed (while a heavy sea was running) some of the vessels had to cut away portions of their trains, being unable to carry the entire quantity in the net, even if they could get it on board. For the last fortnight, fishing has been light, and prices have in consequence ruled unusually high. The season which generally lasts to the end of June is still going on, and as there are at present large quantities of ice at Kinsale, which enhances the value of the fish (and which is sold at a reasonable rate) we have every reason to hope that it will be a remunerative season.

From 6th March to the 10th April, the Company's vessels have taken 280,000 mackerel, which varied in price from 9*s.* to 30*s.* a hogshead (120) according to circumstances. The accounts are not made up so as to enable me to give the money value, but the one-half the gross amount produced, and five per cent. additional, has been paid to the fishermen employed in the vessels.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

George Purcell, Secretary.

Order in Council.

APPENDIX No. 11.

At the COURT at OSBORNE HOUSE, ISLE OF WIGHT, the 29th day of April, 1869.

Present:—The Queen's most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas by "The Sea Fisheries Act, 1868," it is amongst other things enacted that the Irish Fishery Commissioners may, from time to time, lay before Her Majesty in Council, Bye-laws for the purpose of restricting or regulating the dredging for oysters on any oyster beds or banks situate within the distance of twenty miles, measured from a straight line drawn from the eastern part of Lambay Island to Carnsore Point, on the coast of Ireland, outside of the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands, and all such Bye-laws shall apply equally to all boats and persons on whom they may be binding, and that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to do all or any of the following things, namely:—

(a.) To direct that such Bye-laws shall be observed.

(b.) To impose penalties not exceeding twenty pounds for the breach of such Bye-laws.

(c.) To apply to the breach of such Bye-laws such (if any) of the enactments in force respecting the breach of the regulations respecting Irish Oyster Fisheries, within the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands, and with such modifications and alterations as may be found desirable.

(d.) To revoke or alter any Order so made.

Provided that the length of close time prescribed by any such Order shall not be shorter than that prescribed for the time being by the Irish Fishery Commissioners, in respect of beds or banks within the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands. And that every such Order shall be binding on all British sea fishing boats, and on any other sea fishing boats in that behalf specified in the Order, and on the crews of such boats:

And whereas the Irish Fishery Commissioners have made and laid before Her Majesty in Council a Bye-law, copy whereof is set forth in the schedule hereto annexed.

And whereas it has been made to appear to Her Majesty that the length of close time prescribed by the said Bye-law is not shorter than that now prescribed by the Irish Fishery Commissioners in respect of beds or banks within the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands:

Now, therefore, Her Majesty, in exercise of the power vested in Her by the said recited Act, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, is pleased to direct that the said Bye-law shall be observed.

Schedule.

We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, being Commissioners of Sea Fisheries, acting in pursuance of the sixty-seventh section of an Act passed in the session of Parliament of the thirty-first and thirty-second years of Her present Majesty, chapter forty-five, called "The Sea Fisheries Act, 1868," do hereby decide and appoint that the close time, during which it shall not be lawful to dredge for, take, catch, or destroy any oyster or oyster brood, on or off any part of the east and south-east coast of Ireland, within the distance of twenty miles, measured from a straight line drawn from the eastern point of Lambay Island, in the county of Dublin, to Carnsore Point, in the county of Wexford, outside the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands, shall be between the thirtieth day of April and the first day of September in each year.

REPORT.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY JOHN POYNTZ, EARL SPENCER, K.G.,

LORD LIEUTENANT-GENERAL AND GENERAL GOVERNOR OF IRELAND.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,

The 112th section of the 5th and 6th Victoria, chapter 106, directs that the Commissioners shall every year make a report to the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor of Ireland of the proceedings for the preceding year, and that such report should contain, as far as practicable, a statistical account of the fisheries, and—

The third section of the Act 32 Victoria, chapter 9, transferred all powers and duties vested in or imposed upon the Commissioners to the Inspectors of Fisheries appointed under that Act. So short a time has elapsed since our appointment as Inspectors that we have had but little opportunity of making such a personal examination as would enable us to report to your Excellency with any degree of satisfaction on the present state of the Salmon Fisheries of Ireland.

In point of fact we have only been able to hold preliminary meetings in five districts.

We trust this will sufficiently account for our confining ourselves in the present instance to a compilation of statistics in a tabular form, which we now submit herewith for your Excellency's information.

We have the honour to be,

Your Excellency's obedient servants,

THOMAS F. BRADY.

JOS. HAYES.

APPENDIX, No. 10.—ABSTRACT

Substance of Queries issued to Board of Conservators.	Replies received from Board of Conservators.
	1. DUBLIN.	2. WEXFORD.
1. The general state of the Salmon Fisheries. Has the take of fish increased or diminished since 1842? What are the causes to which you attribute such increase or diminution?	1. Favourable. Increased. A more systematic mode of protection.	1. Good. Increased. Preservation by water-bailiffs ing the close season.
2. Has the take of salmon been more or less productive in 1868 than in 1867, and to what do you attribute the increase or diminution?	2. Less by far. To drought.	2. Less—the water being low and bright.
3. The average price obtained for salmon last year by the captors?	3. 1*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.* per lb.	3. From 1*s.* to 1*s.* 4*d.*
4. Is salmon purchased for exportation; and, if so, what proportion does it bear to that purchased for home supply?	4. Generally for home consumption.	4. Generally for home supply.
5. The amount of protection rendered during the close season of 1868, as compared with preceding season of 1867.	5. About the same.	5. Greater.
6. Has the quantity of breeding fish been greater or less as compared with preceding year, 1867?	6. The same.	6. Greater.
7. About what period do the salmon commence to spawn in the several rivers in your district? What are the greatest spawning months? and when is the spawning over?	7. October and November. About the 20th December.	7. October and November. February. Early in Mar
8. At what period of the year, in each river in your district, are the first clean fish taken? When do the grilse begin to run? When are the spent fish well out of the river? and when does the great bulk of fry go to sea?	8. January. The January floods mostly clear the rivers of spent salmon. January and May.	8. Early in the month of March. Peal begin to ru the months of June and July. In the month of A In the months of March and April.
9. During the descent of the fry to the sea, is angling prohibited by any of the proprietors, or is it carried on during these months, and does much destruction take place?	9. During the months of May and June angling for fry under pretence of angling for trout is extensively carried on. The proprietors who give anglers leave to fish do not interfere.	9. It is not prohibited. Not much.
10. At what period of the year do the fish begin to be discoloured, or to get heavy in spawn; and what is the general opinion as to the proper season for angling in your district?	10. October. 1st of March to the 30th September.	10. October. From 1st March to 1st October.
11. Are there any pollutions, or other poisonous matter, entering the rivers in your district? If so, state the particular cases.	11. Yes; the tideway of the River Liffey receives the sewerage of all Dublin, and also discharges occasionally from sewers of the gas and chemical works on the north and south quays of Dublin.	11. None.
12. Have offences against the Fishery Laws increased or diminished?	12. Fishing for salmon under pretence of fishing for other fish is very common.	12. Diminished.
13. Give a list of the mill-weirs, or dams, or other obstructions in each river in your district; and specify where ladders or fish passes have been built, when, and by whom?	—	—
14. Give a list of all the fish ladders or passes built in your district, whether under the provisions of the Fishery Acts, or by the Board of Works or private individuals; and specify each locality?	—	14. None.

23. Are there any suggestions or general observations with which the Conservators may be disposed to favour the inspectors, with reference to the Salmon Fisheries?	—	23. That the rod-fishing commences too early and is open too late.
24. Are there any defects or deficiencies in the Acts of Parliament, for which, in your opinion, amendment is required? If so, state them in detail, and the remedy you would propose.	—	24. The principle of compelling an uniform close se throughout Ireland is incorrect. That the person u any engine should be licensed, and not the engine, the cases of rod-fishing many escape detection and without license. That a bye-law should be made prevent the fishermen at Cornwall and the upper p of the river taking their nets in boats when going Rossbare and other parts of the sea to fish and on ret ing it is impossible to prevent a breach of the law the close season. There is a bye-law at present in be but it only extends to the using of nets between bridge of Enniscorthy and Ferrycarrig in the close sea

STATEMENTS from Board of Conservators.

Replies received from Board of Conservators.
3. WATERFORD.	4. LISMORE.	5. CORK.
1. Fluctuating and uncertain.	1. Of late much increase since passing of Act of 26 and 27 Vic.	1. Tolerably good. Increased since 1842. Chiefly to the removal of bag-nets.
2. The season of 1868 more productive than that of 1867.	2. The take has been much less, especially in upper waters.	2. About average in the tidal waters, and in the fresh water the unprecedented drought seriously affected the supply to the upper waters.
3. Highest price, 2*s.* 10½*d.*, lowest, 9*d.* per lb.	3. About 1*s.* per lb.	3. Average price, 1*s.* 3*d.* per lb.
4. For exportation principally. About 200 exported to 1 for home use.	4. The greater part of the fish taken is for exportation.	4. Nearly seven-eighths for exportation.
5. About that of 1867.	5. About the same.	5. Amount of water-bailiff much less, in consequence of the funds being expended in fish-passes; but protection in consequence of a succession of high floods greater than in 1867.
6. Difficult to say.	6. Much greater, and the fish much larger and heavier.	6. In consequence of the succession of high floods this query cannot be answered.
7. November, December, and January are the great spawning months.	7. About 20th October. November, December, and January.	7. Spawning in the river Lee and its tributaries in November, but principally in December. In the Bandon and Arrigadeen rivers in December and January, chiefly.
—	8. About the first week in February. About 18th May, grilse. Spent fish are well out about 1st April. About March and April bulk of the fry go to sea.	8. In the river Lee a good fish can be had all the year round in season. Spring fish in great abundance are to be found in the Lee in January, February, and March, and in April and May provided they had sufficient water to pass up to the upper waters. Spring fish in the Bandon river in February, March, April, and May. Grilse in May, June, July, and August. If heavy floods, spent fish are well out in February. Fry pass down to the sea in March, April, and May, but it depends much on early floods.
9. Considerable destruction by means of angling annually takes place.	9. No prohibition by proprietors, and angling is carried on and much destruction takes place.	9. Angling for trout is not prohibited during the descent of fry to the sea by any of the proprietors of fisheries here. A good deal of injury is done by trout-anglers to the fry.
10. Rather generally discoloured in October, more so as the season advances, and get heavy in spawn in November, when many deposit it. To permit angling after other modes of fishing cease is to open the rivers to the destruction of the early spawners.	10. About 1st October. The season for angling should be from 15th February to 1st October.	10. Chiefly in November. Angling is fixed at about a fair season.
11. I am not aware of any.	11. Where gas-works are contiguous to rivers, as at Mallow and Fermoy.	11. From tan-yards and the gas-works in the tidal waters.
—	12. Minor offences decreased, but netting on Sunday nights more frequent.	12. Diminished gradually in comparison with many former years, but the prosecutions have been less in consequence of want of water-bailiffs.
—	—	14. The Bandon fish-pass, the Carrigrohane fish-pass, the Ballincollig fish-pass, built under the provisions of the Fishery Laws, at the cost of the Board of Conservators; and Cork Waterworks fish-pass in like manner, and partly with subscriptions from Corporation of Cork and from private persons. At Carrigaline mill-weir by the miller.
—	15. One at Glandillane.	15. At the Cork Waterworks very efficient gratings during the migration of fry, and at Carrigaline mills to prevent fry passing into the turbine there.
16. See Appendix.	16. See Appendix.	16. See Appendix.
18. None.	18. All drift-nets—a mode of fishing unknown before the stake-weirs were taken down.	18. None.
—	19. The numbers vary, as they are put on and struck off as occasion requires.	19. Twenty-three.

Appendix, No. 10.—Abstract

Substance of Queries issued to Board of Conservators.	Replies received from Board of Conservators.
	6. Skibbereen.	7. Bantry.
1. The general state of the Salmon Fisheries. Has the take of fish increased or diminished since 1842? What are the causes to which you attribute such increase or diminution?	1. With the exception of a few years there has been a considerable diminution of salmon and white trout since 1842; the river being so very late the salmon not entering it till June, and the close season commencing on the 16th September, and the fish running till latter end of December, there is generally too large a stock of breeding fish in the river, which is light and gravelly and not supplying sufficient food, the fry and large quantities of the ova are destroyed by the salmon and white trout.	1. Bad. Take decreased.
2. Has the take of salmon been more or less productive in 1868 than in 1867, and to what do you attribute the increase or diminution?	2. A considerable decrease, attributable to the same cause as specified above.	2. Much less in 1868.
3. The average price obtained for salmon last year by the captors?	3. So few taken that few were sold; the general price is 6*d.* per lb.	3. 5*d.*
4. Is salmon purchased for exportation; and, if so, what proportion does it bear to that purchased for home supply?	4. With exception of a few all sold at a contract price of 6*d.* per lb. to dealers in Cork.	4. All sent to Cork.
5. The amount of protection rendered during the close season of 1868, as compared with preceding season of 1867.	5. Good; three water-bailiffs are employed.	5. Same.
6. Has the quantity of breeding fish been greater or less as compared with preceding year, 1867?	6. Much less.	6. Less.
7. About what period do the salmon commence to spawn in the several rivers in your district? What are the greatest spawning months? and when is the spawning over?	7. About November; the early run fish in June and July (not many) spawn in November, the later run fish spawn in December, and a few in January.	7. November and December. January
8. At what period of the year, in each river in your district, are the first clean fish taken? When do the grilse begin to run? When are the spent fish well out of the river? and when does the great bulk of fry go to sea?	8. About an average of five or six salmon newly run are taken in May (none sooner), a few more in June and July. The principal run is in the floods of August, September, and October when the grilse run. Spent fish depart in March, the bulk of fry in April and May.	8. July. No grilse. Spent fish all out in February. A
9. During the descent of the fry to the sea, is angling prohibited by any of the proprietors, or is it carried on during these months, and does much destruction take place?	9. Little or no angling, except by boys during the descent of fry to the sea; there is no destruction of fry in the river of the district.	9. No. Fishing until after month of April.
10. At what period of the year do the fish begin to be discoloured, or to get heavy in spawn; and what is the general opinion as to the proper season for angling in your district?	10. A very few fish a long time in the rivers change colour in September, the breeding fish are heavy in spawn in November and December; the angling is so inconsiderable till August and September, very few fish till then.	10. Fish discolour very soon after ascending the river; d get heavy in spawn until the latter end of Novem From 1st June to 1st December.
11. Are there any pollutions, or other poisonous matter, entering the rivers in your district? If so, state the particular cases.	11. None.	11. None.
12. Have offences against the Fishery Laws increased or diminished?	12. They have not increased, some cases of active prosecution and heavy fines imposed have much checked them.	12. Decreased.
13. Give a list of the mill-weirs, or dams, or other obstructions in each river in your district; and specify where ladders or fish passes have been built, when, and by whom?	13. There are no mill-weirs on any of the rivers in the district except at Lurrigo, near Skibberreen, on which is an excellent fish-pass.	13. None.
14. Give a list of all the fish ladders or passes built in your district, whether under the provisions of the Fishery Acts, or by the Board of Works or private individuals; and specify each locality?	—	—
15. Have any gratings been attached to mill-leads, or other artificial channels; and, if so, specify the particular cases?	15. There are no gratings to any mill-dams; a grating is about to be erected to an artificial stream discharging at foot or near Lurrigo weirs which will prevent much destruction hitherto practised.	15. No.
16. State where and by whom fixed engines were used in 1868?	16. See Appendix.	16. See Appendix
17. Can you give a list of the prosecutions instituted by the Conservators during the year 1868?	—	—
18. Are there any new modes of fishing for salmon adopted in your district? If so, describe them, and where used.	18. None.	18. None.
19. Number of water-bailiffs employed by Conservators?	19. There are generally three employed, the Conservators' funds would not well admit of more; sometimes four employed.	19. Three.
20. Number employed in district by private individuals?	20. None; the Angling Association sometimes employ one.	20. Two.
21. For what length of time employed?	21. About six months.	21. From 24th of June to 14th January nearly consta
22. Rate of wages paid by the Conservators?	—	22. 5*s.* 6*d.* a week.
23. Are there any suggestions or general observations with which the Conservators may be disposed to favour the inspectors, with reference to the Salmon Fisheries?	23. The mouth of the River Ilen as defined by the Commissioners is not sufficiently extended seawards; a portion of the estuary, about 100 or 150 yards seawards, should be included in the portion reserved from net fishing. A most destructive portion of the estuary where nine-tenths of the salmon frequent at low waters and dry weather is barely outside the southern line of boundary, which would be included within the mouth of the river by an extension of 100 yards seawards, and no harm to the inland or upper part by removing it outwards.	23. We think the number of white trout ascendin rivers decidedly injurious to the fishing by feedin the salmon spawn.
24. Are there any defects or deficiencies in the Acts of Parliament, for which, in your opinion, amendment is required? If so, state them in detail, and the remedy you would propose.	24. There are some cases in which the Commissioners have no power to change the periods of close season, as fixed by Act of Parliament (one for instance, in the case of angling); it is apprehended that they should have a power where ample testimony or sworn evidence before them is produced to give them full power, viz., by law or otherwise to amend any and every existing difficulty to make required alterations.	24. We offer none.

8. KENMARE.	9. KILLARNEY.	10. LIMERICK.
1. Increased from strict preservation.	1. Diminished considerably.	1. The state of the Salmon Fisheries in this district generally is very satisfactory. The take of fish has very considerably increased since 1842, or rather since 1848; the cause of such increase is the protection afforded under the Act of the latter year, the 11 & 12 Vic., c. 92.
2. More; from extra protection.	2. Less.	2. The take of salmon in 1868 was less productive than in 1867. I cannot account for the diminution in the take of spring fish, but I attribute that of the Peal to the extreme heat and low water that prevailed during the entire of last summer.
3. 6½*d.* per lb.	3. About 16*d.* in spring; 6*d.* in summer.	3. About 1*s.* 4*d.* for spring fish, and 8*d.* for Peal per lb.
4. For exportation; home supply about 1 to 40.	4. All for exportation.	4. Almost exclusively for exportation; very little is retained for home consumption. I cannot state the proportion which the former bears to the latter.
5. About the same.	5. About the same.	5. This may be inferred from the amount paid in wages to water-bailiffs in each of these years. The sum paid in 1867 was £1,261 16*s.* 7*d.*; in 1868, £1,527 4*s.* 2*d.*
6. Greater.	6. Greater.	6. In some places, particularly in the more remote breeding places, the quantity has been less. The quantity occupying the spawning beds nearest the tide-way appears to be about the same this season as the last.
7. From the 20th of November until the 1st of January.	7. About the 20th of November. December and part of January. About the 1st of February.	7. The earliest period is about the beginning of December. The chief spawning time is from about the 20th of December to the end of January. The spawning season may be said to end about the 1st of February, although in some places a few fish may be seen on the beds as late as the middle of February.
8. Spring fish in May. Grilse run about the 18th of June.	8. On the Rivers Laune and Carah they commence to run about the 1st of November. About the 20th of May. About the 20th of April. April.	8. Clean fish might be taken in the River Shannon as early as the month of November; these are what are termed spring fish. The grilse begin to run generally about the last week in May. The spent fish cannot be said to be well out of the river before the first of that month. The great bulk of the fry go to the sea in April and May.
9. Angling is not prohibited, and much destruction has attended the fry when leaving the rivers.	9. Not prohibited. Some fry are destroyed.	9. No; angling is carried on during those months by those who fish for trout; but the destruction of fry is, comparatively, insignificant, now that eel nets are not allowed to be set during the spring of the year.
10. The fish gets discoloured in the rivers in October; the season for angling is good up to the 1st of November.	10. About the 1st of October. Not later than 1st October.	10. The discolouration of fish depends upon the length of time they are in the fresh water. Early run spring fish are often discoloured in the month of June. Peal generally begin to be discoloured about the month of August. They become heavy in spawn in September and October. The general opinion is that the month of October should be added to the close season for angling.

Appendix, No. 10.—Abstract

Substance of Queries issued to Board of Conservators.	Replies received from Board of Conservators.
	11. Galway.	12. Ballinakill.
1. The general state of the Salmon Fisheries. Has the take of fish increased or diminished since 1842? What are the causes to which you attribute such increase or diminution?	1. Not so good as a few years ago. The take of fish has increased considerably since 1842, owing to the operation of drainage works and better protection.	1. Salmon very scarce; hardly pay expenses.
2. Has the take of salmon been more or less productive in 1868 than in 1867, and to what do you attribute the increase or diminution?	2. Less productive, but I cannot undertake to assign a cause.	2. Less productive.
3. The average price obtained for salmon last year by the captors?	3. About 10*d.* or 11*d.* on the average.	3. About 6½*d.*
4. Is salmon purchased for exportation; and, if so, what proportion does it bear to that purchased for home supply?	4. Only about one-tenth sold in Galway, the balance sent to England.	4. All sold to Mr. Hector for exportation.
5. The amount of protection rendered during the close season of 1868, as compared with preceding season of 1867.	5. About the same as in 1867.	5. The same.
6. Has the quantity of breeding fish been greater or less as compared with preceding year, 1867?	6. The water being so high in all the rivers in this district during the spawning season, the salmon could not be seen, but as far as can be judged, there was a fair stock of breeding fish.	6. Less.
7. About what period do the salmon commence to spawn in the several rivers in your district? What are the greatest spawning months? and when is the spawning over?	7. About the 20th November. The month of December, is the great spawning time; five-sixths of the fish spawn in that month.	7. About the 15th October. December. About the fi week in January.
8. At what period of the year, in each river in your district, are the first clean fish taken? When do the grilse begin to run? When are the spent fish well out of the river? and when does the great bulk of fry go to sea?	8. In February in the Galway and Ballinahinch Fisheries. The grilse begin to run at the end of May. The great bulk of fry go to sea the same month.	8. In April. From middle of June. March. March t April.
9. During the descent of the fry to the sea, is angling prohibited by any of the proprietors, or is it carried on during these months, and does much destruction take place?	9. In Galway River trout fishing is prohibited; but angling for salmon, which does no injury to the fry, is allowed.	9. No prohibitions. Very little angling so early h None.
10. At what period of the year do the fish begin to be discoloured, or to get heavy in spawn; and what is the general opinion as to the proper season for angling in your district?	10. The fish begin to get discoloured by the end of July, and in the month of August they begin to get heavy in spawn.	10. September.
11. Are there any pollutions, or other poisonous matter, entering the rivers in your district? If so, state the particular cases.	11. None for the last year. Flax ponds, that would be ruinous to the fish have been secured, so as to prevent danger.	11. None.
12. Have offences against the Fishery Laws increased or diminished?	12. Diminished.	12. Diminished.
13. Give a list of the mill-weirs, or dams, or other obstructions in each river in your district; and specify where ladders or fish passes have been built, when, and by whom?	—	—
14. Give a list of all the fish ladders or passes built in your district, whether under the provisions of the Fishery Acts, or by the Board of Works or private individuals; and specify each locality?	—	—
15. Have any gratings been attached to mill-leads, or other artificial channels; and, if so, specify the particular cases?	15. No gratings are attached to mill-leads, and the result is that great destruction is done to the fish, especially in the town of Galway, and even in tributary rivers during the close season.	15. One grating to mill-lead at Louisburgh.
16. State where and by whom fixed engines were used in 1868?	16. See Appendix.	16. See Appendix.
17. Can you give a list of the prosecutions instituted by the Conservators during the year 1868?	—	—
18. Are there any new modes of fishing for salmon adopted in your district? If so, describe them, and where used.	18. None.	18. None.
19. Number of water-bailiffs employed by Conservators?	19. Thirty-one, including the Inspector.	19. Thirty-one.
20. Number employed in district by private individuals?	—	20. Fourteen.
21. For what length of time employed?	21. Generally, during the close season, except the Inspector and a few head bailiffs who are employed by the year.	21. One all the year; the others for the close season.
22. Rate of wages paid by the Conservators?	22. From £2 to £30.	22. One, £10 per year; others £1 10*s.* to £2 each.
23. Are there any suggestions or general observations with which the Conservators may be disposed to favour the inspectors, with reference to the Salmon Fisheries?	23. That the Inspectors be empowered to prohibit by bye-law, all angling in the month of October, in the districts where the fish are unseasonable during that month. Poachers are almost protected at present by reason of October being part of the open season for angling.	—
24. Are there any defects or deficiencies in the Acts of Parliament, for which, in your opinion, amendment is required? If so, state them in detail, and the remedy you would propose.	24. That mill owners be compelled to erect proper gratings above and below their mills, to protect the fish while descending to the sea, and ascending to the upper waters. It is suggested that magistrates be authorized to give search warrants for nets or other illegal engines for fishing during the close season, and that a penalty be imposed unless persons in whose possession they may be found can prove that such nets or engines were not used for illegally fishing for trout or salmon.	—

1. Declining. Diminished. There may be natural causes, but unquestionably the destruction of the brood fish by angling so late into the season, is a most serious injury.	1. Very bad. Diminished since 1842, although improving up to 1864. To the late Fishery Act.	1. On the whole good, but cannot say improved or diminished.
2. Generally rather less in 1868 than in 1867.	2. About the same.	2. A little more productive in 1868 than in 1867.
—	3. From 9*d.* to 10*d.* per lb.	3. About 6*d.* per lb.
4. For exportation.	4. Very little purchased for exportation.	4. None purchased for exportation.
5. Rather less means in the hands of the Conservators this year to apply to protection, but the proprietors have had in consequence to increase it.	5. By Conservators £70 12*s.* more.	5. The same; good protection.
6. Much less, and even of those a number killed in the last days of October by angling.	6. Considerably less.	6. The same; a good supply.
7. There are spawners from November onward. Main season draws toward the end of that month; no spawners from a week before Christmas. The exceptions are the rivers that fall into Lake Carrowmore; there the fish spawn from middle to end of December.	7. Salmon commence to spawn in this district in the latter end of October. November and December are the greatest spawning months. The spawning season is over about the middle of January.	7. The 1st of November; the greatest spawning months are November and December; the spawning is all done about the 1st of January.
8. As a rule it is not remunerative to fish earlier than May, when the first clean fish are caught in the rivers. Clean fish run up to Lake Carrowmore from Christmas onwards, and were fished at that period in the olden time, and clean fish taken. Grilse begin to appear about the 20th, or second springtide in June—the body of young fish not until much later—generally about the end of January, April, and May, and sometimes quantities in June, the season of fry being influenced by floods.	8. First clean fish are taken in the Moy on 1st of February, in the River Easky in the latter end of June, and in the Rathfran and Ballycastle in September. Grilse commence to run about the 1st May. Spent fish are not well out of the river until the middle of April, generally speaking. The great bulk of fry go to sea between the 1st of April and middle of May.	8. The first fish taken is in Sligo River, the 16th January; the rest of the rivers are not so early. The grilse begin to run the 26th of May; the spent fish are all out of the rivers in May; the bulk of the fry go to the sea in April.
9. The lessees endeavour to prevent the angling in April, to save the fry, but the proprietors do not fully support them, and much destruction takes place.	9. Only some of the proprietors prohibit angling for trout during the descent of the fry to sea, and much destruction, consequently, is done to them in those places where angling is permitted.	9. Angling is prohibited by the proprietors until the fry get off to the sea.
10. The autumn floods of September greatly changes the fish, and they increase in heaviness the whole month of October. They are almost entirely discoloured by the end of September, and in Lake Carrowmore by the end of July. No angling should be later than the middle or the end of September.	10. Fish begin to get discoloured about the middle of August. The general opinion is that angling for salmon should cease on 15th September.	10. The fish get discoloured in July, and get heavy in spawn in August; the proper time for angling from the 1st of February to the 20th of August.
11. None.	11. None, except flax water.	11. None.
12. The continuance of strict preservation tend to decrease them.	12. Thought to be more, but in consequence of the intimidation to water-keepers, there have not been so many prosecutions.	12. Diminished.

14. None.	14. Only one fish ladder in this district, upon the Mohemas River, near Turlow, built by the Board of Works.	14. A fish ladder has been built in Colooney, by E. J. Cooper, esq., and in Ballisodare River; also one built in Sligo River, by the Board of Works, about nine years ago.
15. No mills of consequence in the district.	15. Very few gratings have been placed in any of the mill-leads. We have no other artificial channels in the rivers in this district.	15. There are gratings to all the mills on the upstream side.
16. See Appendix.	16. See Appendix.	16. See Appendix.
18. None.	18. Draft nets in the upper waters (not in use previous to statute of 1863), eight of which are now in use betwixt Ballina and Foxford.	18. None.
19. The Conservators allocate their funds amongst the men, more fully paid by the lessees and proprietors to whom they advise same.	19. Fifty-eight.	19. Twenty-nine water bailiffs employed by the Conservators.
20. About sixty.	20. About two hundred and fifty.	20. Fifty-two water bailiffs employed by private individuals.
21. Generally six months.	21. Principally during close season.	21. Some for the close season, and some for the year.
22. They contribute from their funds about 17*s.* to each man; but wages from lessees are from £15 to £5, according to duty.	22. From £1 to £10, according to circumstances.	22. £2 10*s.* for the close season, and £3 for the year.
23.	23. To direct your attention to the resolutions of the Conservators, passed at their meeting upon the 10th of October, 1864, with reference to the open season for angling; also to resolutions passed by them at their meeting upon 23rd April, 1866, 3rd of October, 1867, and upon the last day of meeting; copies of the three former accompanying this.	23. None.
24. Same as above.	24. Defects and deficiencies are considerable, and I hope to be able to present them in detail at the Inspectors' meeting in Ballina, on 5th February next.	24. Angling extends too far into the close season, when fish get discoloured and heavy.

APPENDIX, No. 10.—ABSTRACT

Substance of Queries issued to Board of Conservators.	Replies received from Board of Conservators.
	16. BALLYSHANNON.	17. LETTERKENNY.
1. The general state of the Salmon Fisheries. Has the take of fish increased or diminished since 1842? What are the causes to which you attribute such increase or diminution?	1. Not improved since last year. Diminished since 1842. For the past three years the capture of salmon on the coast is, of course, less.	1. By no means satisfactory. The take of fish since year 1842, has been on the decrease. In some rivers obstructions in mill weirs, want of proper means be carried out to enable the spawning fish to ascend rivers, want of proper railing or netting to prevent fry from destruction by the mill-wheel, and descend by the waste-water sluice, where a ready means afforded for their wholesale destruction.
2. Has the take of salmon been more or less productive in 1868 than in 1867, and to what do you attribute the increase or diminution?	2. Take of salmon believed to be less in 1868 than in 1867; cause unknown.	2. The year 1868 has been almost unprecedented for scarcity of salmon in the rivers of this entire distr owing to the long-continued drought, and consequ scarcity of water in the rivers; and even in the ti waters this scarcity has been most remarkable.
3. The average price obtained for salmon last year by the captors?	3. Average price may be stated at 6½*d.* per lb.	3. The few fish procurable from the captors direct, var in price from 8*d.* to 10*d.* per lb., in the middle of season.
4. Is salmon purchased for exportation; and, if so, what proportion does it bear to that purchased for home supply?	4. Almost all for exportation.	4. Salmon in this district are almost invariably exported the owners of the several fisheries on a certain contr price, either to Dublin, Belfast, or England, and I sho say some 90 out of every 100 fish are so exported.
5. The amount of protection rendered during the close season of 1868, as compared with preceding season of 1867.	5. The amount of protection somewhat better than the previous year.	5. The protection rendered during the present close sea of 1868, bears equal comparison with that for the p ceding year of 1867.
6. Has the quantity of breeding fish been greater or less as compared with preceding year, 1867?	6. Quantity of breeding fish in the district certainly less.	6. The quantity of breeding fish observed in the rivers this district has been considerably less as compared w preceding year of 1867.
7. About what period do the salmon commence to spawn in the several rivers in your district? What are the greatest spawning months? and when is the spawning over?	7. Commence in October; greatest spawning time is in November and December—over in January.	7. The salmon commence to spawn in the rivers of t district, about the beginning of November, and I am to think it terminates in December.
8. At what period of the year, in each river in your district, are the first clean fish taken? When do the grilse begin to run? When are the spent fish well out of the river? and when does the great bulk of fry go to sea?	8. At the earliest period in Bundrowes, and used to be taken in January, before the law was altered. The general catch begins in May. Grilse run first in May. Spent fish out of all the rivers in the middle of April. Greatest bulk of fry descend in April.	8. In some rivers, for instance the Leannan, a clean fisl to be had at any season of the year; other rivers va very much in this respect, and a fish of this kind is r to be had May and even later. In the month of Ju the grilse begin to run, and by the month of May t spent fish are rarely to be had. I believe the great bu of fry make for the sea about June and July.
9. During the descent of the fry to the sea, is angling prohibited by any of the proprietors, or is it carried on during these months, and does much destruction take place?	9. In the Erne angling has always been prohibited until the 17th May. In most, if not all the other rivers, it has been practised during the spring.	9. During descent of the fry to the sea, angling is not pr hibited by the proprietors of the fisheries, and I do n believe any destruction of moment takes place.
10. At what period of the year do the fish begin to be discoloured, or to get heavy in spawn; and what is the general opinion as to the proper season for angling in your district?	10. Fish get discoloured in end of August. The Conservators appear to think the season for angling should not extend beyond 10th or 15th September, some say to stop earlier.	10. In the months of September and October fish begin be discoloured, and in the latter end of October and N vember heavy in spawn. I think the feeling is that t season ought to terminate earlier than present. The proper season to commence varies ve much, some rivers being much earlier than others.
11. Are there any pollutions, or other poisonous matter, entering the river in your district? If so, state the particular cases.	11. A great quantity of flax water.	11. Flax water is the only pollution or poisonous matt entering the rivers in certain parts of this district. T farmers having no other means of manufacturing th crop of flax, resort to the steeping of it in the tributar or drains flowing into the rivers, and are not unfr quently prosecuted for such breach of the law by the co stabulary, and the offenders fined in a mere nominal su
12. Have offences against the Fishery Laws increased or diminished?	12. Increased last year; the prosecutions not a guide to the amount of poaching.	12. I consider the offences against the Fishery Laws rather on the increase.
13. Give a list of the mill-weirs, or dams, or other obstructions in each river in your district; and specify where ladders or fish passes have been built, when, and by whom?	—	—
14. Give a list of all the fish ladders or passes built in your district, whether under the provisions of the Fishery Acts, or by the Board of Works or private individuals; and specify each locality?	—	14. The only fish-ladder or pass built in this district, the former erected by the proprietor, Lord G. A. Hi in his river at Gweedore, many years since.
15. Have any gratings been attached to mill-leads, or other artificial channels; and, if so, specify the particular cases?	15. No gratings.	15. These are of rare occurrence in this district, and I ha only to illustrate the fact by referring to almost all t milling leads. Please see answer to No. 1 query.
16. State where and by whom fixed engines were used in 1868?	16. See Appendix.	16. See Appendix.
17. Can you give a list of the prosecutions instituted by the Conservators during the year 1868?	—	—
18. Are there any new modes of fishing for salmon adopted in your district? If so, describe them, and where used.	18. No.	18. No.
19. Number of water-bailiffs employed by Conservators?	19. Two hundred and eighteen.	19. There are seventy-seven water-bailiffs employ throughout this district.
20. Number employed in district by private individuals?	20. Cannot make a return of these; there are several put by proprietors to watch without appointments or warrants.	—
21. For what length of time employed?	21. Yearly.	21. Mostly employed for twelve months.
22. Rate of wages paid by the Conservators?	22. From £1 and £2, up to £5 in a few cases.	22. From £30 per year to £1.
23. Are there any suggestions or general observations with which the Conservators may be disposed to favour the inspectors, with reference to the Salmon Fisheries?	23. The Conservators intended recommending an abridgement of the angling season. I have not been able to submit these queries to them.	23. I believe if proper passes be made for the free passa of salmon in the various mill-weirs, and other obstru tions removed of a natural kind, proper grating to pr vent the fry getting down the mill-run, and out by t waste-sluice, salmon would considerably increase in short time.
24. Are there any defects or deficiencies in the Acts of Parliament, for which, in your opinion, amendment is required? If so, state them in detail, and the remedy you would propose.	24. The Conservators will probably prefer to reply to this.	24. The law in regard to the prohibition of the Otte and granting a cross-line license, is most anomalous an unsatisfactory. The former is seldom fished with mo than sixteen flies, while the latter can be used wi fifty flies. In some parts of Ireland the Otter is n prohibited, provided a cross-line license is taken (vide the Lower Shannon), why not assimilate the practi to other parts of Ireland?

18. LONDONDERRY.	19. COLERAINE.	20. DROGHEDA.
1. Tolerably satisfactory. Since 1865 they have considerably diminished. The last two summers being very dry, may be the cause, but the great frosts and floods of the winters of 1866 and 1867, undoubtedly did great injury to the spawning beds. The size of mesh now takes all salmon, but no trout, and some of the rivers here are filled with trout, which consume a great quantity, not only of the ova, but also the fry.	1. Most prosperous. Increased considerably. To the protection given on the upper branches of rivers.	1. Falling off. Increased up to 1866; decreased since. Unfavourable seasons.
2. About the same.	2. Much the same throughout the district, but at the Cutts, Coleraine, the long-continued drought was against that fishery.	2. Less. Caused by great drought.
3. 9*d.* per lb.	3. About 1*s.* 7*d.*	3. About 11*d.* per lb.
4. Exported by the captors.	4. Two-thirds for exportation.	4. Chiefly for exportation. At least eighty per cent.

8. May. June. End of March. April.	8. In March. In May. All out of the rivers in February. In May and June.	8. Early in February, as a general rule. About the middle of June. About the latter end of February. April, May, and June.
9. No. A great quantity of fry are caught in their descent to the sea.	9. Angling is not prohibited, nor does the fry suffer much in consequence.	9. No. Not much.
10. September. The general opinion is that angling commences too early, as there are no fresh fish in the rivers when people can angle, and the number of spent fish caught is very great. From the 15th March to 15th October would suit the rivers in this district much better than the present open season.	10. In September. That angling should begin in February and end on 29th September.	10. Late in July. 1st of February to 15th September, but later on the Fane, and rivers northwards in this district.
11. I do not know of any except flax water, which is of yearly occurrence.	11. At Ballyclare paper mills, &c., small portions of this matter runs into the Marne water.	11. Yes. Chiefly by flax water.
12. Diminished, particularly on account of the small quantity of fish in the rivers.	12. Diminished.	12. Same as last year.

21. Generally from October to April.	21. The whole season.	21. Monthly; during the pleasure of the Conservators.
22. Average about £4.	22. From £5 to £21 per annum.	22. Head water-bailiff, £4 6*s.* 8*d.* per month; two other bailiffs, £1 10*s.* per month; and thirteen at £1 per month.
23. The close season for angling, as by answer to Query 10. Cross lines to be fished only in the open season for draft nets. That the size of mesh be altered so as to capture trout.	23. The fish-gap at Carrinroe should be made a sufficient salmon pass.	23. Not that I am aware of, except the raising of the price of licenses, which was already submitted.
—	24. The 5 & 6 Victoria, cap. 106, sect. 36, should punish eel in possession in close season, as well as salmon. Penalty for trespassing on a several fishery should be increased. 13 & 14 Victoria, cap. 88, sect. 1, should set out eel as fish. The 13 & 14 Victoria, cap. 88, sec. 34, should extend to pollen nets. The want of this provision is a very serious obstacle to the carrying out of the Fishery Law.	24. A great many. Very difficult to point them all out as required, by any person except an experienced lawyer.

	21. Ballycastle.
1. The general state of the Salmon Fisheries. Has the take of fish increased or diminished since 1842? What are the causes to which you attribute such increase or diminution?	1. As good as can be expected under existing circumstances. Diminished (vide increase in) Cannot account for it unless that the means of capture since 1842 until last three seasons greatly increased, but no benefit from their diminution for last three years can be perceiv
2. Has the take of salmon been more or less productive in 1868 than in 1867, and to what do you attribute the increase or diminution?	2. Very much less. Two small fisheries alone in this district, fished well last season. Cannot a for it, unless the drought of last summer could have affected the fish in some measure.
3. The average price obtained for salmon last year by the captors?	3. 10½*d.* per lb. in Liverpool—in Belfast, 9*d.* per lb.
4. Is salmon purchased for exportation; and, if so, what proportion does it bear to that purchased for home supply?	4. Almost all sent to Liverpool.
5. The amount of protection rendered during the close season of 1868, as compared with preceding season of 1867.	5. About the same.
6. Has the quantity of breeding fish been greater or less as compared with preceding year, 1867?	6. About the same, the breeding salmon appearing to be of a larger size.
7. About what period do the salmon commence to spawn in the several rivers in your district? What are the greatest spawning months? and when is the spawning over?	7. 20th November. From 20th November till 31st December. Few spawn after 31st Decemb
8. At what period of the year, in each river in your district, are the first clean fish taken? When do the grilse begin to run? When are the spent fish well out of the river? and when does the great bulk of fry go to sea?	8. In Bush can be found at any time during the whole year. From 1st till 20th June. March gone. From 20th March till 1st May.
9. During the descent of the fry to the sea, is angling prohibited by any of the proprietors, or is it carried on during these months, and does much destruction take place?	9. Prohibited as far as possible. No, not by angling.
10. At what period of the year do the fish begin to be discoloured, or to get heavy in spawn; and what is the general opinion as to the proper season for angling in your district?	10. 1st September. That angling should end on 20th September, or 1st October.
11. Are there any pollutions, or other poisonous matter, entering the rivers in your district? If so, state the particular cases.	11. A great deal of flax water, and the Justices, except a few who are interested in fis generally inflict only a nominal fine on conviction. There is no greater scourge to t than this, and the law is only nominally carried out in case of conviction.
12. Have offences against the Fishery Laws increased or diminished?	12. Poaching diminished. Flax-water cases greatly increased, from the small penalties gen inflicted.
13. Give a list of the mill-weirs, or dams, or other obstructions in each river in your district; and specify where ladders or fish passes have been built, when, and by whom?	—
14. Give a list of all the fish ladders or passes built in your district, whether under the provisions of the Fishery Acts, or by the Board of Works or private individuals; and specify each locality?	—
15. Have any gratings been attached to mill-leads, or other artificial channels; and, if so, specify the particular cases?	15. Yes; many on the River Bush, in fact at all the mills on the river.
16. State where and by whom fixed engines were used in 1868?	16. See Appendix.
17. Can you give a list of the prosecutions instituted by the Conservators during the year 1868?	—
18. Are there any new modes of fishing for salmon adopted in your district? If so, describe them, and where used?	18. None.
19. Number of water-bailiffs employed by Conservators?	19. On River Bush seven constantly; from twelve to sixteen during spawning season. On castle River, one constantly, and four men during October, November, and December Glendun River, one man constantly, but a second in spawning season. On Glenarm Riv constantly. On Gleneriff River, one constantly.
20. Number employed in district by private individuals?	20. The funds are so far short of paying the necessary keepers that in each case the own to contribute; for instance, the funds apportioned for Bush are £117, and the proprietors £202 9*s.* 0½*d.*
21. For what length of time employed?	21. Some constantly employed, others only for the occasion.
22. Rate of wages paid by the Conservators?	22. Constant men about £20 a year; some have house and land in addition, but £20 is a fair a on Bush; temporary men, 10*s.* to 12*s.* per week on the other rivers. Ballycastle yearly m per month; extra men from £1 to £1 10*s.* per month. On the Glendun, Gleneriff, Gl Rivers, yearly men 13*s.* 4*d.* per month.
23. Are there any suggestions or general observations with which the Conservators may be disposed to favour the inspectors, with reference to the Salmon Fisheries?	23. The curtailing the angling season; and if some means could be devised to require the own bag nets to share in the extra expense necessarily entailed by the owners of rivers—an in in amount of license, for instance. They would beg the attention of the Inspectors hardship arising from the penalties in cases of damage done by flax-water, being nominal. EIGHTH ANNUAL REPORT

OF

THE INSPECTORS OF SALMON FISHERIES (ENGLAND AND WALES).

(Presented pursuant to Act of Parliament.)

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed,
4 May 1869.

To the Right Honourable H. A. Bruce, M.P., Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Sir,

In the third Annual Report which, as Inspector of Salmon Fisheries, I now have the honour to lay before you, will be found my account of the state of the Salmon Fisheries in the following rivers — Axe, Camel, Exe, Fowey, Towy, Stour, Tees, Tone, Plym, Severn, Nidd, Ouse, Taw, Torridge, Tavy, Wye.

I have also given my remarks on pollutions, weirs, salmon ladders, and passes, gratings, clean and unseasonable fish, close time, salmon sold at Billingsgate and at Paris, &c. &c.

In pursuance of the 32d section of the Act of 1861, I have thought it my duty in the following pages to enlarge considerably upon the more important details of salmon cultivation, regarding them not only from a practical but also from a scientific point of view.

I am happy to be able to state that the salmon fisheries of England and Wales are as a whole in a highly satisfactory condition. The returns of last year show a diminution in the actual number of fish captured, but this fact is easily accounted for by the very exceptional state of the weather and rivers during the fishing season of 1868. That the stock of fish, both young and old, now in the rivers has greatly increased—promising large future harvests—there can be no doubt.

Most of the English and Welsh rivers are now under cultivation. The answers to the questions sent out by my colleague and myself are a sufficient guarantee to the Government and the public that a vast amount of attention is now being devoted to the cultivation of salmon throughout the country. The various Boards of Conservators are fully alive to the importance of their duties, and it is most satisfactory to see the great amount of attention and care which they, both as individuals and as corporate societies, devote both to the local and general interests of the public. Personally I have great pleasure in putting the above facts on record, and at the same time I would refer to the returns appended as indicating that while the interests of the legal fishermen are protected by the system of licences, the Conservators show by the number of prosecutions which they have instituted that they are determined to prevent infringement of the law, and at the same time put a stop to wilful and wanton destruction of one of the staple products of the country.

The powers under which the Home Office and the Conservators are enabled to carry out their efforts are comprised in the Salmon Acts of 1861 and 1865. That these Acts have done a vast amount of good is acknowledged by all concerned. The experience gained in the administration of the provisions of these Acts—the condition of thing saltered by the lapse of time—and the increase of knowledge and observation—all render it most advisable that the Legislature should encourage the good work already done by giving more ample powers, or by modifying those which at present exist. In my Report will be found (tabulated under the various sections to which they belong) the suggestions of the Boards of Conservators.

The chief points to which new legislation should be directed are, 1st. The free passage over weirs and mill dams; 2d. The diminution of pollutions; 3d. The formation of byelaws to suit local conditions; 4th. The variation of annual and weekly close time; 5th. The regulation of hatches and gratings to mills; 6th. Increase of power to water bailiffs; 7th. Regulation of sea fisheries in the estuaries; meshes, length, and licences for, of nets; eel traps; numbering of boats, fishing at dams, &c. &c.

I feel convinced that in proportion to the extended powers given to those who have the management and supervision of salmon fisheries, so will ultimately be the increase of the numbers of fish, both as affording sport to the angler, and as providing an increased supply of a nutritious article of food at a cheap rate to the fast-increasing population of England and Wales.

I have the honour to remain,
Sir,
Your most obedient Servant,
FRANCIS T. BUCKLAND, M.A.

MR. BUCKLAND'S THIRD REPORT.

REPORTS ON RIVERS.

THE AXE, DEVON.

This is naturally a salmon and sea trout river. It simply requires good management and protection to make it one of the most productive rivers in the south of England. The Axe in times past has been very celebrated for its salmon. The chairman of the Board of Conservators, Wm. T. Hallett, Esq., informed me that in the year 1800 salmon were very plentiful at Axminster, and in the year 1809 his grandfather caught 51 salmon at one haul in a seine, and this was in the summer. The Axe has a very narrow estuary, and empties itself direct into the sea, but still there is a fine bay outside where salmonidæ may find their food. The width of the estuary depends upon the wind; in an easterly wind the estuary is contracted by the set of shingle from the eastward, and at low water spring tides, with the wind east, the width would be at its narrowest point about 30 feet, at high water 60 feet. At low water with the wind west, south, or north the width would be 40 feet, and at high water, 90 feet. I was sorry to hear that there were a great many bass in the bay, as these fish doubtless are exceedingly destructive to smolts descending. There are numerous "stickles" and several deep pools in the upper part of the river as high up as Ford Abbey. About 10 miles from the sea I came upon what I consider to be the chief cause of the falling off of the stock of the fish in the Axe, namely, the weir, at Axminster. This is one of the most formidable obstructions to ascending fish I ever saw. It consists of a series of 12 small steps, each 10 inches high; the height of the weir in dry weather is about 10 feet. Upon the weir, I found placed a "Forsyth ladder," up which no fish has ever yet been known to ascend; its faults are that—1st, it is placed in the wrong part of the weir; 2nd, it is too steep; and 3rd, the foot projects no less than 15 feet away from the foot of the weir; the total length of this ladder is 25 feet, the width 4 feet 6 inches. By the side of the weir there is a hatchway, and a bye wash of 12 feet 10 inches in length. I explained to the conservators how this bye wash may be utilized as a fish pass, by making pools with three boards, as I have already done on the Stour. The boards should be;—the first 3 feet 9 inches high, the second 2 feet 8 inches, and the third 1 foot 2 inches; the end of the bye wash runs direct into the deep part of the pool, and the fish will have no difficulty in getting up if this arrangement were put in force. I have some fear of poachers, but the whole construction might be covered over during the winter months.

Above Axminster I found two other weirs, namely, Weycroft and Coaxdon, the former is 38 feet long and 7 feet 6 inches in the slope; it is divided into steps; luckily it is a little lowered on one side, and the wall inclines a little, so that by simply placing a board to divert the current a little the fish may easily be taken up. The latter weir is not difficult of treatment. If the salmon could be let up above these three obstructions, they would be carefully preserved up to Ford Abbey; Mr. Evans, Lord Bridport, Lord Paulet, Mr. Barnes and Mr. Henly would, I feel convinced, give their keepers instructions to preserve the spawning fish, and the Board of Conservators would probably give these keepers the full powers of water bailiffs according to the Act.

The owner of the Axminster weir is Henry Knight, Esq., of Axminster, I requested him to allow me to try the experiment of placing a diagonal board on the face of his weir. Mr. Knight, however, would not give permission unless he received an ample assurance of indemnity against any damage resulting thereafter to the weir by the placing of the board upon it. This indemnity could not be given either by myself or the board of conservators, so that matters remain in statu quo.

The Axe has a tributary running into it which would be valuable as a spawning ground, this is the Yarty; it is $14\frac{1}{4}$ miles long, and is a continuous series of stickles and deep pools. I was grieved to hear that a considerable portion of this river, was, under ordinary circumstances inaccessible to salmon, except in time of flood.

At a place called Westwater a weir has lately been erected, and the water of the river diverted for purposes of irrigation; the breadth of this weir is 32 feet, and the slope 23 feet: there is no pass erected on it. I am in communication with Mr. Payne, of Perry Street, Chard, and have called his attention to the 25th section of the Fisheries Act of 1861. A pass will be erected in the course of next summer on this weir.

For the last two years the fishery in the Axe has been very well protected, and the proprietors of the fisheries for no less than 15 miles of ground have liberally suspended their rights of netting for two years, and they allow holders of the Fishery Association tickets to traverse their land when out angling. The kelts are no longer caught by anglers, who in former times used to go out purposely to catch the kelts.

The results of protection are already apparent. On account of the Axminster weir the only spawning ground is between the town of Axminster and the sea, nevertheless, last year no less than from 12 to 20 nests of salmon were counted. If these fish had been only allowed a passage over Axminster weir, they would have reached spawning grounds very much better suited for them and their young than those to which they are now obliged to resort, and I sincerely trust that this most desirable event will shortly occur.

I was informed by a gentleman who has resided many years on the banks of the Axe, that the bulk of salmon do not run up till September, October, and November, nor the bulk of peal until June, July, and August.

Peal caught by net in June and in July are generally of from 3lbs. to 6lbs. in weight; these cannot escape being caught by the legal mesh. Sewen and sea trout are also caught of the same weight; the peal running up in the end of July and in August are mostly of from 1lb. to 2lbs. weight; these go through the legal mesh, and the salmon cannot be caught because they are not in the river until after the close time has commenced; the local opinion is that the close time should commence the 1st of December, and that the river should not open until the 1st of June. The Chairman is desirous to have the close season extended in order that the inhabitants may be supplied with the products of their own river, and their interest increased in the preservation of the fishery. For his own part he has made up his mind (and he stated it publicly at a lecture I gave on the cultivation of the Axe), that if the netting season were extended for salmon, the fish caught in his part of the river should be disposed of at a low rate for the benefit of the poor and the inhabitants of the district. The netting will recommence in 1869, and it will be very interesting to observe whether the fish, through preservation, will come up the river any earlier than they have hitherto done.

I could not hear of any pollutions in the Axe. I examined the gasworks and the foreman assured me that there never was anything noxious put in the river; at the same time I observed traces of gas tar floating in the water. The secretary of the Board of Conservators should look after this. Gratings are sadly wanted at the head of the factory stream near the Axminster weir and also at the head of the leats of the other mills. I think it more than likely that ascending fish are attracted by the stream which carries the water discharged from Mr. Phillips' mill. This also should be guarded, or the fish will be destroyed by the wheel above.

THE CAMEL.

The Camel is 28¼ miles long, and has a catchment basin of 155 miles; it empties itself into the sea near Padstow and the tide runs up to Polbroke. I held two meetings with gentlemen interested in the cultivation of the Camel, one at Bodmin, the other at Wadebridge; the Rev. J. Wilkinson, chairman, and Colonel Gilbert take great interest in the cultivation of this river. Near to the town of Bodmin there is a large weir made for the supply of the Bodmin waterworks; it is a steep weir, and upon it is built a Forsyth ladder, this is 40 feet long, and its inside measurement is 4 feet 9 inches; from evidence I received there can be no doubt this ladder is by no means efficacious. The fish collected in the season 1867 in considerable quantities at the foot of the weir, and spawned in some gravel which shortly afterwards was left dry. I have ordered stones to be arranged below so as to prevent this happening again, and also to heighten the water on the face of the weir.

In December 1868 I received a communication that large numbers of fish were jumping at this weir, unable to pass it; they were all rushing at the weir; the strongest managed to get about half way up, others stunned themselves for a time at the first leap and then fell back; the water was gushing and boiling through the ladder at the time, but was evidently too strong for the fish to go up. I at once wrote to Colonel Gilbert and Mr. Wilkinson, and advised that a board should be placed diagonally across the weir so as to assist the fish up. On the 28th December I received a letter addressed to the Rev. Mr. Wilkinson from Captain Liddell, chairman of the Bodmin waterworks; he says, "Colonel Gilbert saw several salmon go easily up the face of the dam by the plank placed there." I heard subsequently that the current was too strong for them, in consequence of a certain board (which I never ordered), having been placed on the top of the weir and that the diagonal would be better fixed in the opposite direction to that in which the workmen had put it. I hope to put this matter right myself next summer.

The geography of the weir at Bodmin waterworks is difficult to be explained without a diagram; suffice it to say I suggested that the waste hatch from the leat should be opened as often as possible in order to attract the fish that assemble at the foot of the weir, and to give them a chance of getting on up the river, and that the wall at the far side of the weir should be prolonged by means of planking. There is no grating at the entrance to this mill leat. I pointed out the 13th section of the Act of 1861 to the manager of the company, and I have received an assurance that a grating shall be fixed in the spring of 1869. Salmon, I was sorry to hear, ascend into the mill leat from the river and doubtless get destroyed.

Below the weir of the Bodmin waterworks I visited Boscarne mill. Colonel Gilbert has here arranged a very ingenious plan for passing the fish up by means of an artificial leat. I moved certain stones at this spot to show how the fish may be further assisted. Not far from Boscarne mill the stream passes through an arch under the roadway, under which I think it probable that a large number of fish are poached. I have suggested a remedy. A little below Boscarne mill I inspected the exit of a stream that comes from Nanstallan tinworks; the muddy water pouring down from these works into a naturally clear and beautiful stream is a sight piteous to behold. The line of demarcation between the two waters is well marked. Following down the stream below this point, I found that the mud had accumulated in the bed of the river, utterly destroyed all vegetation, and had filled up the bed of the river. This state of affairs I understood continued as far as Padstow, 10 miles down the river. Much of the mud is washed away in the winter to the mouth of the river.

Near the entrance of this polluted stream there used formerly to be five or six feet of water, now there is a mud bank through which the water finds its exit, reminding me of the plans of the delta of the Nile.

At Wadebridge I had an interview with Mr. Martyn; he thought that the system of catch-pits was not applicable to the mines on the banks of the Camel, and that if the pollutions were prevented from coming into the river the profits of the mining companies would be destroyed; and it is a serious question whether the industry of the neighbourhood should cease for the sake of cultivating the salmon. The quantity of water used by the mines is so great that it would be impossible to stop the mud contained in it, and even if the mud were stopped the cost of moving it would take away all the profits of the mines. He considers that either the rivers must remain polluted and the local industry allowed to go on, or the rivers be kept clean for the benefit of the salmon, and the mining interest interfered with.

I held a meeting of fishermen and others at Wadebridge, and there heard the oft-repeated story that the river was not getting earlier. A few salmon peal come in May; they increase in number in June and become more plentiful in July, very few salmon come with them; the true salmon do not come until the fishing season is closed by Act of Parliament. The old fishing season used to be from September to Christmas. The "blue polls" come in February. It is desirable, they think, to change the mesh of the net to a smaller size, allowing them to take the salmon peal during the summer months; the fishermen would like to catch the salmon with a net four inches from knot to knot, in order to "gill" them. In the autumn months the fish externally are bright. They call the Salmon Fisheries Act "the Act to prohibit catching fish in Cornwall;" they do not wish to commence fishing till the 1st of May, as there are no fish in the river till then, but they are anxious to be allowed to fish in September and October.

Thomas Pendray, 77 years of age, fisherman, says the fish have always come into the river at a regular and stated period; in his opinion no protection will make the river earlier. Salmon spawn from about the 25th December, through January, and even February; many fish were speared last year under Hellane woods. Porpoises assemble at the mouth of the river and do much mischief. The navigation of the river below Wadebridge is getting bad on account of the mud from the clayworks. Colonel Gilbert thinks that if there was more water in the river and the pollutions were kept out the fish would come at an earlier season of the year and in greater quantities; he is also of opinion that the law has, as yet, not had a fair trial upon the Camel.

The principal pollutions of the Camel are from the Mulberry mines which come in at Ruthern Bridge tinworks, Nanstallan tinworks, Blisland clayworks, Advent china clayworks, besides a tan yard in the town of Camelford, the owner of which had completely filled up the bed of the river with tan.

During the last winter salmon have ascended the Camel freely. The Rev. J. Wilkinson reports, December 1868, "there is no doubt but that salmon are more plentiful than in any former year, and very few have been taken by poachers."

Altogether I consider the Camel to be a most promising river, and sincerely trust that it will receive the care and cultivation which it so richly deserves.

THE EXE.

There can be no doubt but that the Exe might be made a good salmon river were it not for the weirs which everywhere impede the upward progress of the fish; convinced of this fact I have given considerable personal attention and labour to the Exe.

The river has, as far as salmon are concerned, been allowed to run to ruin almost since the days of Queen Elizabeth, and this fact renders it necessary that time should be granted in order if possible once more to restore the stock of fish. Invited by the Mayor, H. S. Ellis, Esq., and other influential inhabitants of the city of Exeter, I had the honour in the month of June last of giving an out-door lecture to the Exeter Naturalists Club on the cultivation of the Exe. I accompanied my audience from weir to weir, explained the local difficulties, and urged upon them the necessity of not allowing their river to remain any longer uncultivated.

The lowest weir upon the Exe is that at Salmon Pool up to which the tidal water at spring tides ascends; at the west side of the weir the conservators had, I found, arranged a baulk of timber so as to concentrate the water on to the wall which forms the side of the weir; the quantity of water running down the pass in the time of freshes I was informed was so great the fish could not face it. After due consideration I determined to place upon the face of the weir between the wall and the board, i. e., in the pass itself, fir trees cut into halves; these half fir trees were placed in the form of a zig-zag, I examined them on a subsequent occasion and found that although the zig-zags had not been placed at the angle which I recommended (the angles were much too obtuse), yet the upward run of the fish was much facilitated, inasmuch as the force of the water was broken up into pools and resting places afforded for the fish. The entrance to the ladder is not quite what I should wish to see it, there is however a good lead into it, and I have no hesitation in saying that on a slight flood the pass would be taken by the fish. Thus on the 30th of Nov. 1868 Mr. Compton of Exeter writes,—"the young man at the Ferry told me that he had seen one fish go up the zig-zag about a month ago; he also said he had seen four large fish go up in the course of the week." Mr. Compton suggests that this ladder would have been better in the middle of the weir; in which idea I quite agree with him. At the time of my second visit to Exeter I saw a salmon at the bottom of Trew's weir, which must have come up the new pass.

The next weir is Trew's weir, a long sloping weir 41 feet 9 inches in length, made to feed a paper mill on the east side: the pool is on the west side. I was exceedingly sorry to see that the water coming out from this mill was very white with pollutions from the paper manufactory. There can be no doubt that these pollutions do an immense amount of mischief to the river, the white soapsud like water, could be traced several yards down the river, and I found white bubbles tasting of chloride of lime floating at the top of the water at Salmon Pool weir, some considerable distance below. There are catch pits at this mill, but they are not now in use.

I was informed that the pollutions from the paper mill just above Countess weir bridge still continue, and that last summer boys were picking dead fish out wholesale,—pike, perch, roach, and dace. I wonder the inhabitants of Exeter allow their river to be defiled in such a manner. This evil must not be allowed a further continuance.

Toward the west side of Trew's weir, I found that the actual substance of the weir was bevelled off, the level of the water above being kept up by six distinct pieces of boards or hatches let into grooves, so that they could be moveable.* The height of each board was two feet two inches, and the length five feet six inches; at a subsequent visit to this weir with my colleague, Mr. Walpole, we both agreed that if one of these boards could be moved away, a free run would be caused for the fish, and a predominant

* I understood that a very large reward had been offered for the invention and actual working of any contrivance by means of which these hatches could be raised or lowered at will. The last plan I heard was that the boards should be made to slide sideways on wheels by means of iron rods and cog wheels.

current thus formed would attract them from the pool or the west side; this plan, in fact, would be equivalent to a free gap in the weir. We understood from Mr. Ware, the city surveyor, that arrangements would be made that one of these boards should be entirely removed during the winter months, and we also gave instructions on the spot that this free run of 41 feet should be divided out into three pools which were to be made in the shape of small weirs sloping upwards, so as to afford resting places for the fish. I regret, however, to understand that an objection was afterwards raised to the entire removal of the board at the head of the weir, the consequence being that the pass has not acted quite in such a satisfactory manner as I could desire. I hope to get over the difficulty made by the persons concerned in keeping up the head of the water by a contrivance which will enable the fish to pass over the board, although it has not been cut down to its full extent. Nevertheless, this new pass has certainly acted this year; J. B. Ford, Esq., writes,— "The pools are most successful, I saw a small salmon go from pool to pool without the "least exertion, but he did not get from the pool over the head board. As far as the "pools are concerned, the fish went up as if he had been accustomed to it." This pass was completed on the 31st of October 1868. Mr. Ware, the engineer, reports "that "at the above date the men saw salmon jumping at the foot of the new pass, so that we "may hope that they may take to it."

A number of baulks of timber were lying at the head of this weir, and in order to try the experiment of placing a diagonal on it, I offered to pay the expense myself; the contractor promised to place the baulk, but he never carried out his engagement.

Mr. Thomas Compton, of Magdalen Road, Exeter, has kindly kept a watch upon the pass at Trew's weir; on the 16th of November he reports, "The water appears to run "very steadily over the new pass, but I have never seen a salmon try it, the dace, however, "use it very freely."

His subsequent reports are not altogether favourable, but as the water rose soon after the ladder was finished there can be no doubt but that many fish went up.

I trust next summer to make such alteration that the pass may become quite effective.

There is a bye wash running on the mill side of the ladder, which also may be utilized in case of necessity, but still the pool being on the west side of the weir, I would rather fix a pass there if it were possible so to do.

The next weir is Blackaller weir, a very complicated weir, and very difficult for the fish to pass; by my directions, Mr. Ware placed upon this obstruction a series of zig-zags formed of half fir trees cramped together with iron; at my next visit I found that the whole had been swept away by a flood, and was informed that they had never been fastened to the face of the weir at all. Of course I should not have consented to this plan if I had been made aware that the zig-zags were not to have been fastened on to the face of the weir. At the west side of the weir, I found a wall which acted as a diagonal board by concentrating the water. I continued the action of this wall by placing a board so as to cause the flow of the water to pass direct into the pool below. When I last examined this spot, the pass was working well, but the jump for the fish in a low state of water was too great to ensure their taking the pass without exertion.

Upon Blackaller weir I found a Forsyth ladder, the foot of which had been prolonged several feet into the weir, this I ordered to be cut away as it was perfectly impossible that any fish could get up into it; I also placed a flood guard at the head of the pass. Having done this, I understood, at the next visit, that my alterations were useless, inasmuch as the water very seldom came up to the level of the lower edge of the weir. Of this fact, as a stranger, I of course was perfectly unaware, and moreover, I never was, strange to say informed of it when examining the locality. Nevertheless, I am, in spite of this, informed by Mr. Skinner, who has kept watch at the weir for me, that on the 10th of October he saw a fish attempt the diagonal, and that on November the 2nd he saw the same thing occur, but he could not tell owing to the rush of water whether the fish passed up or not. In the course of the ensuing summer I propose to adopt a plan, suggested by Mr. Ford, the secretary of the Board of Conservators, which will have the effect of raising the water both at the foot of the diagonal, as well as at the foot of the ladder; this done, Blackaller weir will no longer be an obstruction.

Above Blackaller is Head weir. In order to strengthen this weir the builders have filled up the west side with stones; it is moreover built obliquely across the river, and one end filled up with stones. There is no obstruction whatever to the fish, and I should be glad for the sake of the salmon to see all future weirs built upon these lines. A grating is sadly wanted at the entrance of the leat fed by this weir, and I sincerely trust the conservators will place one there in the spring of 1869.

The next weir as we ascend the river is Cowley Bridge at the junction of the Bristol and Exeter Railway with the North Devon Railway. It is divided into three portions, firstly, a steep slope on the west side; secondly, a sloping wall 8 feet 4 inches in the slope, and thirdly, two hatches, each being 2 feet 7 inches high. Originally a Forsyth ladder had been affixed to these hatches; this I found had been removed, and in its stead had been placed a long shallow trough down which the water was rushing with a fearful velocity; this trough of course is perfectly useless as a salmon ladder. The directors of the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company have voted the sum of 40*l.* for the purpose of placing a ladder over Cowley Bridge weir, the work to be carried out by the conservators under the inspection and to the satisfaction of the engineer of the Railway Company; at the time Mr. Walpole and myself had an interview with D. S. Cooper, Esq., the assistant engineer of the company, the season was so far advanced that we determined it would not be safe to attempt to build any ladder or pass in 1868; it was lucky we did so, as I have subsequently understood that during the winter the wash over Cowley Bridge weir was so great that about half an acre of the meadow on the left below the bridge was completely washed away. Cowley Bridge is a very difficult weir to manage, and it has already cost the company much money. They have, I regret to say, filled up the pool at its base, making the bed of the river as level as a roadway.

Above Cowley Bridge is Pynes weir made to supply the waterworks; it is a very wide weir about 150 feet, and has a very long slope, the rough stones at the base have been arranged so as to form pools, and thus assist the fish a little in their ascent. On the side nearest the house of Sir Stafford Northcote, the weir is slightly lower, and at this point I propose to affix boards and large stones so as to assist the fish. There is no grating to the entrance of the waterworks, and I am in communication with the authorities of these waterworks, and shall take care that section 13 of the 1861 Act shall be put in force immediately.

I understand that the floods in the Exe during the past year have been very heavy. I have therefore great hopes that a considerable number of fish have passed up into the upper waters to spawn upon the tributaries arising from Exmoor, and also in the Barle. The funds of the board of Conservators are as yet not sufficiently ample to allow them to take that care of the river which its wants deserve. But as time goes on, I have no doubt but that the inhabitants of the city of Exeter and its vicinity will become awakened to the importance of obtaining a supply of good and wholesome food from the river which passes their own doors, and that they will assist the board of Conservators in making efficient passes over the weirs, putting down the pollutions, (especially the chloride of lime from the paper mills,) preserving the parent fish from poachers in the upper waters, and protecting the fresh run fish in the estuary from the illegal practices of the fishermen.

It is with the greatest pleasure that I have to announce that the Town Council of the City of Exeter have voted the sum of 150*l.* for making the weirs within their jurisdiction passable for the fish; such an example of public-spirited liberality is worthy of imitation in other parts of the kingdom, and the Town Council of Exeter deserve the warmest thanks, not only from the local community, but from the public in general.

THE FOWEY.

The Fowey is 27 miles long and has a catchment basin of 116 square miles; the estuary is not large, but it is deep, and well protected from the sea. The Fowey has suffered very much from mine and claywork pollutions; but while, from the depression in mining, pollution from this source has decreased, that from clayworks has considerably increased. There are only three obstructions to the upward course of the fish on the whole river.

I held a meeting at the town of Fowey, which was numerously attended by members of the board of conservators, gentlemen of influence in the district, and fishermen from Polruan, a fishing station on the estuary opposite Fowey.

The fishermen complained bitterly that the law, as it stands now, closes their river at the very time when alone net fishing would prove remunerative; they consider the best fishing time is from September to Christmas. There are no salmon in the river in the months of April, May, June, and July, and but a few begin to come in August, not enough to warrant the fishermen in putting out their nets; therefore, since the two months of February and March have been taken away from this river by an order of the Secretary of State, dated the 13th November 1863, it really comes to this, that the fishermen can only fish in August, and that their chance of success then is very slight. When the fish do come, however, their enemies, the porpoises, come also, and cut off the fish as they run into the estuary. On the 15th of October last Mr. Climo, a most intelligent and hardworking young fisherman, reported to me as follows:—"The porpoises have been in "the harbour twice this week and have devoured a great many salmon."

The fishermen and several of the conservators declared that the salmon were in good condition and fit for food during September and October, and some, indeed, went so far as to add, up to Christmas. In order to judge of the real condition of the Fowey salmon by a post-mortem examination of the ovaries and milts (the only true test of the condition of the fish) Mr. Climo at the direction of the conservators sent me up seven fish. The result of my examination is as follows:—

Oct. 9.	1 female, weighing	5½ lbs.	Roe	3 ozs.
„ 14.	1 male	„ 9 „	Milt	8½ „
„ 14.	1 female	„ 7½ „	Roe	5 „
„ 16.	1 male	„ 7 „	Milt	6½ „
„ 16.	1 do.	„ 8 „	Milt	6 „
„ 16.	1 female	„ 7 „	Roe	5 „
„ 16.	1 male	„ 4½ „	Milt	4½ „

It was suggested that only fish in the best condition had been selected, but when this was mentioned to Mr. Climo he answered as follows:—"It is a difficult matter to get salmon "out of condition in October or November in the Fowey; the specimens sent were only fair "ones; there are plenty of salmon at the mouth of Fowey harbour, but I imagine they will "not go up to spawn for five or six weeks from this date." On the 12th of December he writes, "The weather has been very severe on our coasts for the past fortnight; in conse- "quence of this we have not been able to earn a penny, and some of the fishermen have "made application to our parish for assistance. Salmon are now very plentiful with us, "and if the law would allow us to capture them we should not be in need of help. Under "the circumstances it is quite palpable that the Act of 1861 has inflicted a serious injury "in depriving us of our ancient and just rights."

The external appearances of these Fowey fish corresponded with the condition of their ovaries and milts, that is to say the fish were plump and fat, and certainly could neither be called unclean nor considered out of season. Their ova corresponded with those that had been taken six and seven weeks earlier from fish of other and earlier rivers. Thus a 14 lb. salmon from the Severn, on August 20th, contained eggs weighing 9 ozs. On the 4th of August an 11 lb. Wye fish contained eggs weighing 8 ozs.; and on the 20th of October the roes of three salmon (weight not recorded) were kindly brought me by Mr. Walpole, from the Usk, each pair of roes weighing 1 lb. 13 ozs.; and a Taw and Torridge salmon, on October 20th, weighing 8 lbs., contained 1 lb. 10 ozs. of eggs. I will not here multiply examples; suffice it to say that I have made casts of these Fowey fish, with their roe and milt exposed to view, and have preserved samples of the ova themselves in spirits of wine, in order that they may be compared with the appearances of salmon in the month of December, when the ova are fully developed. By the kindness of the conservators of the Tay and the Tweed, I have been enabled to cast and examine two female salmon on the point of spawning; thus, on the 11th of December, a Tay fish of 11 lbs. in weight carried eggs weighing no less than 2 lbs. 10 ozs., and on the 14th of January a Tweed salmon weighing 28½ lbs. carried eggs weighing 5 lbs. If these two latter weights be compared with the weights of the roes of the Fowey fish in the month of October, it will be seen that in all events, in the specimens submitted to me for examination from the Fowey, the ova in the fish were not so far advanced but that they would escape the clause relative to the taking unclean and unseasonable salmon, but that also they would probably not spawn so early as fish in rivers which are ordinarily called early rivers. I do not deny that some fish with their eggs more developed than those which I had the opportunity to examine might have run up the Fowey. I can only speak from the facts which are submitted to me. I consider, therefore, that in justice to the fishermen, and in accordance with the wishes of many of the local inhabitants, the fishermen should be allowed to continue their netting later than the end of August; but as there is not as yet a large stock of fish in the river, I should be unwilling to advise that for the present the open season should be greatly prolonged. I have taken great pains to explain all this to the fishermen who net at the mouth of the river, and pointed out the necessity of their entering heartily into the cause of preservation, and of their co-operating with the conservators in their efforts to re-stock the river. The fishermen of Polruan are a respectable and quiet class of men, and I will do them the justice to say that in my opinion they will always do what is right;—not be hasty in their demands, but bide their time till matters are adjusted both to their local interests and the interests of the public in general.

From what I gathered on the spot, the poaching on the Upper Fowey has been considerable in former times, and traps of a very artful character were laid for the spawning fish. The débris from the mines covers up the spawning beds, and the poachers were in the habit of cleaning off the mud, &c. from the gravel; the fish resorted to these clean places to lay their eggs, and were then speared. I have turned this practice to good account, inasmuch as the conservators have at my advice employed two men (who were once the greatest poachers on the river) to clean the spawning beds, and guard the fish when making their nests in these places instead of spearing them. This plan, I understand, has succeeded admirably; no less than 21 spawning beds have been made and watched, and eight pair of fish of from 14 to 16 lbs. in weight have been seen on them; a gentleman writes, "there can therefore be no doubt that the river has this last "season been well preserved, and that a large number of smolts will be added as stock. "A few years' careful preservation will soon add to the number of fish which will be fit "to be taken by the net."

"I am convinced, from what the bailiffs say, that at least 100 pairs of fish have spawned in the upper waters; they are quite surprised at the numbers seen."

The Fowey is greatly polluted by the débris of china clayworks and other mines. In walking up the sides of the river, banks of mud from the washings were to be seen where naturally there is clean gravel. This china clay is made from decomposed granite. The Secretary of the Fowey Board has sent me a series of samples showing the various stages of the work. These can be examined in my museum. The proprietor of a china clay-work on the head of the Fowey has promised to make catch pits at a locality I pointed out as suitable to the purpose.

There are three obstructions in the Fowey; 1st, the Treverbyn mills weir, 5 ft. 8 in. high at the lowest part. Here I have recommended a simple and inexpensive pass, consisting of a large tree and rocks, to be built by placing them as obstructions across the bed of the river at the point where it becomes narrow, a few yards below the weir. This, I believe, is now completed. The second obstruction are the Golitha falls, which I have elsewhere described, see page 23. By a judicious arrangement of the natural rocks a most admirable pass has been made here, at the slight cost of 3*l*. Neither Treverbyn or Colitha would ever have been made passable if it had not been for the praiseworthy exertions of Chapell Hodge, Esq., of Doublebois. The third obstruction at Ashford weir has also been made passable, so that the fishermen cannot say that the upper landed proprietors have not done all they can to promote the cultivation of the river.

A grating has also been placed at the mouth of the powder mill leat at Doublebois; this will doubtless preserve many smolts from destruction.

Great interest in the river is now gaining ground in the neighbourhood; the Board of Conservators, and especially the chairman, Richard Foster, Esq., and the secretary, W. Pease, jun., Esq., of Lostwithiel, are most energetic in their duties; and Mr. Foster has established salmon hatching on his own grounds. I have already sent him down a good consignment of eggs; he has also taken eggs from the river himself, and I hope shortly to send him some living fish. Altogether I think the Fowey is now in a fair way of being well cultivated, and if the care bestowed upon it is continued, it will doubtless become in time a productive river.

There are points in which, in the opinion of the Board, the Salmon Fishery Laws demand alteration, e.g., salmon peal fishing; netting in estuaries for fish other than salmon, and fishing for other fish on the sea coasts (within a mile of the shore or other limits). It is thought that each Board of Conservators should be empowered to make byelaws, subject of course to the higher powers.

THE TOWY (CARMARTHEN).

I held a meeting in the month of August at Carmarthen; the fishermen reiterated the complaints I reported last year. Their two chief grievances relate to the size of the mesh and the close time. They wish to be allowed to fish in September and October, and are willing to give up February and March. They also wish to be allowed to use the 1½-inch mesh-net from the 15th June to 15th August; their reason being that there are then only sewen or peal in the river, and but few or no salmon.

The fishermen on the Towy appear to me to be divided into two classes: firstly, respectable, hard working men, who wish to obey the law, and do what the conservators wish; secondly, ill-conditioned people who make a practice of defying the law against the water bailiffs, and would, if they dared, fish all the year round. The better class of fishermen consequently suffer both morally and in pocket for the misdeeds of those of their own class who misbehave themselves. I therefore advise those who are well disposed to take measures to sustain their public character as a body, and at the same time promote their own welfare by informing against any persons whom they see infringing the law.

I am glad to see from the return that licences for 82 coracle nets have been taken out, 15 for hang nets, 14 for draught nets. Surely those who take out these licences should make it their business to protect the waters in which they fish from unfair treatment, and I trust the fishermen will take my advice, and render to the water bailiffs all the assistance in their power.

Although I am personally of an opinion that the smaller mesh should be allowed from the 15th June to the 15th August, yet it will be impossible to advise that this privilege should be granted so long as the law is thrown into disrespect, and the fishermen do not unite as a body to see its provisions carried out, and, as far as I could ascertain the sense of those present at the meeting, I think they are willing to do this, for the fisheries of the Towy are most worthy of cultivation.*

I am sorry to hear that when a flood comes fish run up over the weir into the Gwily, that the water soon runs off, and the fish either die or are destroyed. The tinworks take a large proportion of the water of this brook; their right to do so should be inquired into by the conservators.

The inhabitants of Carmarthen and its neighbourhood should take interest in developing the resources of their river, and should assist, in every way in their power, the Board of Conservators and the fishermen, whose interests are after all identical.

The Board of Conservators and Mr. Green, the secretary, are assiduous in the performance of their duties, and are, I feel certain, anxious to do justice to the fishermen as well as to the public in general.

THE NIDD AND OUSE.

Hunsingore.—I first proceeded to the weir at Hunsingore; this is a sloping weir measuring 55 yards in length. The salmon naturally take the northern corner close to the mill wheel. This is the lowest part of the weir; the slope of the dam is about 17 feet; it ends in an apron 11 feet in length. John Dent, Esq., M.P., kindly sent down two planks, some labourers, iron pins, &c., and under my superintendence two 3-inch boards, 11 inches in height, were fastened on the face of the weir in a diagonal direction. The total length of these boards was 43 feet. The junction of the two boards is about 23 feet above the present level of the water, i.e., the bed of the river. The mill is obliged sometimes to stop work in the winter on account of the floods. By marking off on the wall the height of the winter flood, I found that it would about reach to the junction of the two boards, and that under these circumstances the fish would have only a distance of 8 feet 3 inches to run along the side of the diagonal board, or 5 feet straight up the face of the weir. This former journey (of 8 feet 3 inches) I think they would be able easily to accomplish. It may be dubious whether they can run the whole length of the plank, i.e., 43 feet, but it must be remembered that salmon only run in freshes, and that at each fresh the increased quantity of water at the foot of the dam would diminish the distance to be traversed by the fish. Great thanks are due to Mr. Dent for the kindness he has shown in this matter.†

Goldsboro'.—From Hunsingore I proceeded to Goldsborough mill. The Hon. and Rev. J. W. Lascelles kindly sent forward, and had boards prepared to place on this obstruction. Goldsboro' weir has a slope of 16 feet 3 inches, and has a height of about 12 feet 4 inches. The weir is very steep. Upon the face of this weir we fixed two diagonal boards at an angle of about 1 in 6, and being 36 feet in length. The mill having stopped, we tried the working of this board. It certainly concentrates the water in a capital manner; my only doubt was whether sufficient water is collected in its upper third, while at the same time there is too much accumulated at the lower end. Subsequent events proved that the diagonal at this weir would not act; as, however, it cost nothing, we have gained experience without expense. The fish all rush at the side of the weir furthest from the mill, and it is to this point that we must in future direct our efforts, unless we adopt the plan suggested by my colleague Mr. Walpole, and construct an obstruction by the side of the stepping stones, so as to form a pool at the base of the weir.

† I subsequently heard that this experiment (for it was only an experiment) failed, but I have not received particulars; I expect the run was too long for the fish.

The next weir up the river is Lund's or Plompton mill. It has a slope of 14 feet, and is no great obstruction to the fish. There is an admirable natural salmon pass on the side opposite the mill.

The next weir is Abbey mill under Grimbles Crag; it was the property of the late Sir C. Slingsby; a portion of the weir is broken down. I would suggest that a pass on the pool system be made when the weir is rebuilt, and that attention should be called to the 25th section of the 1861 Act.

Knaresborough weir was at first sight most formidable, as it has a steep slope of 12 feet. It is not so in reality, for there is a fine deep pool at its base. There is a platform on the top of the weir 36 feet long; in this there is a depression along which the salmon would run if they got to the top of the weir; great assistance may be given to the fish to reach the platform by boards placed diagonally. Mr. Ellison, surveyor of roads at Knaresboro', at my recommendation placed boards on this weir to assist the fish, but he afterwards removed them as he was afraid of the weir being injured. The weir is heightened with boards, but they are legal. The Rev. James Ramskill of Knaresborough, and Mr. Thomas Houseman of Knaresborough, take great interest in the fisheries of the Ure district; they should be asked to co-operate with the Boards of Conservators, as their assistance would be most valuable.

Kirk-hammerton.—I have also inspected the key to the river Nidd, viz., the weir at Kirk-hammerton. Though it is apparently a difficult construction, I think the fish may be passed over if the present overflow of the weir be utilized; it is about 7 feet high, 13 feet 6 inches in length, and 17 feet 6 inches wide; there are three hatches. It should be divided into three pools by means of boards placed across the whole width, 17 feet 6 inches; the water should be admitted by a new hatch built so as to admit a body of water 2 feet 6 inches wide (3 feet would be better), and 3 feet deep. The passage from one pool to the other should be arranged on "the ladder within a ladder" principle. I have explained details to Mr. Candy, who has promised that the works shall be done.

I then proceeded to examine Tadcaster weir, a great obstruction. I thought at first of building boxes on the weir, or rather in the hollow of the weir, but I fear the floods would take away anything built by human hands. I have great hopes that the present ladder may be utilized, and I have explained how that a point some 3 feet below the line of the toe of the weir should be blocked By this blocking plan the water going down the ladder would be sent direct to the foot of the weir, and an obstruction made, so as to form a pool at the point where the water runs out of the ladder. There are plenty of stones close by which may be used for the purpose. The steps in the ladder should be altered so as to form a series of pools by means of a "ladder within a ladder." I regret to hear that nothing has been done at this locality. I have hopes that the fish trap which exists at this weir may eventually be converted into a pass for the fish.

Linton.—Linton weir on the Ouse is a bad obstruction. The weir is built in steps. I have an idea that if the plan I proposed at Tadcaster succeeds it may be put into effect at Linton, but the ladder is very steep, and must be "pooled." A flood guard has been placed on the top since my visit to command the flow of water. Since the flood guard has been placed four salmon have been seen in the ladder, but it is doubtful if they got through it. This ladder can easily be altered into the Ballysodare plan, and a new pool made. To do this big stones are necessary. I was much pleased to find these stones all ready to hand, idle and doing nothing on the lock side of the weir. They may just as well be at work as idle, and no doubt the owners would lend them to be put into the water. They are part of the old wall. I marked the most suitable stones with chalk. The Navigation Commissioners wish this ladder to be removed altogether. A correspondence is now going on relative to this subject.

Naburn.—The difficulties of Naburn lock are well known. There are boards on the top of this weir which are moveable by machinery. An arrangement has been made to lower these boards whenever water can be possibly spared from navigation purposes.

When I last examined Naburn weir, in November 1868, the water completely covered it, and there was such a depth over it that steamers and barges could go over the weir without touching. The floods on the Yorkshire rivers during the past season have been so heavy that the weirs were all buried in water. If fish have gone up and spawned in the tributaries, we may in future years expect good results to these valuable Yorkshire rivers from the stock of ova laid during the spawning season 1868–69.

THE PLYM.

The Plym is 15 miles long, and has a catchment basin of 73 miles, the upper waters contain good spawning grounds among the hills. I began my examination at Lairy Bridge. The salmon fishing at this locality formerly was worth 150*l.* per annum, and afforded occupation for seven or eight men. The draft place for the nets was situated just below Lairy Bridge. Thirty years ago great numbers of salmonidæ could be seen going down from the bridge; they have now much in numbers fallen off. A little brook, called Torey Brook, emptied itself into the Plym. The water coming down from this brook into the river is excessively dirty, and has formed a great bank of mud at its mouth. Upon this brook there are no less than two mines and two china clay-works, beginning from the top; they are as follows:—Lea Moor Brick and China Works, Bottle Hill Tin Mine, Wheal Mary Huchins Tin Mine, and Emmerton Clay-works. None of the works take the least precautions by catch pits or other means to prevent their refuse from going into the brook. At Lea Moor there is an open pond containing thousands of tons of sand; and at every flood this accumulation is carried into the brook; the consequence is, an enormous quantity of mud is thrown into the Plym by the brook.

The upper portion of the estuary of the catwater is gradually becoming one mass of mud, which goes up and down with the tide, and which has so accumulated that the navigation is impeded. Formerly there were considerable oyster banks in the catwater, but the fisherman complain that these banks are all mudded up and the oysters destroyed. There are no mines on the Plym except the Bickley Mine:—the Wheal Lopes has now shut up. A new claywork is about to be opened at Shaw-bridge, catch pits will be made and rubble banks instituted. The company are compelled, by Sir M. Lopes in granting their lease, to use effectual measures to prevent any fish being destroyed on pain of forfeiture of their grant.

At Cann weir I inspected a weir belonging to Mr. Soltau Symonds; this gentleman had formerly a salmon trap at this weir; in a most noble manner he has converted this trap into a pass which operates in a most effectual manner; arrangements are made worthy of examination, so that the miller for whose benefit the weir is made does not suffer from the presence of a pass in the weir. Above Mr. Symonds' weir is another obstruction, the head weir, made for the supply of the town of Plymouth with water:—there was no grating to the leat at the time of my visit. The latest information I have received from the Secretary of the Board of Conservators is that a grating has been placed, but that it was liable to become choked. The company have offered to arrange it anew to meet the requirements of the Act and the Board of Conservators.

THE SEVERN.

In my last annual report I described fully the weirs on this valuable and important salmon river. The past season having been very dry, I have on two occasions been able to walk on the weirs and examine both them and the ladders closely.

Diglis Weir.—In the centre of this weir is a Forsyth ladder. At my suggestion the stops have been altered so that the water no longer should descend in a serpentine course, but should be made to form a series of pools. This plan I feel convinced would have rendered this pass efficacious if a flood-guard had been placed at the head of the pass. This suggestion was, however, objected to by Mr. Williams, engineer of the Severn Navigation Commissioners, "because the requirements of the navigation imperatively demand that "no erection above the upper sill of the Severn weirs should be permitted." The above fact, and the assurance on the part of Mr. Williams that boats would be endangered by the presence of a flood-guard, of course made it impossible for us to affix one at the place where we should wish, and this pass is consequently rendered practically useless. This will be seen from the words of Mr. George (the clerk of the Severn Board of Conservators), who in his report of December 8, 1868, thus describes the results of the absence of a flood guard:—"The centre pass is quite useless except in low water, through the "want of a flood guard as suggested by Mr. Buckland; the quantity of water which "rushes through it, with ever so slight a fresh, giving it all the appearanceof an enormous "cauldron, and at once proclaiming it to be impracticable for fish to pass through it with-"out being washed out. I have seen salmon which have entered knocked bodily out by "the force of the water. I have no doubt that with the addition of the flood guard this "would always be a good pass."

I am, however, exceedingly glad to say that a most ingenious device has been invented, by means of which a flood guard will be placed (in the form of a roof) some two or three stops down the ladder, the upper portion being boarded over, so that nothing will project above the sill of the weir. There are two claimants to the invention, Mr. Willis Bund and Mr. George. This plan should certainly be tried, for it will be no impediment to navigation, and will probably control the present rush of water down the ladder, and thereby render the ascent of the salmon easy.

I found at the easternmost end of Diglis weir that a new pass had been erected by Mr. Williams on the principle of a "free run." I had certainly understood that Mr. Williams had been good enough to promise that he would build at this spot a pass similar to that at Bevere, that is to say, a lowering of one end of the weir, the water being directed along the foot of the weir so as to attract the fish to the lowest part in the weir; but when I came to examine the new pass I found it was not like Bevere, and I expressed my wishes for its success, but at the same time my serious doubts whether the salmon could possibly face the current of water which would rush down it. This pass consists of the removal of a portion of the cap sill of the weir, and the erection of one side wall upon the face of the weir, the eastern bank of the river forming the other side wall. There are no stops or any other means to break the force of the water, which rushes down in such a torrent as to render it practically impassable for fish.

To my remarks on this question Mr. Williams replied:—"My reply to Mr. Buckland's "allegation is, that the pass in question is practically similar to that at Bevere, although "local circumstances required the adoption of different modes of operation to secure "uniform results. At Bevere the weir abuts upon the eastern bank at an angle so acute "as to concentrate a sufficient body of water down that angle to enable the fish to "ascend. At Diglis, however, the weir abuts upon the east bank at right angles to it, "and the requisite concentration of the water is secured by the erection of a diagonal "timber structure upon the apron of the weir, and the same practical result as at Bevere "is obtained. This pass, recently constructed at considerable expense, has never yet "been in action, as Diglis weir has been high and dry for some weeks. It is intended to "meet the requirements of the fish at a certain state of the water during which alone "there has been any difficulty in their ascent. Mr. Buckland reports that he has great "hopes it will succeed. As I feel confident it will do so, I claim for it a fair trial, and "submit to you that it will be time enough to ask for additional help whenever its failure "may have been demonstrated."

I had hoped that this pass would have succeeded; my doubts have, however, been realized, as will be proved by the following report of Mr. George:—"As regards the "eastern pass, which Mr. Williams has described as practically similar to the model "pass at Bevere, it is entirely useless and impracticable for the ascent of fish until they "can ascend any other part of the weir. Since Mr. Williams expressed his belief in its "efficiency he has materially altered it by removing the footboard, extending the pass "to the edge of the lower apron, and narrowing its entrance. This makes the gradient "much easier at the lower end of the pass, but the pressure of water down the steeper "gradient at the upper end forces it out of the mouth of the pass in a lateral direction "with such velocity as to cause a foaming stream of broken water for some distance "below, in which fish are whirled about, not being able to get fin-hold, and consequently "have great difficulty in getting into the pass; and when they succeed in entering it, "the force of the current is so great that they are invariably washed back after "swimming up a short distance. I have myself seen this occur on several occasions, "and the same result has been witnessed by the water bailiffs and many other persons; "and I believe that no person has seen a fish get over the weir by means of this pass." In effect, therefore, this pass does not in any way aid the fish in their ascent of the weir.*

* Since the above was in print I have examined this pass myself, and quite agree with Mr. George's statement.

A baulk of timber or "cap sill" runs along the top of the whole length of Diglis weir. Mr. Williams had according to his promise (see annual report, 1867, page 24) cut out a portion of a similar baulk on the crest of Holt weir, and I understood that he would do this also at Diglis. When I came to examine the baulk I found that only half the depth of the baulk had been cut away. To this Mr. Williams remarks :—"With "reference to the alteration of the cap sill at the west end of this weir, I have to regret "finding in Mr. Buckland's communication to me the following sentence :—'Mr. Williams "'was good enough to promise me that he would order six feet of the sill of the weir "'to be cut away on the westernmost end of Diglis weir. When I examined it I found "'that only half the depth of the sill had been cut away.' I made no such promise, but "on the contrary have invariably objected to entertain the question of any additional "pass until that recently constructed has been fairly tried. On the receipt, however, of "Mr. Buckland's report I found therein the following paragraph :—'I should be pleased "'to see a pass made upon the west side of the weir, and this might easily be done if the "'Severn Commissioners would be good enough to allow five or six feet of the baulk to "'be made moveable.' Being anxious to meet his wishes to the utmost of my power, I "cut down six feet of the cap sill to a line with the face of the weir apron, at that angle "up which Mr. Buckland has reported 'fish run without further assistance:' there is "therefore no obstruction at the sill. I submit to you that the terms of Mr. Buckland's "request which I have quoted preclude the possibility of my having made any promise to "him upon the subject, and I must again express my regret at his having allowed himself "to be committed to a statement having no foundation in fact."

On the action of this westernmost pass Mr. George reports, 8th December 1868, as follows :—"Mr. Williams has also extended the western pass by means of a groove made "of brickwork, commencing midway down the weir and carried close alongside the bank "for several yards below the foot of the weir. A similar effect, though in a less degree, "is caused at the mouth of this pass as at the eastern pass, by the pressure of water from "above causing the mouth to be a mass of foaming water which the fish find a difficulty "in getting through. However, the more vigorous male fish do occasionally ascend by "means of this pass, though at rare intervals. Not one in 50, or perhaps it would be "more correct to say not one in 100, which attempt the ascent succeeded; and the "fish in making the attempt are frequently washed out on to the stones at the side of the "pass, and all so expose themselves as to render their capture perfectly easy, thus offering "great temptation to poachers. One man has already been fined for taking salmon at "this pass. The water bailiffs and myself have closely watched this pass, and we have "occasionally seen the more vigorous male fish surmount it, but have never seen a female "fish have the slightest chance to do so, her condition depriving her of the necessary "power to stem such a powerful current. And as strong proof that the female fish "cannot get past, I can say that I have frequently noticed a day or two after a fresh, "when the fish have been making great efforts to ascend, that those left were nearly all "females, showing that the higher state of the water had enabled the males, being more "vigorous, to ascend, while the females were unable to do so.

"The great fault in the construction of these side passes consists in their being made "of a convex instead of a concave form, and this may easily be understood from the "habits of the fish, which, on meeting with an obstacle to their progress up stream, endea-"vour to clear it by a rush or leap, which carries them more or less over it according to "the depth of water from which the spring is made; and when the first rush or leap is "expended, if the fish finds himself in comparatively easy water he can surmount the "obstacle; but if, on the contrary, after the first rush he finds the stream become more "powerful, he succumbs and is washed back. The convex pass has this effect, while "one made in concave form makes the ascent of the upper part comparatively easy. "Another lesson may be taught from the western pass which proves the efficiency of "diagonal boards as passes for fish. This pass is raised about a foot above the weir, "and its outer side traverses the weir diagonally, though only in a slight degree; yet "the fish run up here with much greater facility than they do up the pass itself."

It will therefore be seen that, in consequence of the suggestions for the improvement of the fish passes in this weir not having been complied with, the weir presents a most deadly obstruction to the ascending fish, and until some means are taken for facilitating their passage over it no great improvement can be hoped for in the Severn fisheries.

Holt Weir.—I was much pleased to see the effect of a portion of the top sill of the weir having been cut away; an admirable run for the fish was made. Mr. George's report fully justifies my anticipations. "The result of the observations of the water bailiffs at "this weir shows that fish can get up the western pass when there is about 3 feet of fresh, "but with only 1 foot they cannot surmount it. On the eastern side, where a large " quantity of fish attempt to ascend, there is no pass, merely a slight cutting in the top " whaling, but the fish have no chance here until they can get over any other part of the " weir. I have no doubt that a diagonal board placed here, as suggested by Mr. Buckland, " would very much assist the fish in their efforts to get over. I trust this plan may yet " be adopted, but I should like to see a portion of the top sill cut away, as well as a " diagonal placed."

Lincomb Weir.—In consequence of the extent to which this weir is " blown," there is at the present time very little obstruction to the fish passing over it, and I trust if this weir be rebuilt that a copy of a pass as made by nature may be imitated as closely as possible by the hand of man. In the centre of this pass is a Forsyth ladder, which at present is inoperative, and at the time I examined it was full of weeds. I think it is highly probable that with a little ingenuity this ladder may be rendered efficacious. I am informed that it is intended to reface this weir in the course of the summer, and care should be taken to secure efficient fish passes in it.

Tewkesbury.—I inspected this weir and found that although the pass, on the principle of the free run in the corner, might be very efficacious, yet that, considering the great length of the weir and its great importance as being the lowest weir in the river, another pass should be placed in the western corner, by which the ascent of fish would be greatly facilitated; the water bailiff informed me that a large number of fish were frequently seen jumping in that spot vainly endeavouring to surmount the weir.

Powick Weir.—The Forsyth ladder is altered, and with its flood guard now acts well. Upon the west side of the weir diagonal boards had been fixed. I regret much to learn that during the late floods these boards became loosened, and that the pressure of the water against the loosened board had caused the iron pins by which it was fixed to the weir to displace some of the stones and undermine the board, the consequence being that a considerable hole was made on the face of the weir. The owner of the weir, Mr. Willis Bund, has passed over the damage done by this accident in a most generous manner. I myself had no hand in the fixing of this board, therefore will not undertake the responsibility of the damage which has accrued.

Bransford.—In company with Mr. George I surveyed this weir. It is a sloping weir. I suggested that a diagonal board should be placed upon it. A model of the plan I proposed I exhibited and explained to a full meeting of a board of conservators, and it was at once adopted. Mr. George proposed that a modification of this plan should be made, and that the stones should be taken up and replaced, leaving a groove by the side of a diagonal board let into the face of the weir. I rather objected to this plan, because I feared that, the season being advanced, the floods might come while the work was going on, and blow a hole in the weir before the stones were refixed in their places. Mr. George, however, at once set to work, and I am happy to say the pass was erected without any accident whatever, and to the perfect satisfaction of the miller himself, Mr. Quarrell, who behaved very well in the matter. I am happy to be able to state that this pass has proved to work exceedingly well. I here quote a printed report from the " Worcester Herald " of Sept. 4, 1868:—" It is satisfactory to be able to state as to the Teme weirs, " that the alterations at the weir at Bransford mill, suggested by Mr. Buckland, and " recently carried out, bid fair to provide a most efficient and permanent pass at that weir. " This information will be satisfactory to the owners of the other weirs on the Teme " above Bransford, as well as to those interested generally in the Teme fisheries, " especially the Tenbury Fishing Association, by whom a moiety of the comparatively " trifling cost of the alterations, viz., 25*l.*, was generously contributed."

Mr. George in his report also states as follows:—" Bransford Weir.—I have much " satisfaction in reporting that the two passes in Bransford weir are found to act " admirably; fish have very little difficulty in ascending these passes and are now de- " tained here very little. A great many salmon have been seen to pass over them. " They also appear to stand very well, notwithstanding that they have been severely " tried by trunks of trees, brought down the river by the freshes being forced against " them." I am happy to state that Mr. Evans, the owner of the Knightsford Bridge weir, the one next above Bransford, intends to place, at his own cost, a fish pass on that weir in the course of the summer, and when this is done the Teme will be opened as far as Tenbury, a distance of some 30 miles, the greater part of which is most valuable breeding ground.

By means of plans similar to that adopted at Bransford, I therefore trust, that that important tributary of the Severn, the Teme, may be opened up for salmon, thereby not only increasing the area of the spawning ground, but also giving the gentlemen who live on its banks a real personal interest in the salmon fisheries of their county.

The injurious effects of the Navigation weirs as obstructions to salmon on the Severn are very great, and the interests of the upper proprietors are so important that I should be sorry to see only one pass placed on each of these weirs, unless indeed that pass be perfection; the above statement will show that the present passes are far from it.

I regret, moreover, much to learn that two new weirs are about to be built across the Severn below Gloucester; there can be no doubt that the erection of these weirs will be exceedingly detrimental, not only to the upper proprietors but to the fisheries of the Severn in general, inasmuch as the lower proprietors will probably get more than their fair share of fish; and in a few years the stock of fish throughout the river will be diminished in consequence of fewer fish being able to pass up to breed. A vast amount of correspondence has taken place from this office, and many interviews have been held with gentlemen interested in this subject. Many plans have been proposed and many arguments held relative to the proper design for passes in these two new weirs, which come most decidedly under the operation of the 25th section of the Act of 1861. Those negotiations I regret to say have failed in consequence of the Severn Navigation Commissioners seeking for power to close the fish passes at all times when the water is not running over the apex of the various weirs, which power the conservators felt themselves unable to grant, as it would practically close the river to the ascending fish during the summer months, and thereby totally deprive the upper proprietors of their share of fish. Several petitions have been deposited against the bill now in the course of its passage through Parliament.

My colleague and I will spare no pains to see that justice is done to the owners of fisheries on the Severn and the public in general, and this with as little interference as possible with the interests of the Severn Navigation Commissioners.

THE CANTERBURY STOUR.

I am glad to be able to give a satisfactory report of the progress of this little river, which I have visited twice during the past season; the ladder on the Forsyth plan was formerly inoperative; the difficult place in this ladder was out of sight under an archway. By crawling under the archway I was enabled to discover what the defect was, and the alterations which I proposed have been effective, inasmuch as the keeper has, since these alterations have been made, seen fish go through it. The ladder on my principle of pools connected with the hatchway of a mill has continued to act well, and fish have been seen going up.

On the evening of Thursday, November 29th, the keeper saw three fish go through this ladder, one weighing over 20 pounds; the next morning another fish was found in the ladder, and at 12 o'clock the same day a fifth; this I think will prove that the principle of this ladder is correct. A second ladder upon my pool plan has been erected at his own expense, by Montague Kingsford, Esq., at Seaton mill, opening up a considerable amount of spawning ground; two salmon trout have been seen above the ladder, and there can be no doubt but they passed up by means of it. The keeper in November last informed me that he knew of several nests already made in the river, and that fish from 12 to 20 lbs. were still in the deeps waiting to spawn. The fact of several young salmon and salmon trout (one of which, purchased by the mayor of Fordwich, was a marked fish that had been turned out) having been taken in the mackerel nets by the Ramsgate fishermen, also shows that the young fish have gone to the sea and that they are on the increase. I regret to have to report that upwards of 400 trout and young fry were poisoned by the water coming from the drainage of the barracks, and also by an accident at the gasworks. My colleague has called the attention of the War Office authorities to the latter case, and I am happy to say they have reconstructed the barrack filter, so that it is hoped no poisonous matter can now get into the river. I think it possible that the poisonous material in the barrack drainage might have been chloride of lime, which is largely used as a disinfectant.

The destruction of jack has continued. By the keeper's report book it appears that 1,052 pike have been destroyed, and that in front of the blow-boat 60 Fordwich or salmon trout have been saved during the past year. The jack thus destroyed have been distributed to 106 poor families. The hatching of fish last year by artificial means, carried on at great expense and care, was not so successful as one could have wished; the eels obtained access into the rearing brook and destroyed a great many of them. About 12,000 young fish were, however, let free into the river, but the process of hatching artificially has been resumed this past season with great energy, and it promises success; some disputes relative to the rights of fishing in the river, and also as regards certain stake nets at the mouth of the river, have taken place.

The Stour Fishery Association continues its efforts to stock the river in a most laudable manner, and the honorary secretary, Mr. Montague Kingsford, spares no pains nor trouble to protect the interest of this fishery; the netting is suspended entirely this year and will not begin till 1870. I shall be exceedingly disappointed if the efforts of the association are not rewarded by finding that they have a good stock of fish in their river. The Fordwich trout that have been seen this year are of very large size, the result of preserving the kelts; the net which was formerly stretched all across the river at Fordwich (see my report 1868, pp. 27,) has been entirely removed, and the fish have had every facility afforded them to increase and multiply. Most of the fish in this river are the Fordwich trout of Isaak Walton. It was stated by this great authority that the Fordwich trout do not rise at the fly, but it remains to be proved whether the statement made nearly two hundred years ago holds good in the present generation; at all events there can be no doubt that the angling for common trout has been greatly improved. Every effort is being made to restore salmon to the river, and the gentlemen of Canterbury and its neighbourhood deserve great credit for the manner in which they have persisted in the cultivation of their now long neglected river.

THE TEES.

In spite of the pollutions in its upper waters, I believe if a passage could be obtained for the ascent of salmon over Dinsdale dam that this river would greatly improve. Last year many fish spawned below the dam, working the gravel over and over again; at one time the bed of the river was "black with fish" that could not pass the dam. The ova, therefore, deposited under such circumstances were probably destroyed, whereas if the fish had been let up into the upper waters a considerable stock would have been added to the river. My colleague and I held a meeting of the fishermen at Dinsdale. They think the river a little improved since the Act has been in operation. The Tees is a late river; the generality of fishermen do not start with their nets till June or July. They will be glad to give up the month of February altogether, and wish to be allowed to go on fishing till the 17th of September. From the report of the conservators, I see that they think the open time should commence on the 15th of February, and end on the 15th of September. They are very anxious to be allowed to use a small mesh net in the months of June, July, and August, to catch the scurfs. The present mesh now enables all the smaller "scurfs" to escape; the consequence is that they are vastly accumulating in the river, in their opinion destroy the ova of the salmon, and are otherwise detrimental to the interests of these fish. My report on Dinsdale dam, the great barrier to the fishery interests of the Tees, will be found in my chapter on weirs and ladders.

THE TONE.

The River Parret, emptying itself into the Bristol Channel, is 38½ miles long and has a catchment basin of 561 miles. The Tone is one of its principal tributaries, and is 34¼ miles long.

I began my examination of this river at Bridgewater. I understand from J. S. Sealy, Esq., that there are several nets at work in the estuary for the purpose of catching sea fish. These are called "hose nets." It has been calculated by Mr. Wilton, of Bridgewater, who purchased all the fish caught by two hose nets, that the contents of all the nets was over 18 cwt., of the fry of soles, plaice, herring, whiting, &c. This enormous amount of fry was destroyed in one day; these nets are now kept at work the whole year round. It will be perfectly impossible to make the Tone or the Parret productive of salmon, in any quantity, if these "fixed engines" are allowed to continue their work of destruction, and I strongly advise the Tone Association to use all the influence they possess to have them taken up altogether. If this be impossible they should certainly be removed in the spring of the year, when the fry of sea fish are about, and the salmon smolts arrive in the sea from the fresh water.

I was pleased to observe that a tidal bore runs up through the town of Bridgewater, and it is highly probable that salmon frequently run up the river with (or soon after) the bore. Their progress, however, to the upper water, I regret to say, is prevented by a vast number of weirs, no less than 17 in number. The first weir I examined was at

Ham Mills. I explained to the gentlemen present how the stones should be arranged so as to form a series of pools and help the fish over this weir. I explained also how the eel traps at the mill head may be utilized. I also proposed that the gravel in the back water of the mill should be raked in order to encourage the fish to make their nests, but if the tide comes up as far as this point of course it would be useless to adopt this plan. I advise that this plan of cleaning the gravel to entice the fish to spawn should be put in force all the way up the river wherever it can be conveniently managed. The second weir is Creech Mill. My colleague, Mr. Walpole, has suggested a form of a pass which I believe is finished by this time. I trust it will prove as successful as it promises to be.

Bathpool weir is apparently a difficult obstruction; it may, however, be easily overcome if a diagonal board be placed on the sloping face of the weir, so as to concentrate the water against the wall on the railway side of the weir. That the fish would then pass up I have no doubt; I would also propose when water is scarce to fix a 9-inch plank on the top of the weir, to increase the run down the pass. This could be taken away in flood time.

At Obridge the obstruction is very bad for the salmon, it consists of four hatches; the best mode of getting fish over here would be to form a series of pools, (the breadth of one hatch only,) and to utilize the spare water, by means of allowing it to flow over the top of the hatch and not underneath. A model of this plan I exhibited at my lecture at Taunton. A simpler way would be to lift up one hatch entirely, rather than all four partially, whenever water could be spared.

The town sewer empties itself close by Obridge weir; the abominations thrown into the river by this sewer, not only ruin every prospect of the Tone ever becoming a good salmon river, but are doubtless the origin of the typhoid fever, which I understand is frequently prevalent in Taunton. This sewage question, therefore, resolves itself into a matter of life and death to the inhabitants of Taunton; and cannot be considered as bearing on salmon culture only. I am much pleased to hear that the Taunton Local Board intend to attack and do away with this abomination; I trust it may be done at once.

At Firepool, (which belongs to the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company,) we again find sewage, inasmuch as there are 8 feet of stinking soil, where there ought to be 15 feet of water; this also should be remedied at once. The lock-keeper (a most intelligent man), informed me that last year two salmon were caught at Firepool, and that the year before he had seen five salmon (in the month of October) at Obridge weir. This man should be employed to pass the fish up by opening the hatch, whenever a fish is seen below the weir.

Above the town of Taunton is French weir. Here Dr. Woodforde had hooked a kelt, which was afterwards caught at Obridge. The owner of this weir, Mr. Davey, will probably allow the conservators' water bailiff to raise the hatch whenever the fish get to the pool below the weir. I understand that for 20 miles above Taunton, i.e., above French weir, there is good spawning ground, but at the same time a great many weirs, the chief of which are Bishop's Hull, Oldbury, Barr House, Fideoak, Hele, Bradford, and Ash.

We then come to Hornsea weir, on the property of E. A. Sanford, Esq., of Nynehead Court. This gentleman has consulted with me upon the best means of passing the fish over this weir, and we have agreed that a certain board on the left side of the weir shall be removed when there is a fresh are in the river and the fish likely to be on the move. Above Hornsea weir is Sanford upper fall. I have shown Mr. Sanford how easily fish might be passed here. He has kindly promised that the plans suggested shall be carried out, and this at his own expense. The committee of the Tone Fishery Association should thank Mr. Sanford for this act of liberality.

Just above Tone Dale is a weir which heads up the water used in Mr. Fox's manufactory. This is by far the most formidable weir on the river, but I have explained to Mr. Fox how the fish might be passed up by a series of leaping boxes affixed to one of the shoots, in time of flood; and I think Mr. Fox will feel inclined to put up these boxes when the weirs below are opened up.

Above Tone Dale, for the distance of six miles or more, the river consists of a series of pools and "stickles." These are the places to which it is desirable that the salmon should be allowed to ascend. They would obtain concealment in the pools, and deposit their ova in the "stickles." As far as I examined the stickles, they are admirably suited for spawning purposes. It must not, however, be forgotten that in these narrow and shallow streams the salmon are very liable to be destroyed by poachers; water bailiffs must, therefore, be put on in the winter time to watch the fish.

Between Tone Dale and Taunton there are also, I am told, good spawning reaches, but these are not all available on account of pollutions. Mr. Fox has made some catch pits in which he treats the "serge" from his manufactory with muriatic acid. The oil, &c., from the serge being precipitated, the residue is allowed to run into the river; I would advise that experiments should be made upon fish with the water as it comes out of the pits, and also at half mile distances below, for it is possible that sufficient acid may remain in the water, after it runs from the pits, to injure the more delicate kinds of fry. Mr. Fox, nevertheless, deserves great credit for what he has already done; if more is required to be done I feel convinced he will at once carry out any suggestions that may be made.

Near Tone Dale I examined a brook which is a great offender to the fish interests, it is the Westford Brook which comes from the factory of the Messrs. Elworthy. I was much pleased that at my lecture at Taunton, it was publicly announced by Mr. Pinchard, that the Messrs. Elworthy are about to spend a considerable sum of money to prevent the poisonous material from the works flowing into the river. I sincerely trust these works may at once be put into execution.

Finally to recapitulate. Salmon formerly came up the Tone. They do not now. The chief reasons are that the breed has been nearly exterminated by three causes. 1st, Weirs. 2nd, Pollutions. 3rd, Poaching. There are at the present moment abundance of parent salmon in the estuary. These were probably born in the Severn, in the Wye, or the Usk. I trust some of them may be enticed to come up the Tone. But in order to gain this desirable object, we must open up the weirs for them. A—By making permanent passes. B—By opening one hatch altogether, i.e., from top to bottom, leaving a free gap (rather than all the hatches partially, so that water flows underneath them only) on every weir on the river. This should be done whenever a fresh is coming down, and of course the hatches at all the weirs should be raised simultaneously. The hatches should be raised in the night when the fish travel, and the mills are not at work. There will not be much expense attached to this; the details should be put under the management of one responsible person, who should be out at nighttime to watch, and report weekly to the Board of Conservators, who should themselves go about the river as much as possible. I would strongly advise that this plan should at once be put in operation, as salmon between this and the middle of December will be coming up the river. It may be possible to let some few pairs up the upper waters, which would spawn about next Christmas, thus a stock of young fish would at once be secured for the river.

In the meantime I am happy to report that Mr. Davey, of the Town Mills, has consented to allow an apparatus to be erected to hatch salmon this next winter by artificial means. I myself shall have great pleasure in lending an apparatus, and hope to be able to present some salmon ova. When fully developed the young fry must be turned down into the upper waters of the Tone.

I think that the conservators should turn their attention to prevent the destruction of the eel fry, as they are ascending the Parret, in the spring months, as if this be done the produce of the eel traps in the autumn months will be much increased.

At the beginning of February, I wrote to J. H. Biddulph Pinchard, Esq., Hon. Sec. Tone Fishery Association, to ask him to inform me if any action had been taken on the above report; he answers as follows:—

"Sir, Taunton, February 4, 1869.

"I am happy to be able to tell you that considerable progress has been made in preparing the river for the cultivation and encouragement of salmon. All the weirs from Creech to Tideoak have had ladders and fish passes fixed, under the superintendence and at the expense of the Committee of the Association. These weirs are nine in number, and some of them, as you are aware, very difficult; two at least being absolutely perpendicular, and very high. We have not been able to get very accurate accounts of the fish seen, but I think that there is no doubt that on several occasions fish have been seen both below and above the town, and the committee have little doubt that when the water is purified from the abominations so deservedly held up to reprobation in your report, salmon will frequent the Tone as they did in former days. I am happy also to be able to tell you that the fish hatching experiment which you so kindly assisted us in setting on foot is succeeding admirably.

"Truly yours,

"J. H. Biddulph Pinchard, Hon. Sec."

THE TAW AND TORRIDGE.

I visited these rivers for two purposes, first of all to settle a question as to whether paragraph 1, 29th section of Act 1861, had been complied with, namely, whether the upper surface of the sill of the salmon trap at Umberleigh Fishing Mill dam was on a level with the bed of the river, and also as to the position and action of a spur wall below this trap. The alterations I suggested have now, I believe, been fully carried out. Mr. Bassett, the owner of the mill, is anxious to meet the wishes of the Board in any way he can. On the 6th of August, the water being exceedingly low, a number of persons collected at the mill and insisted on stopping up the fish pass, there not being sufficient water in the river to cause the mill wheel to turn. The matter was referred to me, and I returned them the following answer: "By the fourth paragraph of section 28, 24 & 25 Vict. cap. 109, " penalties are mentioned to which persons who obstruct a free gap on a fishing weir " are liable. I understand, however, that Umberleigh Mill is one of the chief mills of " the country, that the farmers' labourers are paid a large proportion of their wages in " corn, which they have to get ground before they can get bread to eat, and that many " families have been without bread for three or four days, as they cannot get the " corn ground. Of course those who have obstructed the free gap have committed an " illegal act, and I much regret that they should have taken the law into their own " hands. Nevertheless, under the circumstances, I have come to the conclusion, after " much consideration, that whereas the supply of bread to the labouring classes is so " seriously affected by the present drought, it would be advisable: 1st, for the Con- " servators to caution those who have obstructed the free gap; 2d, to allow the obstruc- " tion to remain during the present drought—this is common charity; 3d, immediately " the river rises to its usual level, at once to remove the obstruction from the free gap." Shortly afterwards the water rose in the river, and the obstructions were at once removed from the gap.

I also visited the weir at Torrington, and with the kind permission of the Honourable Mark Rolle arranged diagonal boards on the weir (see "Salmon Ladders"). I am happy to be able to report very favourably of the stock of fish in the Taw and Torridge. Captain Whyte has published in the North Devon Journal some valuable statistical information, of which I give an abstract:—

"I beg to send you the amount of salmon caught this year by some of the fishermen in the estuary of the Taw and Torridge. I think by my selecting an average man we can make a very fair estimate as to what the 20 nets in the estuary have caught this year. I am advised by the fishermen to take 1,347 lbs. or 65*l.* as a fair average. This will show a sum of 1,300*l.* for the 20 boats, which, as there are six shares to each boat, is equal to nearly 10*l.* 17*s.* each share.

"This is allowed to be the best year they have ever had, and one of the greatest grumblers has already said to me that he hopes we will double the licence next year. The following are the names of some of the fishermen, with their catches of salmon, in the estuary of the Taw and Torridge in the summer of 1868: John Redler, 1,347 lbs., value 64*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*; Thomas Dark, 1,347 lbs., 66*l.* 14*s.*; Samuel Fishley, 1,323 lbs.; William Fishley, 58*l.* 14*s.*; John Dark, 104 fish, 68*l.*"

I look upon the Taw and Torridge as two of the best managed rivers in the county, and it is quite pleasing to see the energy the Conservators both individually and collectively devote to their duties.

THE TAVY, DEVON.

I inquired into the circumstances of a very serious case of fish poisoning which had taken place shortly before my visit to this river. It appears that a mine called Lady Bertha had been "drowned out" as it is technically called, and a considerable quantity of iron tackle had been left at the bottom of the mine. The Company became insolvent and the mine stopped working for some months; the water in the shaft became, therefore, stagnant, and probably highly charged with mineral matter. An order was made from the "Stannary Court" to pump out the water from the mine, and take up the working iron materials from the shaft, the water as it was pumped out did no injury until they came to the bottom of the shaft when the dregs and mineral sediment were thrown by the engines into the river. Owing to the excessively dry season which prevailed there at the time this mine was unfortunately pumped out, there was a very small stream of water in the river to counteract the poisonous matter, the consequence was, as Mr. Thos. Stephens (a most highly intelligent water bailiff) informed me, that no less than seven or eight hundred weight of salmon and trout averaging from one to twelve pounds small and great were all destroyed; a fearful destruction of valuable stock in the river, and by no means redounding to the credit of those who had the management of the operation of pumping out the mine.

This is a warning to boards of conservators to be exceedingly watchful that mines are not pumped out in the summer. I am happy to hear that since this Lady Bertha mine did this destruction it has been entirely abandoned and does no more injury.*

There is only one mine now working that empties its mineral water into the Tavy, viz., Wheal Friendship, and every effort is promised to be made to render the same harmless to fish. The angling will, therefore, be much improved.

The board, I was glad to hear, has ordered the purchase of the pumps of the mines which are abandoned, so that they will not have to be brought to the surface, and the poisonous water need not be pumped up from the shafts.

I am informed by the Secretary that the Tavistock Canal Company have not yet carried out their promise of having a grating fixed at the mouth of their canal, but that Mr. Rundle, the Duke of Bedford's architect, has been instructed to erect an efficient grating at once. I am now in correspondence on this point.

Near the town of Tavistock I visited some copper mines, called the Erlake mines. The mineral agent, Mr. J. Paul, for the Duke of Bedford, who owns these mines, showed me some catch pits, the construction of which was on the point of completion. There are six catch pits, each 30 feet long by 20 wide and 4 feet deep. If not sufficient, Mr. Paul has ordered more catch pits to be made, subject to the judgment of a scientific man. Mr. Paul informed me that the Duke of Bedford has eleven mines, and upwards of 1,700 people are employed in the working of them. As the leases fall in, the Duke has given orders that a clause (of which I have been kindly allowed to publish a copy) shall be inserted in the leases. The clause has already been inserted in one lease.

"Wheal Crelake Mining Lease, March 25, 1868.

"The company shall at once make, within a piece of land which will be set apart for their use by his grace's steward, six pits of not less dimensions than 30 feet in length, 20 feet in breadth, and 4 feet in depth, for the reception and cleansing of the mineral water from the dressing floors before it falls into the river Tavy; and should the means above prescribed fail to arrest the poisonous substances held in suspension by the said water, the company shall take such other necessary and reasonable means for its purification as may be recommended by any person or persons who may be chosen to decide thereon under the arbitration clause contained in his grace's mining leases.

"N.B.—A clause to the same effect will be inserted in all other leases granted to mining companies in the future, but with such alterations as the nature of each locality and the experience gained may suggest.

"Bedford Office, Tavistock, Sept. 21, 1868."

Of the general prospect of the Tavy, the Secretary reports as follows:—Some gentlemen last year had some excellent sport with the peal, Mr. Bradshaw killing in four successive days, principally with the fly, 43 fine peal, a few of them weighing nine and ten pounds; and in one week the water bailiff's book notifies that 150 odd were taken by rod and line fishing. It is confidently hoped that the Tavy, by careful preservation, may again be the famous salmon river it was in days gone by, and that this delicious food may be obtained from it at a cost that may be within reach of the poor as well as the rich.

For an account of the salmon ladders on the Tavy, see chapter on salmon ladders.

THE WYE.

I have carefully examined the details of the net fishing as carried on in the estuary by Messrs. Miller, lessees of the Duke of Beaufort's fisheries. The mode of fishing in this river is by means of boats with stop nets; there are 21 of these boats worked below Chepstow Bridge and nine above. Three draft nets are also employed by Messrs. Miller, but the draft nets I am told do not pay on an average their working expenses. The peculiarity of the fishing of these stop nets is, as far as I could observe it, that the bottom of the net is only from 2 to 4 feet in the water (the average would be 3 feet), and the poles of the boats must be 28 feet long to touch the bottom in such a manner as to keep the boat fixed; it appears to me, therefore, that it is impossible but that a large number of fish escape capture, considering the quantity of water which remains available for them to swim in, and which is not commanded in any way by the nets. The boats are allowed to fish in rows, thus: at westward point 20 boats are allowed abreast, at eastward point 10 boats are allowed abreast, from that to Chepstow Bridge not more than two are allowed abreast; there are 62 berths allowed for 24 boats below Chepstow Bridge, and only 13 boats allowed above the bridge.

* I understand that the pollution consisted of disintegrated arsenic, a little copper, with copper pyrites.

This mode of fishing has been carried on for 300 years, and, strange to say, no improvement has been made in this particular way of fishing; and I am satisfied it is the only mode by which that portion of the Wye can be fished.

I gather that the upper proprietors are of opinion that these nets capture more than their fair proportion of fish.

I therefore called on Mr. Alexander Miller for a statement of the hours his men fish, which is as follows:—

"That on neap tides they fish about 27½ hours per week, and on spring tides they can only fish from 1¾ to 2 hours, and only when the weather is favourable; thus on an average they do not fish more than 2¼ hours each tide, and owing to the extreme weekly close time and the fearful wash of the tides, which rise from 40 to 50 feet and run at the rate of nine miles an hour, they are unable to fish more than 10 tides a week, in ordinary weather. This will show that they do not fish more than 4½ or 5 hours per day, or about 2½ days' fishing in each week, leaving 4½ days of weekly close time. The month of February is also made close time, and the fishermen never think of launching their boats till the middle of April.

I am also informed by Messrs. Miller that the amount collected from the licences paid in the Wye district in 1867 was over 600*l.*; their share of that sum amounted to over 315*l.*, and a similar result could be shown for the season 1868, and before the Act of 1865 they voluntarily spent over 300*l.* a year on the protection of the Wye It must also be remembered that besides their licences Messrs. Miller have to pay a large rent to the Duke of Beaufort, whereas people who fish in public fisheries pay their licence duty only, and have no rentcharges to meet.

As the Messrs. Miller pay this large sum of money towards the total amount of the licences I think it is but just they should have a fair return for their expended capital. A judicious outlay in the cultivation of a fine river like the Wye certainly will tend greatly to carry out the design of the Salmon Act, namely, to increase food for the public; at the same time it would be unfair that the upper proprietors should not have their proper share of fish. I understand that the "botchers" or grilse were very scarce in 1867, and scarcer still in 1868; in fact they were not there to be caught, and although I have taken great pains to investigate this subject I am at a loss to know what became of them. I also understand that the general fishing in the tidal portions of the Wye and Severn were bad in 1867, and in 1868 they were worse; the drought probably had a great deal to do with this; the salmon kept out to sea and would not take the river. Later on in the year, however, they improved, for in September and October of 1868 such large numbers of salmon appeared in the estuary waiting to ascend to their breeding grounds, as the old fishermen had not remembered for a long time past. Botchers were scarce simultaneously in Scotland, Ireland, and elsewhere.

Considering the variations in the quantity of salmon, which arise from inexplicable causes, a variation in results not peculiar to salmon only but common to other fish, sea as well as river, migratory as well as non-migratory; considering also that the running up of the salmon into rivers depends upon the state of the weather, the temperature and height of the water, as well as the peculiar instincts of the fish itself, I think that the upper proprietors should hesitate before they lay all the blame of the fish not coming into their waters to one cause out of many, namely, the nets in the tidal; it must not be forgotten that we have had three successive very dry summers, and fish cannot be driven like sheep to the slaughter.

Mr. Miller informs me that he objects to byelaws which would give power to the extension of the weekly close time, not only, as remarked above, on account of the diminished time in which he has to fish, but because private property should not be interfered with, and too much power might be given to the upper proprietors, who might enact byelaws injurious to those who either hold private fishings in the estuary and tideway or pay rent to landlords for the same.

POLLUTIONS.

In my last two reports I entered somewhat fully into the important subject of pollutions. I shall not, therefore, now attempt to treat of them in detail. In July 1867 I wrote as follows:—"Water is as indispensable to the human being as it is to fish. Impure and " polluted water will encourage disease, especially cholera; pure water will disarm " disease of its powers, and at the same time be made available for growing excellent " human food in the form of salmon and other fish. Thus, then, it will be seen that the " question of pollution of rivers affects not only the salmon, but every individual among " us; and the question assumes a far greater public importance than if it were applied to " salmon alone."

It gives me great pleasure to find that this idea is now completely recognized by the Government and by the public mind, and that "the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the best means of preventing the pollution of rivers" are doing excellent work; I will, therefore, leave the general subject of pollutions in the hands of the gentlemen who form the Commission, with the hope that the measures which they advise will be sufficient to keep the water clean, not only for the benefit of human health, but also to the encouragement of fish life.

I cannot, however, help remarking that pollutions may be divided chiefly into two classes—firstly, sewage; secondly, pollutions from mines and manufactures. In treating the former, the "separate system" of drainage is in my opinion of great promise, and will remedy to a great extent the evil complained of; full explanation of this system will be found in "A Treatise on Sanitary Management and Utilization of Sewage in 1865, by W. Menzies, deputy surveyor of Windsor forest and parks." By the plans proposed by this gentleman the sewage matter is carried in separate sewers, and the rainfall is carried partly into the river, or is absorbed into the surface on which it falls. I would also refer to a very valuable pamphlet by Colonel C. B. Ewart, of the Royal Engineers, entitled "Report on the proper Principle of Drainage to be adopted in the Towns of Oxford, Eton, Windsor, and Abingdon." Colonel Ewart informs us that arrangements are in progress for the disposal of sewage at the following places:—Croydon, a large farm near Barking, Aldershot, Hounslow, Canterbury, Broadmoor, and Bedford.* Nature herself points out that decayed animal and vegetable matter should be returned to the earth from which it originally derived its chemical origin, and we can never improve on nature's plans. Sewage therefore should be utilized, and instead of being allowed to be a nuisance should be restored to the circular chain of mutually dependent life of which it forms but one link.

The pollution from mines is of a different character to that of town sewage; in many cases fish will actually assemble at the mouths of town sewers and devour all refuse that comes into the river; but it is apt to decompose as it floats down the river, and then becomes pernicious, especially if there happens to be a weir which causes it to accumulate below the entrance to the drain.

In my last report I gave the results of my observations on lead pollutions. I am happy, however, to be able to state that Mr. Wentworth Beaumont has caused a large series of new catch pits to be erected on his lead mines in the Wear. Mr. Thomas Sopwith, his agent, has carried out the details of this plan. My attention this year has been more especially directed to pollutions from china clay and other works in Cornwall. See reports on Fowey and Camel.

I venture, however, to remark that the result of my observations is, that the pollutions from mines act injuriously in three ways—firstly, they prevent the fish ascending rivers, the respiratory organs being exceedingly sensitive to any poisonous matter, either in chemical or mechanical solutions; secondly, the débris from the mines covers up the gravel in which the fish deposit their eggs, and even if they find a clean place it is very possible that the mud may come down and destroy the eggs or the fish as they are hatching out; thirdly, mine pollutions act injuriously in a way which I think has not yet been sufficiently recognized; it is this, the mud and other washings from mines choke up the aquatic vegetation in the bed of the river, the consequence being that insect life suffers, even if it be not utterly destroyed; the fry of salmonidæ are therefore deprived of their natural food, and are more or less starved.

WEIRS AND LADDERS.

In my report of 1867 I used the following words: "In order that salmon should " multiply its species three things are absolutely necessary; firstly, suitable breeding " grounds; secondly, suitable feeding grounds; and thirdly, a free and uninterrupted " passage from the sources of the rivers to the sea."

* Some of these works are now, I hear, completed.

I propose, therefore, to treat somewhat fully of the impediments which prevent "the free and uninterrupted passage of salmon," and also of the mechanical contrivances adopted, or which may be adopted, to pass the fish over these obstructions, viz., weirs, ladders, and passes. Weirs may be broadly divided into perpendicular and slanting, and again into those which have no pool and those which have a pool at their base. Weirs also are of very variable heights. It is evident, therefore, that one plan of ladder or pass will not be applicable to all weirs alike.

Upon the position, depth, and peculiarities of the pool, as I endeavoured to show in my last report, very much depends. The "predominant current" should also be carefully observed, as this is the natural high road for the fish, and by means of it they, for the most part, endeavour to ascend. If this predominant current has to be made, it should have such a direction given to it, that from whatever point the fish ascend from below, they will strike this current in some part of its course, and thus be led to the foot of the pass.

As men and air breathing animals pass over water by means of a bridge constructed in the air, so salmonidæ, who breathe in water, require a bridge of water to pass over obstructions situated in air, and it is to the construction of these "water bridges" that we must principally direct our attention; they come into play under circumstances where the distance which might be overcome by a jump and a spring on the part of the fish is too great.

PERPENDICULAR WEIRS.

Perpendicular weirs are most difficult to pass fish over, and therefore deserve attentive study. In all cases where a weir is not of too great a height, the channel of the river or brook not too wide, and the force of the water not too great, I have no hesitation in saying the best method to get the fish over is to construct a secondary weir below it, so as to raise the water, and thus in effect reduce the height of the obstruction, as far as the interests of the fish are concerned. The great importance of this I at once brought before the public, immediately after Mr. John Lloyd of the Usk brought this "pool system" to my notice some years since. This gentleman, to whom we all owe the origin of the idea, has applied it very successfully to many small weirs on the top and in the tributaries of the Usk, and it is now gradually being adopted all over the county.*

If a proper wall of masonry be too expensive, stakes should, where it is possible, be driven into the bed of the river, and big stones piled up against them. I might also hint that when the river is frozen over large stones can easily be pushed along the ice, holes may be knocked through the ice at the desired spot, and the stones allowed to drop into position at the bottom, or a cairn of stones may be piled up on the ice, and when the ice melts they will drop through into their places.†

Another plan to make a good secondary weir is to cut down a tree from the neighbouring bank, and jam it, branches and all, across the stream. Advantage should also be taken of any large stones in the bed of the river, and they should be so arranged as to become useful in ponding up the water. The interstices should be filled up either with rough planks or with old trees, or with stones which are lying about idle. Again, fir trees may be cut down and jammed in between the stones that are fixed in the bottom of the river, taking care to fix them on the up-stream side of the stones.

The plan of forming a secondary weir has been put in force at a commodious narrowing of the river at the foot of the Pool Quay weir on the upper Severn. I regret, however, to learn that early in the winter a portion of the secondary weir was washed down, and it became therefore comparatively useless. The repairs will doubtless be made good this summer. I must, however, not forget to mention that I anticipate the possibility of the pool system not invariably proving a success, inasmuch as it may happen that the pool may become filled up in time with stones, sand, &c. brought down by the river.

The Golitha Falls, on the Fowey, in the middle of a wood, near Doublebois station, is the best case I can point to where this pool plan made with rough materials has been carried out. The stones at the head of the fall have been re-arranged so as to concentrate the frothy water, which would otherwise have run uselessly over the edge of the fall, into "solid water." This predominant current has been conducted, by means of slight blastings (made by the quarrymen of the neighbourhood), into the pool below. The water (just at the spot before it rushes out of the pool in the form of "a race") has been obstructed by large stones, which, being close at hand, have been re-arranged into the form of a secondary weir. The water is thus raised against the face of the original weir, and the result has been most satisfactory. These alterations were carried out by Chapell Hodge, Esq., of Doublebois, who not only superintended but also worked at the alterations with his gamekeepers. The total expense was three sovereigns only. Taking a hint from this case, I would advise that in all cases some one gentlemen residing near the locality, should personally superintend the work, and not leave the details to contractors. Money is often spent in these matters where a little ingenuity and personal labour would have produced much better results. Mr. C. Hodge has made the Ashford weir passable on very much the same plan as that adopted at Golitha.

* I lately heard of a case where a raft of timber coming down a river in America was wrecked on a weir; the timbers of the raft became jammed on different parts of the slope of this weir. The salmon which before this accident had never been seen above this weir, were observed above it after the accident, the scattered timbers formed pools and diagonal boards, and gave them a passage.

† Fresh run salmon like to lie in sharp running water, but at the same time they will, if they can, choose a big rock or stump behind which they lie out of the full force of the current. I would suggest that where there are long reaches, with nothing but small gravel at the bottom, and the water is of sufficient depth, that stones may be dropped in to afford good resting places for the fish, and at the same time good salmon casts for the angler. These stones might readily be placed in their position when the river is frozen over.

Another large natural waterfall which might be made passable, somewhat after the manner of the Golitha Falls, in this way, is the Stainforth force on the head waters of the Ribble. A few yards below the actual fall, two large rocks are found at the narrowing of the stream. The interspace between these might easily be blocked, and apertures blasted in the top of the fall above, which could be filled up again in the summer months, so as not to spoil the picturesque beauty of the fall.

A formidable obstruction to the ascent of salmon which it is most desirable to bridge, both for the benefit of the upper proprietors and also for the net fishermen below, is the Falls of Cenarth, which strike right across the bed of that valuable river the Teify. These falls are caused by a natural precipice of rock. An advantage is taken of their presence to divert the water into a mill for the use of a mill-wheel, and also to work a salmon trap on the other side. The salmon swim under the bridge a little below the fall through an exceedingly deep and narrow channel excavated in the rock. They then meet with three currents, which are formed by an enormous mass of rock, commanding an entrance into this deep and narrow channel. Should the fish take the right-hand current, they will ascend through deep water which runs by the side of the natural precipice till they arrive at a sloping weir half natural and half artificial; this is the "predominant current," and the fish for the most part take it. This weir is and has been a favourite place for poachers, who are in the habit of removing some of the stones of the weir, thereby forming a decoy channel, in their passage through which the fish can be easily secured. If the fish take the left-hand stream by the side of the large rock they will meet with a small current coming down out of the trap, or if they do not take this current they will find themselves in a funnel-shaped pool, and facing a precipice of rock which at the time I was there I managed to measure and found it to be about eight feet in height. When trying to ascend this precipice the salmon are poached, and upon the surface of a rock on the northern side of the river I found a place cut out in the rock of the shape of a man's foot, and doubtless many fish have been speared for many years past from this spot as they fall back in their vain efforts to surmount this obstruction.

I spent nearly two days upon these rocks with a view of devising a method to facilitate the ascent of the fish. First of all it is desirable to prevent them taking the right-hand stream and running the gauntlet of the poachers at the semi-artificial weir. I therefore proposed that this weir should at once be staunched and made water-tight as far as possible, and I would cause the water to form a predominant current which would run by the side of a little island which forms part of the plateau of rocks, and I would take this newly made predominant current to a point just above the big rock before mentioned.*

By means of charges of powder I would blast away the lip of the precipice about two feet in depth, and would thus open up a road. I would also shift a large rock from its present position in order to utilize it for the purposes of the salmon. The ascending fish would, if this were done, meet with a predominant current that would take them not into a position of danger, but after a few yards of swimming into a deep pool where they would find safety and no obstruction to their further ascent.

I would also propose to modify the conditions of the current which runs on the northern side of the large rock. I have before stated that the water falling over this part of the precipice finds its exit through a funnel-shaped aperture. Nothing could be easier than to block this aperture by means of boards or logs of trees jammed into the natural crevices of the rock. The natural consequence of this would be that the pool above the obstruction would be deepened, and the height which the fish have to ascend proportionally diminished. The water has of itself worn away part of the lip of the precipice which is now somewhat in the shape of the lip of a jug. A charge or two of gunpowder judiciously managed in this locality might be made to deepen this already half made pass. I would also knock away a certain projecting corner of the big rock below, so that by sending out a deep current in a somewhat fan shape, the fish might be induced to avail themselves of the newly constructed passage.

There is yet another way of getting the fish over Cenarth Falls. It is a fact that ascending fish will go up what appears to me to be an unusually steep ascent and follow up the stream, which unfortunately leads them into the trap. If they will do this under their present difficulties I see no reason why their ascent should not be facilitated, and could this trap* be got rid of, either legally or by arrangement with the proprietor, the current which is now used to work a trap might be made available to form a pass which would be supervised under the direction of the Board of Conservators. The objection to this pass is that the fish are liable to be poached; but this difficulty I think might be overcome. This description may be difficult to understand without a diagram. I have two good photographs at my museum of Kenarth rock, which I should be glad at any time to explain to any gentleman interested in the matter. I give the above details to show how a natural obstruction may be treated. I regret much, however, to learn that none of my instructions have been carried out, owing to disputed questions between the owners of the river banks. I trust these disputes may be soon settled, as the important fisheries of the Teify suffer in the meanwhile.

In cases where the fall is too high and the water too powerful for any attempt to raise the water by means of blocking the stream below, there is another alternative, namely, to make a pass round by the side of the fall. In such cases a channel should be cut in the soil, or blasted out of the rock. The lower opening should come to the foot of the fall, or at all events to a place where the fish would find it easily, and the "intake" should be so situated as to give an easy gradient to the whole pass. The pass may be made either in a circular form or by means of channels cut in a zig-zag manner. The Monk Oakhampton weir on the Okement would be well suited for this experiment. In all cases a flood guard should be placed at the top of the pass to prevent a too great flow of water, and I think the plan used for culverts in oyster "clares" would be worthy of a trial if the valve were reversed in its action. This pass round the side might be covered over with boards or with brambles, &c., and laid out over poles. I believe the fish would not care for the pass being in darkness. The method of going round by the side of the weirs is well illustrated by the two parapets on the north side of the square at Charing Cross. The plan of the steps at either end of this quasi weir might I think be made available for salmon fishery purposes; "water steps" taking the place of what are now stairs.

It will, however, I fear, be found that the process of quarrying and blasting a passage round a weir will be often an expensive operation, but we have an alternative.

It sometimes, I may say not unfrequently, happens that the leat going to the mill is prolonged to some distance below the line of the weir, so that a spectator standing on the weir would see the mill-leat running along the side of the river, on his right or on his left hand, and below the weir. Here, then, we have a chance to assist the fish to pass over the weir, could we but make a connexion between the pool at the foot of the weir and the mill-leat itself.

There is a formidable upright weir on the Cothi, near Carmarthen. I advised, at my last visit, to pass the fish over by means of pools, but the plan has not as yet been carried out. By the side of this weir, which is of timber supported by struts, there is a mill leat, and in looking along it I found a hatchway some 12 or 15 yards from the foot of the weir. Here, then, we have a pass already made. All that is necessary to be done is to build a wall of rough timber or stone on the down side of this hatchway; the timber should be placed in a sloping direction, its further end being directed towards the foot of the weir. A baulk of timber should also be fixed between the timber and the weir so as to form a pool. When the sluice is opened a current of water would instantly flow inwards to the foot of the weir where fish are assembled.

Feeling this current they would, I feel convinced, make a rush for the opening, and would in all probability (assisted by the pool made for them) pass through at once. If the force of the water be found to be too great, I could show the conservators a plan by which it could be modified. When in the mill-leat there might be a danger of the stream taking the salmon down under the wheel. This must be obviated by a grating placed diagonally across the mill-leat between the hatch and the mill-wheel. The objection raised to this plan would of course be that it would facilitate poaching. I would, however, place a lock and key upon this hatch, the key to be given in charge of the water bailiff. I would call this hatch the "conservators' hatch." A model (No. 4) of this pass can be seen at my museum. I would put it under regulations, such as those suggested by Captain Whyte, the energetic conservator of the Taw and Torridge, whose proposal is as follows:

* The position and action of salmon traps should always be carefully noted, for the contrivances of trap makers and poachers for killing fish may often be made subservient to their preservation.

"That all boards of conservators should have the power to place side sluices at the "head of all mill or irrigation leats at their own expense, and to make a channel to the "river; but that they should at the same time be compelled to place sluices across the "leat below the side sluices, and not interfere with the millers' sluices. These sluices "should not be used under a heavy penalty while the mill is working, nor should they "be used from the 1st of June till the 1st of October, except in a fresh, to allow fish to "pass up or down. While the Board's sluices are working, the miller should not put his "sluices down, or in any way hinder the passage of fish. Anybody breaking the above "rule should on conviction be fined 10*l*. This would enable the Board to let fish up to "their spawning beds, and the old fish down in the spring of the year, at their own "expense, and without interfering with the miller or landed proprietor."

In my remarks upon gratings in a subsequent page I have shown what the Scotch provision is for preventing smolts and kelts being destroyed by mill-wheels. If the model that I have made be examined, it will be seen that by the plan of making a "conservators' hatch" which commands a cutting from the mill-leat into the bed of the river, not only may the descending fish be saved, but the ascending fish may be passed upwards. The same route is available for both purposes. I therefore strongly recommended that where the locality suits, this form of pass should be put in operation. If it succeeds great expense may be saved to the conservators, inasmuch as watching and painstaking will often bring about the same desired result as a considerable amount of expenditure of money.

Upon the river Plym, Tavistock, I have examined three perpendicular weirs made of granite. A new ladder, also granite, under the instructions of Mr. Rundle, architect to the Duke of Bedford, handsomely constructed, was in course of building on the right-hand side of the weir at Tavistock. The plan adopted was that of the Ballisodare ladder (see model in the museum). One half of the ladder is inclined from the crest of the weir at a gentle slope towards the bed of the river; arriving at a certain point the second half of the ladder meets it; the foot of this second part ends in the pool at the base of the weir. The fish waiting in the pool would be led by the predominant current to the ladder, and would probably ascend with ease, though I am not sure but that a flood guard would improve it. The latest report of the action of this latter I received from Mr. Stevens the head water bailiff, who says: "The weir at Tavistock is now no obstruction at all; "the fish go up as easily as if they were going up the natural course of the stream." Mr. Rundle, who planned this ladder, has wisely not followed the idea of placing the steps alternately, but has fixed them right across from side to side (see page 32), so that a series of pools would be formed, and not a swift current of water running down in a serpentine form. A model of the ladder will be found (No. 6) in my museum, and a photograph of the pass itself is published at Tavistock.

At the two perpendicular weirs above this ladder at Tavistock two others have been placed at the side of the weirs, but they have a very great fault: it is, that the toe is not in the pool at the foot of the weir. I have suggested an easy and inexpensive alteration to be made to these ladders by means of shifting stones, &c., so as not only to cause the current to flow to a place where the fish will find it, but also to form a pool at the bottom of each ladder. At the time I examined them the water was at its very lowest, but when the water rises it is probable that they will at once become effective. In November last I received the following report from the head water bailiff: "I have not seen any "fish go up, but they must have done so, as there are fish up in the moor streams and "in fact all the tributaries of the river."

I consider this double ladder, ordinarily called the Ballisodare ladder, may be found very serviceable in many places and under many conditions, but its design must not be universally adopted, nor will the form of its steps always prove a success. Flood guards would also be improvements. I received from Mr. Thomas Ashworth some admirable plans of a double ladder as applied by Mr. Roberts, the engineer at Ballisodare, and also at Colooney, where they seem to have acted very well. I understand it is in contemplation to erect Ballisodare ladders upon three or four weirs on the Severn. The position and circumstances in which these ladders will be placed should be taken into the most serious consideration before the plan is permanently determined upon. Still I think the idea is an exceedingly good one, and that several of the ladders which are now inoperative (especially those which project too far into the pool), might be made to act if they were altered to the Ballisodare plan.

One of the most formidable obstructions that I have examined is the dam at Dinsdale side (on the Tees). This dam measures 162 feet long, with a curve of 14 feet, is 6 feet 8 inches high on the Durham side, and 6 feet 4 inches on the opposite side by the culvert. I shall not attempt to go into the past history of this important barrier. When I paid my official visit the water was running over the weir, and the dam was practically no obstruction; nevertheless, in a low state of water it is practically insurmountable to salmon. On each side of the weir there is a culvert; on one side of the river this culvert is used for the waterwheel, and on the other side the water is allowed to rush through the culvert, and this is supposed to be a sufficient pass for the salmon. This culvert is 20 feet long and 5 feet wide; it was formerly guarded by two hatches or cloughs. These I measured: they were each 4 feet 6 idches wide and 7 feet 3 inches high. They are now never put into their places at the head of the culvert, through which the water rushes with great force, and the lower the river the greater the velocity of the water in the culvert. The ascending salmon cannot withstand the weight and velocity of the water, and are dashed down again. Besides this they have no fair run at the opposing current, inasmuch as there is no pool at its lower end from which they can take a spring, and if they come at it at all they must come sideways, and a fish that opposes its side to a current has a good chance of being washed backwards immediately. I was assured by an old man named Harrison, who has known the dam many years, that in former times many salmon, sometimes 30 stone of a night, were caught in this culvert, which was then used as a trap, and that most fish were caught when the hatches (now removed) were raised only a little way; and Harrison assured me that from his experience the easiest and cheapest way to let the fish up would be to restore the old hatches into their former places, leaving an interspace of six or eight inches for the water to flow underneath. He advised this, because they used to catch more fish when the hatches were raised to this height.

These statements are worthy of consideration, and I confess I could not understand them. I therefore made an experiment on my own person. I found a hatchway four feet in diameter situated on a trout stream, through which the water was running at the depth of 3 ft. 8 in. Descending into the current, and kneeling down, I opposed my chest to the full force of the water. It was with great difficulty I prevented myself being immediately washed downwards. I then caused the hatch to be put in. When it had passed down about a foot the pressure was sensibly diminished, and as it descended the force of the water gradually decreased. When the hatch was six inches from the bottom the pressure was very slight as far up as the hatchway itself, and a fish could easily have swum through it, but in the interspace between the hatch and the bottom of the pass the water rushed through with great force. I tried the experiment of passing a dead trout through this opening, and I do not think from what I observed that if the fish had been alive he could have got through it.

If we apply the results of the experiment on a small scale to Dinsdale, we shall be able to understand the theory held by the old fishermen, that salmon would pass underneath a hatchway raised from six to eight inches. I am inclined to believe that the fish would, under the above circumstances, swim up as far as the hatchway and there be caught in the trap. The fishermen had the idea because they came up into the trap that they would therefore go through the hatchway; this I do not think likely.

The way that I should attempt to make this culvert passable to fish would be to divide it out into chambers by means of slanting weirs, diminishing in height from top to bottom, exactly after the model of ladders which have proved so successful on the Stour; but it must be remembered that there is no lead into this culvert and no pool at the base. I would therefore propose to make a pool by means of large pieces of timber or of stones clamped together with iron; the fish, searching along the base of the weir to find the way through, would easily leap into this pool; they would then perceive the current coming down through the pass, and, if I mistake not, would very easily leap from pool to pool, and thus pass the dam.* Of course a flood guard should be carefully arranged at the entrance to the pass, so that a given quantity of water should always flow through the pass at a velocity which should never, even at the highest floods, be superior to the muscular force of the salmon. Another plan proposed by Mr. John Lloyd, and also much approved by Mr. Surtees himself, is to place a secondary weir below the original weir; but this, I feel convinced, would be a very expensive piece of work, though its efficacy would be undoubted.

Another plan, as suggested by Mr. Wilson of Stockton-on-Tees, would be to make a byewash round by the side of the mill, commencing 20 or 30 yards above the dam on the mill side. The byewash would be about 100 yards long, and the incline of the pass about 1 in 15. It should be divided out into pools and a regulating hatch should be placed at the upper end. A plan somewhat similar to this, which I recommended for adoption in the old fish pass at Warkworth, on the Coquet has, I understand, succeeded very well. I feel convinced that the proprietors of the dam are willing to give every assistance to pass the fish up as long as the weir is not interfered with. If the same money that has been spent in law had been expended upon helping the fish to traverse the obstruction the difficulty would have been solved long since. I hope, however, the time is not far distant when arrangements may be made that this dam may be removed altogether.

There are many weirs which have the pool at some distance from the actual foot of the obstruction, and in fact this state of things prevails at most mill-tails throughout the country.

These weirs have generally hatches let into them which are drawn up in time of flood. When, however, a slight fresh occurs, the miller gets rid of the superfluous water by raising all his hatches partially; the water then rushes with very great velocity through the aperture, and it is almost impossible for any fish to get through under the hatch.

It cannot make any difference to the miller whether the water which he does not want goes over or under the hatchway; I therefore advise that in such cases my plan, which I reported as being so successful on the Stour, should be adopted. It is, that the upper portion of one of the hatchways be made moveable, so that the spare water runs over, and not under, the hatch. This water would fall direct upon the boards and spread itself out. This must, however, be remedied by making a series of transverse obstructions—two or three in number will generally be found sufficient—so that the height to be surmounted be divided into two or three successive leaps.

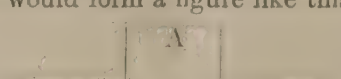
In times of floods the boards which form the obstructions can be entirely removed. This form of ladder has proved most successful at two places on the Stour. (See report on that river.) Model No. 3 at my museum illustrates the details.

This plan has also been adopted with slightly varied details in trout cultivation.

At the head of the oblique lake in Windsor Great Park there is a stone perpendicular weir, measuring between four and five feet in height. In order to afford the Great Lake trout in the lake an opportunity of getting up over the weir and reach some spawning ground which has been prepared for them in a brook, W. Menzies, Esq., deputy superintendent of Windsor Park, erected a series of three leaping boxes. A few hours after these boxes were erected the trout were seen to pass up with the greatest ease. The design and arrangement of this plan does Mr. Menzies the greatest credit, as it has quite solved the difficulty at this place.

Mr. Garnett's weir at Clitheroe presents a formidable upright structure, and as described in my last report a quasi ladder has been placed at its west side. Having continuously studied the model of this weir, which Mr. Garnett has been good enough to place in my museum, I feel almost certain that a modification of the pool system as that at the Stour and at Windsor would prove efficacious. In this spot also at present the water is allowed to run underneath the hatchway. I should like to see it made to run over the hatchway, and the present baulks enlarged so as to make a series of pools.

The idea of leaping boxes, or as I call them "water stairs," may be applied in a different manner. If a drawing be made of a set of "water stairs," and the paper be reversed, we shall have the appearance of a weir, the middle of which retires as it were up stream, leaving a space divided out into steps. Following the line of the top of the weir, it will be found that if such a structure be built into a weir, the water would always be kept up to any desired level, only that the actual top of the weir, instead of being in a direct straight line, would form a figure like this—



If the upper edge of the middle portion of the weir at A be made slightly lower than the rest of the top of the weir, directly any water came down the river it would at once fall over into the line A, and filling the "water stairs" would not only tempt the fish waiting in the pool to move upwards, but also afford them facility for doing so, by means of water stairs built for that purpose. It may be desirable to place a flood guard. A somewhat similar plan as that now proposed has been deposited by Mr. Brady at my museum.*

The advantage of this plan is:

1st. That the water is always kept at the desired level, and this does not interfere with the mill wheel.

2nd. That it commences to work independent of the interference of man.

3rd. That being in the middle of the weir the fish are not so liable to be poached as if the pass were at the side of the weir.

4th. That in its operation it would, to my mind, be equivalent to a "free gap" in the weir, in which the force of water would be broken at times of floods, and in time of ordinary water ponded up into a series of steps. (See model No. 7.)

It has been proposed by some gentlemen to build salmon ladders of sheet iron, and I think it is a good idea, but am afraid the expense would be too great unless old iron tanks of railway engine tenders could be bought at a reasonable price. A very ingenious plan of a series of three tanks to get fish over a high waterfall has been submitted to me by Mr. H. Lloyd of Fort William, Douglas, Isle of Man; but I fear the jumps from one to the other would be too great and the works too expensive.

SLANTING WEIRS.

I will now attempt to deal with a class of weirs which are exceedingly common, and at the same time difficult for the fish to pass. Sloping weirs present various heights and slopes and lengths, and the longer, higher, and steeper they are the more difficult they become for the fish to surmount. A salmon when charging up the face of a weir may be compared to an arrow from a bow. After it has ascended to a certain distance it loses its propelling power, the weight of the water overcomes its velocity and throws it back; of course the shorter the distance the salmon has to travel on the face of the weir the greater its chance of passing over. It follows, therefore, that if we can raise the water upon the face of the weir by means of a secondary weir built below it, the distance to be travelled will be lessened. I have thought of a plan of making a secondary weir below the exit of the water from the mill leat, so that the water which has done its work at the wheel might be made to form a pool at the base of the head weir; but this plan will not do, because it will interfere with the action of the wheel. Still I fancy the idea might somehow be put into practice. If we cannot make a secondary weir, either above or below the exit of the mill leat, we must seek for other remedies. The best possible mode of doing this is to lower one end of the weir; the passes at Tewkesbury and Bevere, on the Severn (see former pages), are good examples, especially as in the latter case the bank of the river causes the water to take a long and broad sweep. This plan has been successfully imitated at Holt weir, the object desired being gained by cutting away a portion of a baulk of wood which extended along the top of the weir. The lowest portions at the side of the weir should be as wide as possible, in order to lessen the pressure of the water.

There is a precipitous slanting weir, 7 feet 7 inches in perpendicular height, and with a slant or slope of 21 feet, at Pentrevellyn, on the Dee, and upon this a most admirable ladder was fixed, in 1863, by A. Mostyn Owen, Esq., secretary of the Dee board. It consists of a series of pools built with strong timber, which Mr. Owen considers to be a great support to the weir. A model, presented by this gentleman, can be seen in my museum. He says: "It is made on the scale of one inch to one foot. The shape of "the weir (a section of it) is represented by stones and cement. The pass is 9 feet "3 inches broad, and is in the centre of the weir; the top sill of the weir is cut down "about 3 inches only at the point where the pass is fixed. The waterline at very low "water is marked, painted in blue. At good water it rises so as to "cover" the lowest "compartment, and all being full of water, the water runs over all, because it comes in "at top through the lowered portion, and the partial opes between each pool are not "above 2 feet wide; consequently the water is more than enough to fill all the pools of "of the pass. The only alteration of the model from the original is, that I have made "each compartment go to the bed of the river itself, (which is a better plan than having "a wooden bottom,) by merely putting other pieces of timber at the sides so as to take

* This idea can be seen modelled as it were in the steps leading up to the door of many of the London clubs.

" them right down to the bottom, and filling the bottom with some Portland cement " and stones. The ope at bottom might be made at either or both sides if advisable. " The best proof of the efficiency of this pass was shown two years ago when it was " stopped for repairs, by turning all the water through the mill at a time when the water " was low. When it was stopped not a salmon was to be seen below the weir, but in a few " days a hundred salmon were collected there. As soon as it was repaired and the water " let through the pass again the salmon all disappeared. You seldom see fish in the pass, " because they do not show themselves in going from one compartment to another; it is " done so quickly that it requires a very practised eye to catch sight of them, and they " have plenty of depth of water and shelter in each."

I recommend this pass to be examined by all interested in the question, as it is one of the best in the kingdom. Its construction does Mr. Owen much credit.

At Warkworth dam, on the Coquet (a sloping weir), an excellent ladder can be examined; it is a Forsyth altered.

The idea of its construction was, I believe, first originated by John Tate, Esq., of Barnhill, near Acklington. The stops in the ladder are slanting (see "steps of ladders," at a subsequent page). Mr. Tate says: "This ladder is just about as nearly perfect " in principle as I should care to see. The fish that have been watched going up this " autumn have only occupied a minute and a half in the journey, and did not appear to " pause at all between the leaps. The angle at which the stops are fixed and the hollow " cut out of their upper edges are great successes; the latter, you may remember, is a " suggestion of the Duke of Northumberland's, and it is extraordinary with what a " small quantity of water the pass can work efficiently." Mr. Tate has kindly deposited a model (made on the scale of half an inch to the foot) of this excellent pass in my museum, No. 9.

Although as a rule I never like to heighten weirs, yet I think occasionally this principle may be allowable in order to economize and utilize the water which would otherwise flow over the dams in so thin a sheet as to be of no use to the fish. In fact its operation would, under certain circumstances, be equivalent to cutting a hole in the weir. The water flowing through this quasi hole in the weir might be made to run down in one continued concave sheet, or else cut up into a series of pools; this must of course depend upon local circumstances. The board or baulk put upon the top of the weir should not be fixed in an upright position, but made triangular, and one of its sides fixed flush exactly with the level of the weir itself. I have not yet tried this plan in action, but I think it well to throw out the idea. I regret much that I have not opportunities of trying such experiments as the above on a large scale. I have tried many experiments on a small scale, but the behaviour of water in a small zinc tank and in an open river is very different. There are two other ways of concentrating the water which might be tried on weirs, namely, zig-zags; these consist of small fir trees sawn in half so as to stand about four to six inches from the face of the weir, and placed at an obtuse angle in a zig-zag position; they have been affixed, at my suggestion, at Salmon Pool weir in the Exe. (See report on the Exe.) Under certain circumstances I believe they will be found successful. Another plan which I have not yet tried, but which may be feasible, is to fasten on to the face of the weir thick boards, the edges of which are cut into deep notches, leaving an interspace between the boards. Theoretically these notches ought to make a series of pools in which the salmon could rest awhile in their upward passage through the current which runs between the sets of notches. Here, again, I regret I have no stream on which to experiment.

DIAGONAL BOARDS ON WEIRS.

The idea of placing obstructions diagonally across sloping weirs to facilitate the ascent of salmon was first given to my colleague and myself, by the construction of the ladder at the Museum dam at Durham. The dam from top to bottom is 17 feet; the length of the diagonal obstruction (which is really the side of a Forsyth ladder) is 25 feet 6 inches, and the gradient of the weir is one in 5 feet 7 inches.* In my last report I stated that I proposed that this diagonal plan should be tried at the canal weir at Torrington. By the kindness of the Honble. Mark Rolle I was enabled last summer, with the able assistance of H. J. Pidgeon, Esq., to fix up two diagonals on this weir. On the 18th of November Mr. Pidgeon reports as follows:—" We have had some oppor-

* A good photograph of this ladder has been kindly taken for me by W. Henderson, Esq., of Durham.

" tunities of watching the action of the diagonals after a few moderate rainfalls, and I " am happy to be able to say that there can be no doubt that the diagonal baulks are a " valuable assistance in aiding fish over such weirs as ours. I have myself observed fish " run up the side of a baulk and clear the weir when they could not possibly get up " otherwise. Our water bailiff is very positive as to the great usefulness of these " diagonals, and there is this advantage with them, namely, the floods pass over them " harmlessly. They are not in the way, so to speak, of a heavy fresh, and when the " water settles down they are all right again; the right size will be from five to six inches " square." I must give Mr. Pidgeon the credit of the idea, derived from practical experience on the spot, of placing a second diagonal, so that the boards form a V shape, the water making a predominant current through the lower end of the V. Mr. Pidgeon says the "V diagonal is more useful than the single diagonal, as a predominant current which " is not overpowering brings the fish into the run, and up they go with ease when they " could not otherwise get up at all." I have received letters from Mr. John Bastart and other gentlemen residing at Torrington, in which they express their approval of the action of these diagonals. The Board of Conservators, I believe, are also satisfied. In their report this year we read: " The Rolle Canal weir has been satisfactorily improved " through Mr. Buckland's and Mr. Pidgeon's suggestion."

The above evidence will, I think, therefore sufficiently prove that at this Torrington weir at least, the diagonal baulks have proved a great success; but still I am far from saying they will be suitable to all weirs, as so very much depends upon the length of the weir and other local circumstances. In my last report a diagonal placed on a weir in the river Seiont was reported by Mr. Manley as being a success; this year he says, " Probably " owing to the spurs or stops being too high it did not succeed." I do not remember ever having recommended spurs or stops to be placed; they should at once be removed.

At my advice a diagonal obstruction has been placed on Bransford weir on the Teme. From the report on the Severn it will be perceived that it has succeeded admirably; it is so constructed that it cannot loosen the stones, as the diagonal at Powick weir has unfortunately done. The diagonals I placed at Hunsingore and Goldsborough weirs in Yorkshire (see report on Ouse) have turned out not to be successful; but as the experiments have cost little or nothing, and we have learnt a valuable lesson for future constructions, I cannot regret what has been done. The cause of the failure in both of the above cases I believe to be, that the weirs were too steep and the run for the fish too long. The diagonal placed on the Camel (see Camel report) has turned out a partial success.

I feel convinced there are many small weirs about the country which might be bridged by diagonal boards. There are, however, two objections to their use which I hope before my next report appears to be able to answer; firstly, it may be possible that the iron pins used to fasten the board on to the weir may sometimes be liable to tear up the stones; in such cases Mr. George's plan (see Severn report) of building the board into the weir and making a groove by its side, or of supporting the board by wooden struts fixed to the bank, may be adopted. The second fault is, that there sometimes is too great a rush of water at the bottom of the diagonal, and at the same time there is too little water at the top of the diagonal just where the fish requires it most.

These are, however, points for which I trust I shall eventually be able to find a remedy. The cheapness of the construction of diagonal boards is a great point in their favour.

In all cases, both of upright and slanting weirs, the fact of the millers shutting down their hatches at night and on Sundays will materially assist the fish, and for this reason a question to this effect has been placed in our official circular to boards of conservators.

I am not at all sure but that the diagonal system may be applied even to weirs themselves. If a weir be constructed diagonally across a stream, one end of it would form an angle with the river bank; the interspace which forms this angle between the river bank and the weir itself might for some distance down be subdivided into pools which could be made available for facilitating the ascent of the fish.

ALTERATIONS TO OLD LADDERS.

It cannot be denied that many ladders put up on the Forsyth plan are at the present moment perfectly useless; still, as they have cost a great deal of money, and are generally well built and stand firmly in the places where they were originally fixed, I think it exceedingly likely that with our improved knowledge and experience of the working of salmon ladders, we shall be able to alter them so as to make them somewhat, if not altogether, effective. Thus to some, as the ladder on the Axminster weir, the Tadcaster weir, and Linton weir, &c., I think that a secondary ladder upon the Ballysodare plan may be efficaciously applied; nearly (I may say all) the old ladders require flood guards, and a re-arrangement of the stops in most of them is exceedingly desirable.

THE STOPS OR BREAKS OF LADDERS.

Upon the arrangement of the stops in a ladder much of its efficacy will depend. In the Forsyth ladder the breaks are placed alternately, an interspace between the end of the break and the wall of the ladder being allowed to remain.

The effect of this is, that the rush of water takes a serpentine course; it is nowhere tranquil; there is no rest for the fish; and the water owing to the slope of the ladder is shallow just at the point where it ought to be deep, and deep where it ought to be shallow.

In my idea it is contrary to the nature of a salmon to run an in and out course, it would much rather leap an obstruction. From the many models and experiments I have made with ladders, and from the observation of their working out of doors, I have no hesitation in stating that the stops in a ladder should traverse the whole breadth of the ladder from side to side, and that there should be no alternate openings at the ends. The result of the stops going across the whole breadth of the ladder is that a series of pools are formed, and the fish is enabled—if the water is not too violent—to go up in a series of jumps, much as a chicken ascends to its roost by a series of perches.

This arrangement, moreover, resembles the natural arrangement of rocks in tributaries of salmon rivers, up which fish pass with ease.

The stops of the ladder should not only be fixed right across from wall to wall, but they should, in my opinion, be slanted upwards. The amount of slant will depend upon the locality, but the effect of this slant will be—first, that a pool is formed underneath each stop of the ladder, from which the fish may make a spring. Second, that the violence of the descending water will in some measure be expended in the triangular space underneath each stop. Third, that the total ascents will be divided into a series of small weirs, and when in a confined space it is easier for a fish to slip up over a small ascent than to jump over a perpendicular height.

The nose of a salmon is an exceedingly sensitive portion of its frame. Across the lower third of Trews weir at Exeter runs a slip of wood about two inches in height. The slip of wood is stretched right across the upward run of the salmon when he charges the weir. Arriving at the slip of wood the fish hits its nose, and at once discouraged, if not hurt, relaxes his muscular exertion and is carried back by the current.

I should therefore advise that all obstructions placed in a current of water, in order to form pools, should be made slanting and weir shaped, the gradient of the slope being of course as slight as possible.

I think that in some cases it may be advisable to cut a small notch out of the top of these small slanting weirs, as this plan would again lessen the height of each weir; the notch need not be more than one foot square. These notches should be placed at alternate corners of the steps of the ladder or pass, or it may be advisable to "dish" the upper surface of the weirs towards the centre, forming a crescent shaped passage for the water.

If a pair of "library steps" be placed on the floor and the position of the steps be observed, a good idea may be obtained of what I mean of a ladder fitted with slanting weirs between its walls.

THE POSITION OF LADDERS ON WEIRS.

This is an important consideration. I have hitherto held that the best place for a pass is in the middle of a weir, inasmuch as poachers cannot then get at the fish without danger to themselves; but Mr. Mostyn Owen informs me that in his opinion ladders and passes should, if possible, be placed at the sides of weirs, for the reason that if they are in the middle of the river, trees, boughs, weeds, &c., are apt to come down in floods, and these often block up the ladder, particularly the upper outlet; the consequence is that the pass or ladder becomes practically useless, as the fish cannot obtain a passage through it. It is often impossible during a flood or freshet, on account of the rush of the water, to get to the ladder to clear away the obstruction, whereas if the ladder is by the side of the weir it can be generally removed with facility. The quantity of large trees which come down some rivers during a flood is astonishing—and if one of these large trees were to get jammed fast in the fish pass it would probably tear it all to pieces.

FLOOD GUARDS.

It is almost impossible to get a ladder that will act equally well in all states of the water; that which acts in a moderate spate will be "drowned" in a flood, and the water will rush through it with such velocity that no fish can possibly face it. The construction of flood guards is therefore very important; the idea was first started by Mr. Alexander Miller, of Chepstow. His original model, No. 11, can be seen at my museum. The action of flood guards is self-acting, and by them the great rush of water is in flood time prevented. I have no hesitation in saying that if a flood guard could have been placed at the head of the Forsyth ladder, in the centre of Diglis weir, this combined with the other alterations which were made in the stops would have made it efficient. The Severn Navigation Commissioners and their engineer, Mr. Williams, objected to placing this flood guard, inasmuch as it would project above the level of the sill of the weir, and interfere with navigation. This difficulty has, I am glad to say, been overcome by the ingenious proposal to board over a certain length of the upper part of the ladder; thus he is enabled to place the flood guard between the sides of the ladder, and below the crest of the weir; see model No. 13. I trust that this plan, which I understand will be put into practice next summer, will prove efficacious. A modified form of flood guard has been brought forward by Mr. John Tate. It consists of the upper portion of the ladder being made moveable, and capable of being adapted to all states of the water. In the model of this in the museum, No. 9, its action can be examined. It is not yet perfect, because it requires human intelligence to regulate it. It should be self-adjusting to the rise and fall of the river to be perfect. Mr. Tate is now working out designs to ascertain what is the best form of self-acting movement. The subject of flood guards is quite in its infancy, and it will require a great amount of attention before we get the details perfectly correct. With a fish pass at the side of a weir instead of the centre, a flood guard is easier managed. Mr. M. Owen has a simple flood guard at the Erbistock fish pass, merely a heavy piece of timber fixed firmly over the top outlet; this only acts when there is too much water, by not permitting its entrance to the fish pass, model No. 14.

GENERAL REMARKS.

I have made the above somewhat lengthy remarks on weirs, ladders, and passes because the subject is of the greatest importance, and I now conclude by laying down a few general rules—

1st. There is hardly any weir in the kingdom which cannot be improved for the passage of fish.

2nd. If the weir is impassable, see if the byewash cannot be utilized.

3rd. The same form of pass or ladder is not applicable to all weirs.

4th. The more gentle the gradient of the ladder the better; the ladder may be reversed to get less gradient.

5th. The wider and deeper the ladder or pass the better.

6th. The rougher the ladder the better, and the less suspicious the fish.

7th. The foot of the ladder should be in the place where the fish naturally congregate.

8th. The foot of the ladder should be as near as possible to the natural predominant current; the water running down the ladder should if possible be made to be the predominant current.

9th. The head of the ladder should have a flood guard affixed to regulate the force of the descending water.

10th. The pool system in most cases is superior to the Forsyth system.

11th. Solid water is always preferable to frothy water.

In order to give a general view of the present state of the salmon ladders and passes throughout England and Wales, a table will be found in the Appendix; from this will be seen the localities and numbers of ladders in different rivers throughout the country. My colleague and myself have placed our observations conjointly in one table, and no ladder or pass is mentioned which has not been examined by one or the other of us. It is only by the collection of data of this kind that general principles can be arrived at and conservators guided in their choice of plans for future ladders or passes. One thing I think will be evident from our table, namely, that the pool system is in practice superior to the Forsyth ladder system, at least as we have found it at work in this country.

Finally, in concluding my remarks on the subject of weirs and ladders, I make bold to state that I regret exceedingly that our English engineers have paid no attention whatever to this most important subject. I do not myself profess to be an engineer, all I can do is to tell members of this profession what, in my opinion, the salmon can do, and what they cannot do, in the way of surmounting obstructions, and I sincerely trust that the attention of some of our eminent authorities in engineering may speedily be devoted to this most important national subject.

Failing compulsory powers to cause ladders to be built over all weirs in the kingdom upon true principles, I consider it my duty as Inspector not to remain in idleness till these powers and these principles are granted and ascertained, but to urge the members of the various boards of conservators not to despair, but to use their utmost ingenuity in utilizing the resources which they have at their command, or which they think have a chance of being made available.

My experience with the manufacturers and millowners in England and Wales is, that as a body they are by no means opposed to the cultivation of the salmon; nevertheless, as is natural, they consider the various industries which they pursue ought to take precedence of fishing questions.

I trust it may shortly be determined by Parliament that in order to increase the supply as "food for the people," it shall be made law that every weir in every salmon river shall be made passable to fish at all times.

In the meanwhile every effort should be made to accommodate the interests of a "food-requiring public" with that of the great manufacturing and corn-grinding machinery, upon which so much of our national wealth depends.

GRATINGS TO MILL LEATS.

In considering the numerous causes of the scarcity of salmon, we must not forget to examine the conditions under which the young stock of smolts undertake their downward journey to the sea. One of their dangers in the river arises at this time from kelts which still remain in the river, and especially from "well mended kelts" that lurk in the deep holes. Jack and other predaceous fish also devour them, and pollutions from mines and manufactories are of course destructive.

Of all destructive causes to descending smolts, none are more worthy of careful consideration than mill leats, which in fact, act as a series of traps always set.

It is a lamentable thought that after much money has been expended in making ladders to pass the parent fish over weirs, and many hours of watching have been devoted at considerable cost to the protection of the parent fish while making their nests, that the young fry (to preserve which so much pains have been taken) should be swallowed wholesale by the gaping mouths of mill leats. Warned by the natural instinct that their time of migration has arrived, the young smolts begin gradually to drop down stream; and if there be no water running over the weirs which obstruct their course, they will, if it is possible, go where the water leads them, that is into the mill leat, and at the end of this is the wheel which destroys many of them.*

The most marked case of this I carefully watched at the opening of the Shropshire Union Canal at Llantysilio, on the Dee. The young fish, hatched in thousands on the extensive spawning of the main river and its numerous tributaries, some of them above Bala Lake,† in obedience to their instincts, just at that time were coming down (tail

* I think an undershot-wheel is more destructive than an overshot-wheel, as in the latter case the fish have a better chance of escaping the blow of the paddle, but a "bucket-wheel" is the best of all, as the fish get into the buckets and are turned out below all unscathed.

† Mr. Owen writes me as follows:—"There is no doubt that many salmon spawned this winter in Bala Lake. Hughes and another water bailiff saw the fish at work and counted eighteen beds in one part of the lake shore. In one place Hughes saw a lot of swans busy at work and pelted them off with stones, and as soon as the swans went away the salmon returned to the beds; so there can be no doubt of the salmon having spawned in the lake on the parts where the shores are gravelly. The lake is to them, I should think, no more than an enlarged pool in the river, for it (the lake) is four and a half miles long by about one mile broad and has a constant stream through it, and the shores in parts are gravelly—moving gravel, such as you see on the shores of a big pool in the river."

foremost) in numerous and distinct shoals; arriving at the edge of the canal weir they coasted along in hopes of finding a passage, but as there was no water flowing over that was impossible; they were drawn by the strong current down towards and eventually into the canal.

My visit was especially directed to the examination of this grating; watching the smolts, I observed that several of them were drawn through by the current and disappeared in the canal leat below. Mr. Mostyn Owen, Secretary of the Dee Board, who was with me, informed me that the greater part of these smolts would be utterly lost, and could never possibly return as salmon, for they would be carried away into a system of canals, where they would perish, but that many of those which were fortunate enough to take that branch of the canal, which turns (a few miles further on) towards Montgomeryshire, would ultimately get into the Virniew, and thence into the Severn by means of an overflow from the canal which falls into the Verneiw, and thus they would reach the sea, but of course never return to their parent river. Since my visit this grating has been repaired, and I trust that the smolts will thus in future be preserved to the Dee. It is hard on the salmon fry of this river that at times (as it happened when I visited it) all the stream should be diverted into the canal, and they should thus be cut off from their legitimate free run to the sea. The supply of salmon in any river depends not on what number of salmon fry are bred in it, but on what are allowed to get to sea to grow into salmon and return.

The Usk also, as has been publicly pointed out by Mr. Lloyd, is terribly injured by the water being taken from it at Brecon. I trust this state of things will not be allowed to continue.

By the 13th section of the Act of 1861 it is compulsory to put gratings at the leats of channels made to (A) supply towns with water, or (B) navigable canals. Under these circumstances only does the law enforce gratings. I should be glad that it were made compulsory, or that boards of conservators should have power, to place at their own expense gratings on all artificial channels, whether leading to mills, manufactories, or to channels used for irrigation purposes. These gratings, placed at the upper entrance of the leat, should be put down on the 1st of January, and taken up on the 1st June, as water after that period begins to become somewhat slack in the river, and the millers would object to the obstruction; at this time of year there are no smolts or kelts going down the river.

In the Scotch Act there is an admirable byelaw bearing on this point. It reads as follows:—

"At the intake of every lade there shall be placed and constantly kept a heck or grating for each opening, or one embracing the whole openings, the bars not to be more than three inches* apart if horizontal, and not more than two inches if vertical.

"A similar heck or grating shall be placed and constantly kept across the lade or troughs immediately above the entrance to each mill wheel.

"A similar heck or grating shall be placed and constantly kept across the lower end of each tail-lade at its entrance into the main river.

"Note.—To prevent any obstruction to the flow of the water by the hecks or gratings in the lades, it is recommended that the lade should be increased in width where the hecks are placed, and that the heck, instead of being in a straight line across, should be curved or pointed up or down stream, and thereby increased in length, so that the aggregate of the openings between the bars shall exceed the sectional area (or waterway) of the lade, and thus compensate for the space occupied by the bars."

It is somewhat difficult thoroughly to comprehend the details of this. I have, therefore, made a model, No. 1., which I have placed in my museum, that the public may understand how these clauses would work, and how very beneficial they would prove to the fish, provided the gratings were made smaller. Good as are the provisions of the byelaw, yet I fear it is practically useless, as there is no power given to any constituted authorities to see that it is actually carried out. Should the "conservators' hatch" be fixed as recommended at a previous page, to facilitate the ascent of the fish, it might likewise be utilized for the purpose of passing the smolts down.

My observations on various gratings now at work lead me to advise as follows:—

1st. That the grating should be fixed at the upper end of a leat, not directly in front and parallel to the supply hatches, as is often the case, but diagonally across the stream; one end of it should touch (or come as near as possible to) the end of the weir, and start in a line from this point. The reason for this arrangement is that a current would be caused to flow along the side of the grating, directly on to, and then over the sill of the weir, and thus the fish would be carried over and escape the danger. The longer the grating the less will it diminish the supply of water into the leat, the space taken up by the bars being compensated for by the extra length.

* These measurements, in my opinion, are much too large to be of use in stopping smolts, although they would preserve kelts from destruction.

2nd. The gratings should in all cases be if possible made of iron. Wooden gratings act very well as long as they are new and remain under water, but when the water is low in the summer the wet wood is exceedingly apt to warp, the bars recede one from the other, and large gaps are formed through which many fish are drawn in.

3rd. The gratings should be as near each other as possible. Mr. Owen and myself experimented with a dead smolt at the Union canal weir at half an inch, and we found that to keep smolts out the opening should be not more than half an inch. An average smolt passed through wet blotting paper makes a hole of about three quarters of an inch in diameter, but if he turns on his side he can get through a smaller space, and if only one little fish succeeds in getting through all the others will try all they can to follow, like sheep following a leader. I would rather see the openings in the gratings half an inch apart.

4th. The gratings should be placed in a "perpendicular direction," they should be made broad and to overlap one another considerably, they should be so fixed in their places that a descending smolt would be carried by the current along the outside of the gratings and over the weir (see antea), and that it would be difficult for the fish to get through, without as it were turning a corner.

5th. The grating should be kept clear from leaves. In order to assist this operation, a long log of wood with sticks nailed at right angles should be anchored at some little distance above the grating. This log should be placed at such an angle as to divert the leaves over the weir, and not allow them to block the grating.

6th. Hearing that in the Norwegian fisheries whitened boards were placed by the sides of the rivers to stop the fish for poaching purposes, I have recommended that the gratings, the hatches, posts, &c. about a grating should be painted white. In 58th George III. c. 43. s. 20., a penalty is imposed on persons placing any white substance on the banks of a river with the object of preventing the smolts from descending its course.

Mr. Lloyd, who pointed out this clause to me, informs me that he has tried the experiment, and that the smolts, according to his experience, are not deterred by the whitened colour; still, as he suggests, the plan might be adopted to the lower entrances of mill leats. The bars at this point being painted white.

The whitened skull of a horse or ox or a bunch of white feathers have, I understand, been used to deter salmon passing through a legal free gap. I see no reason why this plan should not at all events be tried at the lower ends of mill leats.

7th. In cases where there is a difficulty in placing gratings, I would appeal to the millers to be good enough when they see the smolts going down the river to fix a wattled hurdle or galvanized iron netting across their mill leats, so as to drive the smolts over the weir. Should there be a small current of water running over the weir, a board might be temporarily affixed in a diagonal direction on the weir sill, so as to deepen the water, cause a predominant current, and carry the young fish over.

Not only do mill leats act injuriously to descending smolts, but they also inflict injuries upon the descending parent fish the kelts. I have examined several kelts killed by millwheels, especially a large specimen weighing 25lbs. from Galway, and another from the Usk. Casts of these are in my museum—they have all been destroyed by the backbone being completely fractured across by the pressure of the paddle of the wheel. I have also examined and cast fish (especially a female full of spawn from the river Camel) which have been knocked on the head from trying to pass the wheel from below upwards.

The grating placed at the upper end of the leat to keep the smolts away from the wheel, would keep the kelts also from danger. But beside this there should be a grating made of iron bars at the exit of the mill leat into the river. Millers as a rule object to this as it heads the water back on to the wheel; but this difficulty might be met by widening the mill leat at the part where the grating is fixed. This lower grating should be put down on the 1st of June and removed on the 1st of December. A model of a revolving grating, exhibited by the "Fisheries Preservation Society," is at the museum. I much approve of this plan. It consists simply of iron bars run through a central axis, and allowed to revolve with the stream.

LEGISLATION.

There can be no doubt the feeling throughout the country is very greatly in favour of new legislation. I have therefore made it my duty to tabulate the suggestions as sent in by the various boards of conservators, not only to gain the general sense of the public, but also for the convenience of future reference. I have arranged the suggestions in the order of the clauses as they occur in the Salmon Acts of 1861 and 1865, and I have ventured to append my own remarks thereto.

CLAUSE 4, ACT 1861, and SECT. 64, ACT 65.

Suggested by	TROUT, &c.
The Ribble	That the common or brown trout should be protected, but that it shall not be necessary to take a licence to fish for this fish.
Clwyd and Elwy	That trout should be protected.
Fowey	That the time for trout fishing should be regulate.
Tamar and Plym	That provision should be made against the wholesale destruction of trout by netting.
Ccquet	That powers should be given to destroy bull trout.
Usk	That the possession of trout during fence months should be punishable.

The wishes of those who desire to put common trout (Salmo Fario) under the Salmon Fisheries Act, may be met by the insertion of words somewhat as follows—the word "salmon," as defined in 1861–5, shall include non-migratory trout. I and my colleague both think that char (Salmo Alpinus) should certainly be included in the Salmon Act, and we hope this will be done. The gentlemen and board of conservators of the Kent district are anxious that these fish should be protected by the law.

CLAUSE 5, ACT 1861.

Suggested by	POLLUTIONS.
Ribble	That the maximum penalty for pollutions should be 100*l.*, and the minimum 5*l.*
Wye	That stringent measures should be granted to prevent pollutions.
Fowey	That proprietors of mines should be bound under heavy penalties to take definite measures to prevent the pollution of rivers, and that poisonous or injurious matter "should be held to "include anything that destroys the food of smolts or spawning beds," as well as that which "causes the water to poison "or kill the fish."
Tamar and Plym	That more stringent measures should be taken to prevent pollutions.
Avon (Devon)	Do. do. do.
Exe	Do. do. do.
Usk	Penalties should be fixed for throwing any matter into the river calculated to injure the spawning beds or poison the fish.
Teign	Mine owners should be compelled to purify any liquid they may pour into rivers, without limit as to costs.
Wharfe and Derwent	That the Special Commissioners should have power to investigate the right of persons to throw refuse into a salmon river.

My remarks on pollutions can be found in another part of this report. At the same time I would venture to suggest that the words in the Act "cause the water to poison or "kill the fish," should be erased, and the following substituted, "be injurious to fish or "injuriously affect the spawn or spawning beds." All new mines should be obliged to take precautions. See report on the Tavy. The Duke of Northumberland also compels this course.

SECTION 8, ACT OF 1861.

Suggested by	ILLEGAL INSTRUMENTS.
Avon (Devon)	That a spear and gaff in possession of any persons on or near a salmon river should render them liable to a fine.
Dart	That gaff should be illegal after fish off line.

I am of opinion that if the angling be extended in any river beyond the present time allowed by law, the gaff in the time so extended should be totally prohibited. A landing net should be used instead. All female fish caught during an extended close season should be returned to the river. See my report of 1867 on the Conway.

Section 8 of the Act of 1861 applies also to fishing with lights. Provisions similar to those in the 29th section of the Scotch Act might be introduced, giving authority to arrest "brevi manu" offenders against certain provisions of the Act, especially night poaching. Great destruction of salmon in the act of spawning arises from the absence of the power to arrest on the spot. Capture of salmon with hands or killing them with should be made illegal.

CLAUSE 10, ACT 1861.

Suggested by	NETS.
Kent - -	That a minimum size of mesh for trout and char should be fixed.
Ribble - -	That nets should be liable to be seized during yearly close time under same restrictions as apply to weekly close time.
Do. - -	That no net should be used after July 15th of less mesh than 3 inches from knot to knot.
Do. - -	That placing two or more nets behind each other should be illegal.
Towy - -	That from 15th June to 15th August a mesh of 1½ inches from knot to knot should be legal.
Wye - -	That the size of mesh for trout, &c. should be defined.
Dart - -	That no nets should be used during weekly close time.
Wharfe and Derwent	That all nets should be registered and pay duty, and not be used during weekly close time.

As regards the above points, I think it has been found in practice that one kind of net is not adapted to all rivers equally, and that long experience has taught the local fishermen on each river what kind of net is best suited to their requirements. I therefore think that the Board of Conservators should have power to make byelaws as to the kind and description of nets which it may be lawful to use in their district. Provision should also be made as to the number and distances between nets actually at work. But these regulations should not come into force without the approval of the Home Secretary. Trammels in no case should be allowed in the estuaries of rivers.

Labels or marks should be attached to licensed nets, and twait nets should be made to take out a licence and be put in the schedule. Having a licence, the owner of twait nets should be allowed to keep any salmon captured.

By the new French law of 1868 "the mesh for salmon is 40 millimetres (1·575 inches) " at least. For large fish other than salmon, and for cray fish, 27 millimetres (just above " an inch) at least. For small fish, such as gudgeon, roach, minnows, bleak, and others, " 10 millimetres (nearly two-fifths of an inch). The measure of meshes shall be taken " with an allowance of one-tenth. Fixed or floating nets shall not exceed in length two- " thirds of the width of the actual water surface of the stream in which they are worked. " Several nets may not be employed at the same time on the same bank, or on two opposite " banks, except at the distance of three times their extreme length. Fixed fishing nets " shall be lifted by the middle during 36 hours each week, from Saturday at 6 p.m. to " Monday at 6 a.m., across a space equivalent to one-tenth of their extreme length, and " in such manner as to leave between the bottom and the foot rope a free space of at " least 50 centimetres in height."

CLAUSE 11, 1861, and CLAUSE 39, ACT 1865.

Suggested by	FIXED ENGINES.
Ribble - - -	That a drag net held stationary by hand should be a fixed engine under the Act.
Avon (Devon) - -	That no fixed engine should be used within two miles of a river's mouth.
Wharfe and Derwent	That the Special Commissioners should have powers to investigate the titles of all fixed engines, dams, or weirs that in any way obstruct the passage of fish.

Many people regard weirs as fixed engines; the words "or facilitating the catching," might be introduced after the words "catching salmon" in the present Act.

12 SECT., ACT 1865.

Suggested by	DAMS.
Ribble - - -	That it should be illegal to fish, except with rod and line, between where the water is diverted for milling purposes and where it is returned to its natural course.
Lune - - -	That it should not be lawful to use a net within 100 yards of any dam, whether with or without a pass.
Dee - - -	Do. do. do.
Wye - - -	Do. do. do.
Frome - - -	Do. do. do.
Wharfe and Derwent	Do. do. do.

I quite agree with the above suggestions, and think that all new dams in a salmon river shall have a free gap as required in fishing weirs. This regulation might apply also to weirs that are raised, and I would venture to refer the reader to the provisions in some of the American Fisheries Acts, as given in Mr. Ashworth's valuable pamphlet on Salmon Fisheries, published by W. Lewis, Directory Office, Bath, 1868.

Suggested by	EEL RACKS, &c.
Frome - -	That eel racks should be removed by law at a fixed time of the year.

I agree with this. Broadly speaking, the salmon are going down in the first six months of the year Eels are going down in the second six months. Eel racks should be removed from the 1st of January to the 1st of July.

CLAUSE 13, ACT 1861.

Suggested by	GRATINGS.
Lune - - -	That millers should be compelled to fix gratings at mill races.
Ribble - - -	That gratings should be compulsory wherever water is taken down a goit.
Wye - - -	That gratings should be fixed to all mill sluices and artificial watercourses.
Taw and Torridge -	That gratings should be placed at all watercourses and mill races.
Tamar and Plym -	Do. do. do.
Dart - - -	Do. do. do.
Frome - - -	That gratings should be placed before all mill wheels.
Usk - - -	Mill owners should be compelled to maintain gratings at mill weirs.
Wharfe and Derwent	That gratings should be attached to the head and tail races of all mill leats.

For my observations on the above points, see special chapter on "gratings to mill leats."

I quite think that gratings should be placed at the intakes or heads of all mill leats throughout the country. But in cases, other than leats going to waterworks or the openings of canals, these gratings might be removed (with the sanction of the Board of Conservators and the approval of the Home Office) during the summer months when the water supply to the mill is short; but they should be in their places at the time that the kelts and smolts are going down the river.

Canals and waterworks should have the gratings down all the year round. I also quite agree with the following suggestion:—

Suggested by	CANALS.
Usk - - -	Canal companies should be restrained from drying up rivers.

The fisheries of the Usk suffer very much from the undue abstraction of water from the river by the canal. The Dee comes under the same category.

SECTION 14, ACT 1861.

Suggested by	UNCLEAN AND UNSEASONABLE FISH.
Usk - - -	That all young of salmon and unseasonable salmon found in any person's possession should be deemed wilfully taken.
Taw and Torridge -	That there should be an accurate definition of the words "unclean" and "unseasonable."
Wharfe and Derwent	That all fish caught during fence time should be deemed "unseasonable," and all kelts "unclean."

I have attempted to give an explanation of the terms unclean and unseasonable in my remarks on "Unclean and Unseasonable" fish. The suggestion of the Wharfe and Derwent boards might be adopted. Mr. George, of the Worcester board, is of this opinion.

SECTION 16, ACT 1861.

ARTIFICIAL BREEDING.

Suggested by
The Tees - -	That boards should have power to establish and maintain artificial breeding ponds.
	In cases like the Tees, where the fish cannot well get over Dinsdale dam, and where the young fry are liable to destruction from lead mine washings, &c., artificial breeding would be of great service. But generally speaking a river will be more benefited by natural spawning grounds being opened up than by breeding by the artificial plan. This is my idea after many years' practical experience with artificial breeding.

SECTIONS 17 and 18, ACT 1861.

CLOSE TIME.

Suggested by
Kent - -	That close time for trout and char should commence a month earlier.
Lune - -	That the close time for baulks and nets should be extended.
Ribble - -	That the weekly close time should commence at 6 a.m. Saturday and end 6 p.m. Tuesday.
Dee - - -	That the weekly close time should commence on Saturday morning.
Do. - - -	That February shall be included in the annual close time.
Elwy and Clwyd -	That fishing with rod and line should be extended for one month.
Towy - -	That March should take the place of September as a close month for nets.
Wye - -	That the Home Office should be empowered to vary and extend weekly close time.
Taw and Torridge -	That the close time for West of England should be altered, and one month longer allowed for fishing.
Avon (Devon) -	That close time should commence the 1st of October.
Do. - -	That no one should be allowed to have fish for any purpose during close time.
Frome - -	That the weekly close time for net fishing should be extended.
Tees - -	That the weekly close time should embrace the whole of Saturday and Sunday, and the yearly close time commence on the 15th of February and end on the 15th of September.
Dovey - -	That one month should be added to close time in the spring and one month more be open in the autumn.
Wharfe and Derwent	That having salmon in possession during close time should be deemed an offence, without the necessity of proof that it is for sale.
Avon (Hants) -	That net fishing should close on the 1st of August.

My remarks on close time will be found in another portion of my report. The Home Secretary should have power to allow the sale of fish caught in an extended close time.

SECTION 19, ACT 1861.

SELLING FISH DURING CLOSE TIME.

It is not quite clear that this clause sufficiently restricts the sale of salted fish; poachers catch fish illegally in close time, salt them, and sell them in the close time. If they are not discovered in the fact of taking the fish, what is there in the law to hinder them from selling these fish? Some limitation is required. Section 34 gives power of search, but this is not enough to meet the case of salted fish. I have reason to believe that many fish are caught in the close time and immediately salted; the possessors thus escape the provisions of the Act. I have frequently seen salted and dried fish in the London shops which I am sure were kelts. These were probably taken under the circumstances above alluded to.

SECTIONS 23 and 25, ACT 1861.

Suggested by	PASSAGE OF FISH OVER WEIRS.
Lune - -	That the Special Commissioners should have power of control over ordinary mill dams.
Wye - -	That all mill dams should be made passable for fish.
Tees - -	Power should be given to boards to purchase, compulsorily if necessary, all dams, or other obstructions to fish.
Do. - - -	That the Special Commissioners should have increased power as to removal, &c. of dams.
Severn - -	That a free passage over all obstructions should be made for fish.
Wharfe and Derwent	That compulsory powers should be given to boards to enforce a free passage for fish over all dams.
Dart - -	That all owners of mills should be compelled to keep a clear opening for fish at their fenders.
Frome - -	That hatches at mills should be kept open for a certain time, either weekly or at night.
Wharfe and Derwent	That mill owners should be compelled to allow surplus water to run over or through any pass attached to their weirs, under a penalty.

In my remarks on salmon ladders and passes I have given my full ideas on this subject. As regards legislation, it appears to me that if the Special Commissioners had to inquire into the legality of all weirs and dams, the progress would be so slow, and the subsequent litigation so formidable, that but little would be actually done. In all new dams a free passage, either in the form of a gap or otherwise, should be left for fish; this free passage should be arranged according to the circumstances of the case.

Whereas the mill and river owners obtain gratuitously a large amount of power, derived from the water of the river, and at the same time by their weirs do injury to the fisheries, it may be thought right in legal quarters to place a small tax upon every weir, the proceeds to go to the funds of the boards of conservators, to be applied solely to fishery purposes, but more especially to the building of ladders or passes over weirs. I also am of opinion that there should be power to purchase weirs under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act.

SECTION 26, ACT 1861.

Answers to Question 7, Par. 4.	MILL-HATCHES.
Kent - - -	Millers have been instructed to shut down their hatches.
Lune - - -	Skerton weir, frequently worked night and day.
Ribble - - -	Hatches generally closed Sundays and at night.
Dee - - -	Difficult and expensive to insure compliance with sect. 26.
Clwyd and Elwy -	Not sufficiently attended to.
Seiont - - -	The bailiffs attend to this.
Cleddy - - -	The Slaughter at Haverfordwest is always open.
Towy - - -	Yes.
Usk - - -	No.
Severn - - -	In dry weather millers do not shut their hatches, but work at night and Sundays.
Avon - - -	Cannot say.
Taw and Torridge -	Cannot say.
Tamar and Plym -	Not as a rule, though water bailiffs do all in their power to get them to do so.
Dart - - -	No.
Exe - -	Millers cannot be relied on to do it.
Otter - - -	On Sundays, it is believed.
Stour (Canterbury) -	Never all the hatches shut.
Trent - - -	Doubtful.
Wharfe and Derwent -	Yes.
Coquet - - -	At Acklington and Felton hatches are shut at night and on Sundays.
Avon and Stour -	Sometimes.

From the above answers it will be seen that the fish have not the chances for ascent given them that might in many cases be afforded. Provision should be made to compel owners of dams to shut the hatches which take water down the leat, on Sundays, and at all times when the mill is not at work. My colleague and myself are very anxious to see this done throughout the country, and the difficulty might be met by the introduction of the following words: The 26th section of "The Salmon Fishery Act, 1861," shall be construed as if the words "where a fish pass is attached to any dam in pursuance of this Act," were omitted, and the words "any dam" were substituted for the words "the dam," and the words "if any or over the dam" were inserted after the words "the fish pass."

SECTION 37. ACT 1861.

SEA COAST.

Offences committed on the sea coast within the three-mile limit against the provisions of the Act should, I think, be punishable.

Some regulation should be made as regards placing islands within official districts. I am most strongly of opinion that the fishing for other fish, not salmon, in estuaries of rivers, and along the sea coast limits of the various districts, should be put under the regulation of the boards of conservators, subject to the Home Office. In many cases, 1st, the sea enemies of the salmon in the estuaries might thus be destroyed and kept under control; and, 2ndly, persons pretend to be fishing for flukes, shrimps, flat fish, &c. with small-meshed nets, but in reality they take salmon without a licence, and it is impossible to watch these men continuously; 3rdly, nets set (often fixed) for estuary fish should, if they interfere with the preservation of salmon, be put under restrictions. As regards the fishing for other fish not salmon in the upper waters being placed under the conservators, I have not yet made up my mind as to what should be done.

SECTION 38. ACT 1861.

DREDGING.

I think the Board of Conservators should have power to alter the bed of a river, rearrange large stones, deepen holes, drive in stakes, rearrange banks, alter the predominant current of streams, &c. &c., as long as their operations do not interfere with the stability of any weir, or the undue diversion of water which is utilized for the purpose of any local industry.

SECTION 39. ACT 1861.

REPEAL OF ACTS.

It may be possible that legal authorities may think fit to reinstate some of the provisions of the old Acts which were repealed by the Salmon Fishery Act of 1861. They are 33 in number. These I find date from the 13th year of Edward 1st, A.D. 1281, down to the 22nd year of Victoria, A.D. 1860, a period extending over 579 years. The circumstances and conditions of the country have during these long series of years undergone great changes, if not a complete alteration, and the relative conditions of interests are so different from what they were even 50 years back, (especially if we take into consideration the discovery of steam,) that I think it would be exceedingly difficult to apply their provisions to the present state of national industries and interests. Nevertheless there are some provisions in these Acts which I should gladly see put again into force, if this were possible.

The real fact is, that those who had the management of the passing of the Act of 1861 through the Houses of Parliament, were (as it appears to me) too hasty in advising the sweeping abolition of all these Acts, without abstracting from them and incorporating into the then new Act many more of the salutary provisions than they have done.

Nevertheless, I should like to see that the owners of weirs (which are one of the chief evils to salmon fisheries), keep pace with the advanced progress of the day; and I trust that steam power will gradually supersede water power, and that weirs becoming consequently useless may be no longer detrimental to the interests of the salmon fisheries.

SECTION 18. ACT 1865.

PROOF OF FORMATION OF BOARD.

I am of opinion that the certificate of the Home Office ought to be sufficient evidence that all legal requisitions relative to the formation of a fishery district have been complied with.

SECTIONS 19–20, ACT 1865.

Suggested by	BOARDS OF CONSERVATORS.
Taw and Torridge -	That the Board should have power to form sub-districts, with a view to the more equitable charge of licence duties on nets.
Wharfe and Derwent	That Boards should have power to merge two or more districts into one.
Do.	That all kinds of fishing for salmonidæ should be under the control of the Board of Conservators.
Trent - -	That further powers should be conferred on Boards by a new Act, repealing the old Acts and consolidating them into one.

There are difficulties on these points upon which space will not here allow me to enter at full length.

SECTION 27, ACT 1865.

POWERS OF BOARDS OF CONSERVATORS.

Suggested by	BYELAWS.
Lune - -	That Boards of Conservators should have power to make byelaws, subject to approval of Secretary of State.
Ribble - -	Do.	do.	do.
Fowey - -	Do.	do.	do.
Tees - -	Do.	do.	do.
Tyne - -	Do.	do.	do.
Coquet - -	Do.	do.	do.
Severn - -	Do.	do.	do.

My experience is (see my Report, passim), that the law of nets (for example) should be made more elastic than it is at present. Byelaws may be made applicable to many points. The Home Office, as representing the Government, should in all cases sanction these byelaws.

In the original Bill for the Act of 1861 the following clauses (with which I quite agree) were suggested, and I think they might now be put into force.

Clauses in Bill of 1861 :—

A. The Home Office shall have power, on the application of the Fishery Board of any district, by byelaws made in such manner as is herein-after mentioned, from time to time to do all or any of the following things :—

1. To make regulations as to the times and places and manner at which any trammel, trawl, or other net or nets, engine or engines, employed in any public waters may be used; with power to prohibit the same, either wholly or partially, if injurious to the public interests :
2. To shorten the time during which it is prohibited to take salmon or trout, either in respect of the whole of England or of particular waters :
3. To make regulations as to the description and form of nets to be used in fishing in rivers, and the size of the meshes thereof; with power, as respects trout fisheries, to diminish the size required for the meshes of nets :
4. To prohibit any practice tending to impede the taking of salmon or trout, or otherwise detrimental to the fisheries of salmon and trout.
5. To regulate any matters by this Act authorized to be regulated by a byelaw.
6. To repeal or alter any byelaw made in exercise of the above powers, and to make a new byelaw or byelaws in lieu thereof.

And there may be imposed by such byelaws such reasonable penalties against all persons offending against the same as the Home Office may think fit, not exceeding 5*l.* for each offence; but no byelaw shall be valid that is repugnant to the laws of England or to this Act.

B. Previously to making a byelaw that is to take effect in any district, one of the Inspectors of fisheries shall proceed to the district for the purpose of making inquiries as to the circumstances under which the application for such byelaw is made, and as to the propriety of making such byelaw.

C. Before commencing such inquiry the inspector shall give not less than seven days' notice of his intention to inquire, and of a time and place at which he will be prepared to hear all persons desirous of being heard before him upon the subject of such inquiry, by advertisement in some one or more of the public newspapers circulating in the district.

D. Upon completion of the inquiry the inspector shall report the result thereof to the Home Office, together with his opinion thereupon, and the Home Office, if satisfied therewith, shall direct such byelaw to be framed, but it shall not be of any validity until it has received the consent of Her Majesty in Council.

E. Every byelaw proposed to be made in pursuance of this Act shall, before it is submitted to Her Majesty in Council for her assent, be published in some newspaper circulating in the district in which it is to take effect, and in such other manner as the Home Office may direct.

F. Any person having cause to complain of any byelaw as published, may, within one month after the publication thereof, petition Her Majesty in Council, praying Her Majesty to withhold her approbation to the whole or any part thereof; and every such petition shall be referred by Her Majesty in Council for the consideration and advice of such five or more members of Her Majesty's Privy Council as Her Majesty may think fit; and such members may, if they think fit, admit any petitioner or petitioners to be heard by counsel in support of his or her petition, and Her Majesty may, upon the recommendation of the members to whom the same is referred, withhold her approbation from any such byelaw or any part thereof; but no such appeal shall be entertained unless fourteen days' notice of the intention to appeal has been served on the Fishery Board upon whose application the byelaw is made.

G. All byelaws made in pursuance of this Act shall be so framed as to allow the justices before whom any penalty imposed thereby may be sought to be recovered to order a part only of such penalty to be paid, if such justices think fit.

H. The Home Office shall forward copies of all byelaws made in pursuance of this Act, printed by the Queen's printers, to the clerk of the peace of every county, and to the clerks of the petty sessional divisions throughout England; and any copy certified by any clerk of the peace or clerk of a petty sessional division to be a true copy of a byelaw shall be sufficient evidence of such byelaw in all courts of justice.

SECTION 27, ACT 1865.

Suggested by		PROSECUTIONS.
Fowey	- -	That all prosecutions instituted by the county constabulary should be under the direction of the Board, who should receive any fines that may be imposed.
Tyne	- -	That power should be given to Boards to apprehend offenders detected in the act of breaking the law.

I am strongly in favour of police officers being employed as water bailiffs, to be paid by the Conservators; and I also agree with the following:—

		POLICE AND COAST GUARD.
Avon (Devon)	-	That the police and coast guard should be instructed to watch for poachers, &c.

		PENALTIES.
Ribble	- -	That minimum penalties should be fixed for all offences.

A very good plan, as poachers often get off with a fine of a shilling.

SECTION 30, ACT 1865.

POWER OF WATER BAILIFF FOR PROTECTION OF FISHERIES.

Suggested by
Wharfe and Derwent	- "That justices should be empowered to grant warrants to search "all suspected boats in salmon rivers or estuaries, as well as "premises; persons obstructing to be liable to a penalty."

I think that power should be also given to search pockets of persons suspected of an infringement of the Salmon Acts; but I fear there are legal difficulties about this.

Suggested by		BOATS.
Wharfe and Derwent	-	That all boats employed in salmon fishing should be numbered.

I quite agree with this. By a recent Act all boats engaged in Sea Fisheries are required to be numbered. If this be law, why should not boats engaged in salmon fisheries be also numbered? I have subjoined the clause from the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868:—

"Subject to any exemptions allowed by or in pursuance of any Order of Council made as herein-after mentioned, every British sea-fishing boat shall, as required by articles four, five, six, seven, and eight of the Convention, be lettered and numbered, and have official papers, and shall for that purpose be entered or registered in a register for sea-fishing boats."

SECTION 30, ACT 1865.

Suggested by	FISHING AT NIGHT.
Tamar and Plym	That fishing by night line should be illegal.

I have been in correspondence with the inspectors of French fisheries on this point. Art. vi. of their Act, 1868, reads thus: "Fishing is only permitted from sunrise to sunset." I am not desirous that at present fishing by night be prohibited in this country. It is a question that requires much consideration, and circumstances must vary according to locality.

SECTION 31, ACT 1865.

Suggested by	WATER BAILIFFS.
Kent	That water bailiffs should have power to go on land where they have good cause to suspect any offences against the Acts, without the authority of a justice of the peace.
Ribble	That water bailiffs should have power to go on all land without special leave.
Wye	That water bailiffs should have power to go on all lands, and to search all suspected persons.
Tamar and Plym	Do. do. do. do.
Avon (Devon)	Do. do. do. do.
Tees	That water bailiffs should have power to enter any land.
Dovey	That water bailiffs should have power to search persons.
Usk	Water bailiffs should have power to search persons and enter any land.

I quite agree with the above. It appears to me that it is better for law and order for water bailiffs, who are responsible persons to official boards of conservators, to be allowed to traverse lands in search of evil doers, rather than that poachers should go about unmolested, as is often the case under present arrangements; and I think that no landed proprietor who wishes to benefit the prospects of the salmon fisheries would have any objection to allow water bailiffs to traverse without special leave; nevertheless, to meet the difficulty, I would suggest that the words "twenty-four hours" in the 31st section be erased, and the words one month be substituted.

SECTION 34 ACT 1865.

Suggested by	LICENCES.
Kent	That a licence duty should be paid for every net.
Lune	That conservators should have power to fix a graduated scale of licences for nets.
Ribble	That power should be given to use a graduated scale of licences.
Do.	That the uncertainty as to whether a net licence attaches to the net, or the owner thereof, should be removed.
Do.	That the licence for haaf nets should attach to the user of the net, and not to the net itself.
Do.	The maximum charge for draught or hang net should be 25*l*.
Dee	That the Conservators should have power to raise licence duties.
Elwy and Clwyd	That no fishing in salmon rivers should be allowed without a licence.
Wye	That the evidence of the approval of licence duties by the Home Office should be defined.
Exe	That all persons having a salmon boat, or fishing with rod and line, fly or minnow, should take out a licence.

The second clause of the 34th section as it at present stands is almost incomprehensible; it should read as follows: "Such licences as aforesaid shall be available

" only for the use of the persons to whom they are granted, and within the districts " within which they are granted, and for the employment of such instrument or devices " as are named or described therein."

I also think that there should be power, as is at present illegally done in the Severn (where it seems to act well), to vary the price of licences to fish, in different parts of fishery districts. My colleague agrees with me in this point. I think in some cases that a greater charge than is allowed by the present scale of licences may be made payable upon nets that catch a very large proportion of the fish in a river.

SECTION 34, ACT 1865.

Suggested by	MEANS OF RAISING FUNDS.
Cleddy - - -	That further powers should be granted to raise funds for protection of district.
Towy - - -	Do. do. do. do.
Avon (Devon) -	That a small public grant should be made annually to enable the Board to carry out more fully the provisions of the Acts.
Tyne - - -	The funds should be raised by means of a rate on rights of fishing for salmon.
Coquet - - -	Do. do do. do.

Upon this point the deputation which attended at the Home Office laid the following statement before the Home Secretary: " It is also desirable that salmon conservators " should, if willing, have power to raise funds by means of a rate upon the rents or annual " value of salmon fisheries, as is the case in the Tweed. This principle was in operation " in the Tyne up to the time it was repealed by ' The Salmon Fishery Act, 1861,' and " is allowed to have worked well. It is merely extending the existing principle of granting " general licences to the owners of fisheries."

The following suggestions came too late to be inserted in their proper places:—

TEIFY AND AYRON.

Police, &c. - -	That police should have power to arrest offenders and seize nets, &c. illegally used without a magistrate's order.
Licences - - -	That it should be made clear whether the licence attaches to any instrument, or whether every person using it requires a licence.
Marking nets, &c. -	Nets and other instruments licensed should be marked so as to be identified.
Destructive instruments -	The " shot fawr," a destructive instrument, should be charged at a specially high rate, and each man working it have a personal licence.

UNCLEAN AND UNSEASONABLE FISH.

I find there is a great difficulty throughout the country in interpreting section 14 of the Act of 1861. I have, therefore, with a view of throwing some light on this question, adopted the only means which can possibly be conclusive, namely, the anatomical dissection and examination of the viscera of the salmon themselves. With this view I have examined during the fishing season of 1868 the viscera of upwards of 200 salmon.* My conclusions are as follows:—firstly, that the external colouring of the scales of a salmon is by no means invariably a safe guide to its condition; secondly, that the appearances of the pyloric appendages are most valuable in the diagnosis; and, thirdly, that the actual state of the development of the ova or milt is a point to which the strictest attention should be paid.

In order fully to explain what follows, I must premise by the statement that a salmon is more a sea water (or rather estuary) fish than a fresh water or river fish. Although it occasionally, as we know, feeds in fresh water, yet the greatest part of its food is obtained in the sea.

* These salmon were mostly lent me by Messrs. Gilson and Quelch, fishmongers, 121, New Bond Street, to whom I am under the deepest obligation for unceasing acts of kindness in looking out for specimens. I have also examined fish lent by Mr. Thos. Grove, Charing Cross, and Messrs. Grove of Bond Street. The kelts, &c., were kindly sent me from various parts of the kingdom.

It will be perfectly impossible to understand aright the natural habits of the salmon unless we regard them from the proper point of view, viz., that the goings and comings of this migratory creature are independent of human interference, and that the creatures themselves obey only the divine laws which have been laid down for them from the beginning of time. In the whole history of the salmon we may discern a wonderful order and foresight on the part of the Creator. The parent fish run up the rivers when the floods are coming down. These floods enable them to reach the only places which are fit for the hatching out of their ova. Cold water is necessary for the development of the ova when deposited (the temperature should be from 44 to 48), and this low temperature occurs only in the winter months, and in these months therefore the fish deposit their eggs. The young fish come out of the egg with their food provided for them in their umbilical vesicle, to last them till they are grown large enough to catch their own food. In the spring of the year this food appears abundantly in the form of insect life. The parent fish, which have risked their own lives for the benefit of their young, drop back to the sea to recruit their exhausted strength,* and both they and the smolts arrive in the sea just about the very time that there is most food for them. The sea fish mostly spawn during the spring months, and from this source both the kelts and the smolts derive abundance of nutritious food. These provisions show an admirable "police of nature," by means of which various kinds of fish life are kept in check, while all are made to reach a high state of development.

The salmon, therefore, feeding in the sea gradually accumulates quantities of fat; it is necessary that this fat should be deposited in some reservoir in the creature's body, from whence it may be gradually absorbed during its sojourn in fresh water. A certain portion of the fat is, I find, deposited in the cellular tissue between the skin and the muscular system, but an admirable arrangement for the storing up of the main bulk of this winter food is found in the presence of the pyloric appendages;† these are long, worm-like, fleshy offshoots from the intestine, situated immediately below the true stomach. In the human being there is only one pyloric appendage; in the salmon there are 45 to 65. Although they may be subservient in secreting a fluid connected with digestion, yet there can be no doubt in my mind (and I venture to claim this as a discovery of my own) that they act as a convenient depository for fat, even if this be not their principal function. Analogous cases may be found in the hump of the camel, in bears, marmots, &c.

The process of developing the ova and milt is a great tax upon the system of the salmon; thus, in a Tweed fish (January 14th, 1869) just ready to spawn, the ova in weight amounted to a little over one-fifth of the entire weight of the fish itself; and in a Tay fish (December 11th, 1868) the weight of the eggs amounted to a little over one-quarter the weight of the entire fish. The oily matter in the eggs and the milt of a salmon is very great. I believe it, therefore, sound physiology to say that the use of the fat stored up in the pyloric appendages and under the skin is: first, to supply nutrition to the fish during its sojourn in fresh water; and, second, to afford materials for the development of the milt and ova.

Let us now apply these facts to the question before us, and attempt to obtain descriptions of a clean and an unclean salmon. A fresh or clean-run salmon is a fish whose scales are silvery bright, with generally an opal tint about them; the pyloric appendages are covered with fat; the milt or ova are in an undeveloped condition.

Good instances of fresh-run fish can be seen in large specimens from the Rhine in the months of November, December, and January,‡ in fish from the Tay, Severn, Dee, and Irish rivers in February and March, and in other rivers according to their seasons. There are often sea lice upon these fish, but not in all instances. Sea lice upon Rhine fish are rarely observed.

* In this state a large number of fish are annually found dead; having examined a large number of them, I can find no cause of death except an anæmic condition and a laxity of fibre of the muscular tissue. I conclude, therefore, that the natural cause of death is (except in cases of violence or wounds from fighting), simply exhaustion; most of these fish found dead are males. It is very possible that the law of nature is that the large males shall die in certain numbers, and thus leave room for the smaller males to keep up the breed. The females are found dead much more rarely than the males; these facts may also have some bearing on the interpretation of the male smolt having its milt fully developed, and capable, as I myself have proved by experiment, of fecundating the ova of adult fish. The female smolt has the ova developed in a very minute degree at the time that the male smolt contains ripe milt.

† Dr. Günther, of the British Museum, has pointed out that the number of these appendages is valuable in the classification of species of the salmonidæ as they differ in number—in S. Salar, S. Ferox, S. Trutta, S. Fario, S. Alpinus, &c. &c.

‡ Upon the pylorics of a 48-lb. Rhine fish I found no less than five ounces of fat.

An unclean salmon is a fish that has spawned or milted; an emaciated creature, whose scales are highly discoloured and often spotted with fungus and sores; the pylorics will be found to stand out one from another like the fingers of the human hand, and there will be hardly any trace of fat upon them. If a male, the milt will be found in the form of a long relaxed bag. If a female, the ovaries will be found in a lax flabby condition, and a few ova will often remain in the cavity of the abdomen, and instead of finding fat between the skin and the muscular tissue we shall observe only loose threads which formed the cells in which the fat was originally deposited.

There remains another form of salmon yet to be described, it is a Well Mended Kelt; this is a salmon which, having spawned, has not yet visited the sea to lay in its stores of fat, and has, therefore, not recovered its condition; the scales are silvery but have not the beautiful pearly opal tint about them; the general appearance of the fish is lanky and lean: if a female, the ovaries will be found much shrunk and generally with a few eggs remaining in them; if a male, the milt will be found not so relaxed as in a kelt, but still not so firm as in a fresh-run fish. The appearance of the pylorics will at once determine the history of the fish, for there will be little or no fat upon them. The fact of kelts being greedy for food shows that they wish to begin again to restore the exhausted fat to their systems. A well mended kelt is an unclean fish.

I will now attempt to tabulate the above remarks.

Clean.	Unclean.
	Kelts after Spawning.	Well Mended Kelts.	Before Spawning.
Scales.—Silvery and opalescent	Discoloured; and often with fungus or sores.	Bright, but not opalescent	Discoloured.*
Pylorics.—Covered with fat	No particle of fat. Stand out separate one from the other.	Very little fat	Fat nearly absorbed.
Ova.—Undeveloped condition	Ovaries much relaxed. Loose eggs often in abdomen.	Ovaries shrunk; a few eggs often remaining.	Much developed.
Milt.—Undeveloped condition	Relaxed bag	Relaxed, but firmer than in a kelt.	Much developed.

I have made many attempts to define an "unseasonable" fish, applying the test of the condition of the milt and ova, but I find it is so difficult that I shall defer the task to a future opportunity. The difficulty is the question of degree of the development of the ova or milt, i.e., at what exact point of the size of the ova or milt the word "unseasonable" should apply; I shall therefore simply describe a fish about to spawn.

A fish about to spawn is one whose scales are discoloured, whose cheek jowls often exhibit streaks of red, and whose milt or ova is considerably developed. If a female, the walls of the abdomen are abnormally distended; the fat has been almost entirely absorbed from the pyloric appendages. The flesh will be found, when cooked, to possess much less flavour than in a fresh-run fish, inasmuch as the fat has been absorbed and the flesh left pulpy instead of rich and flaky.†

I fear the above explanations will be difficult to understand from writing alone. I have, therefore, myself made a large series of casts and preparations of the ovaries and milts of salmon from various rivers at almost every month of the year. In many instances I have cast the pyloric appendages alongside the milt or ova to show how remarkably their appearances coincide with each other. These can be examined in my museum at the Horticultural Gardens.

The above descriptions of clean and unclean fish nevertheless can, I regret to say, hardly be made available by the water side, as the fish must be killed to examine the above points. They will, however, be useful in cases where the evidence brought before a magistrate, after a fish has been killed, is conflicting, and I shall be glad at all times to give my opinion on specimens sent to me. There can, I think, be no doubt but that the physiological conditions of the milt, ova, and pylorics render great help to give us a description of the various conditions in which salmonidæ are found, and which is here attempted for the first time.

* I must here remark that some female fish may carry very slightly discoloured scales, even though they may be on the point of depositing their ova.

† The discolouration or redness of the scales alone will not enable us to pronounce on the condition of a fish. In the month of August 1868 I was enabled to examine several fish in the Exeter market, and also at Chepstow, which were so highly discoloured that I at first thought they were kelts, but an examination of their milt and ova at once proved to me that they were not so, even in spite of their discolouration; the cause of the discolouration was probably their long sojourn among the sands in the estuaries, being debarred from ascending the rivers by the long drought.

After much thought and consideration I have come to the conclusion (and my colleague agrees with me) that the interests of the salmon fisheries would be best cared for if all fish caught in the annual close time should be considered "unseasonable," i.e., as caught out of the legal fishing season.

It may be also advisable that all fish caught in the open time shall be deemed to be "seasonable," provided always they are not unclean by reason of their being kelts or well mended kelts, or fish about to spawn. I have been in correspondence with Mr. Mostyn Owen, of the Dee, and he also agrees to the above points of doctrine

CLOSE TIME.

The main object of salmon legislation is to increase the productiveness of our rivers in order to give an increased supply of food for the people.

It follows, therefore, that whatever tends to the furtherance of this object should become a matter of grave consideration in the minds of those who have to watch the practical workings of the law.

The present law enacts, that in no river shall salmon be caught by the net after the end of August; the salmon therefore have given them for breeding purposes the five months of September, October, November, December, and January, and then the fishing begins again in February and lasts seven months. This law is made to apply equally to all rivers, little and big, those that run long courses and those that are of short length, those that have lakes at or near their origin, those whose tributaries are simply rivulets rising high up in the mountains, and those which have long reaches as spawning grounds.

If we examine the actual facts, and carefully read the testimony of conservators whose printed reports are subjoined, it will be seen that this open season will not in practice apply to all rivers alike.

There are rivers which the salmon never enter till the end of June, and during July, August and September, their number increasing during October and November; to these rivers the months of February, March (and sometimes April) are of no use whatever, because the waters contain not clean run "up fish," but only "down fish," that have lately spawned and are not fit for food. The fishermen on these rivers are therefore anxious to be allowed to prolong their netting season into September, and in some cases even further, and at the same time they are willing to give up February and March.

In order to avoid taking a shallow view of the important question of close times, we must, I think, not exaggerate the power which man has, or is supposed to have, over the migrations of these wild inhabitants of the waters. The times and seasons, and the coming and going of the salmon, of the deposition and the hatching out of its young, &c., are not left to the fortuitous efforts of nature, but are dependent on fixed laws and rules. As fixed rules guide the migration of quadrupeds, birds, and insects on land, so it may be fair to argue that similar laws guide the goings and comings of fish in the waters.

The history of pilchards, herrings, mackerel, &c., upon which space will not allow me to enter clearly shows that each has its period of migration.

The case of migratory birds is a fair point of analogy. I understand from my learned friend, John Gould, Esq., F.R.S., whose fame as an ornithologist is European, that birds are most regular in their migrations. In part 14 of "The Birds of Great Britain," Mr. Gould, when treating of migratory birds, has published the following words: "The "earliest to appear are the wheatear and chiff chaff, to which succeed the hirundines. "Next the pompous parasitic cuckoo and its fostering silvians sedge warblers, reed "wrens and others fall into their places. They are followed by the yellow wagtail, the "turtle, the corncrake, each arrival being in strict conformity with the laws of migration."

My argument is that as these birds arrive at their proper seasons so salmonidæ will ascend their own rivers, each arrival being in strict conformity with the laws of migration.

Again, in an admirable chapter on "the geographical and local distribution of animals,' the Rev. William Kirby in his Bridgewater treatise writes:—

"The salmon reaches Bohemia by the Elbe, Switzerland by the Rhine, and the "Cordilleras of America by the mighty Maragnon or River of Amazons, whose course "is more than 3,000 miles. They employ only three months in ascending to the sources "of the Maragnon, the current of which is remarkably rapid, which is at the rate of " nearly 40 miles a day. The salmon enters the rivers of France in the beginning of the " Autumn, in September, and in Kamtschatka and North America still later."

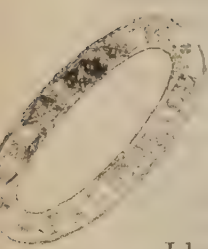
Besides the argument that each animal has its time of migration, I think as a physiologist, and having studied animals all my life, that it is exceedingly likely that the salmon has certain senses and faculties the counterparts of which do not exist in our own species; we men are warm-blooded mammalia, breathing air by means of lungs, and live on the land, whereas the salmon is a cold-blooded oviparous animal which lives in water. Taking a wide view of the question, and granting (as we must grant) that every animal, whether living in air or in water, has faculties given to it exactly adapted for its circumstances of life and well-being, I am inclined to attribute to the salmon a special cognizance of what is good and what is bad for it, senses in fact utterly unknown to us, and for which we have at present no better word than "instinct."

In examining, therefore, the most difficult question of early and late rivers from every point available to our senses, although we have but scanty grounds to go upon, it is as well to attempt to go as far as we can, and endeavour to ascertain what natural combination of circumstances brings about the facts which we know to exist, (for I do not think the phenomena can be ascribed to one cause alone,) the following points are worthy of consideration:



Firstly—The geological conformation of the country from which the river takes its origin, and through which it flows.
Secondly—The presence or absence of a lake in its course.
Thirdly—The seasons and floods.
Fourthly—The effects of temperature.
Fifthly—The condition of the ova and milt in the fish.
Sixthly—Artificial obstructions on, or pollutions poured into a river.

I have, therefore, no hesitation in bringing forward the idea which I a long time ago started, and which I frequently discussed with the late Mr. Ffennell, and which I am pleased to see is gradually beginning to be recognized, that the geological characteristics of a country have a very great influence upon the fishery products thereof. As "the great " phenomena of physical geography, the grand distributions of the solids and the fluids of " the globe; the disposition of the continents and islands above and amidst the waters; " the depth and extent of seas, and lakes, and rivers; the elevation of hills and mountains; " the extension of plains; and the excavation, depression, and fractures of valleys," have a vast influence upon mankind—their physical aspect, their commerce, and their industries; so I maintain that life as found in the waters is influenced to an extent which as yet has not been sufficiently recognized by the geological aspect of the country. The proof of this fact will be apparent if a map be made (as I have done) showing the origin of the different salmon rivers in England and Wales.

On the east side of England till we come to Yorkshire the country is flat, and there are no salmon; the mountains of Wales on the contrary give rise on the eastern slope to the Dee, Severn, Wye, and the Usk; from the southern slope (on the Carmarthenshire coast) flow the East and West Cleddy, the Towy, &c., and from the western side flow the Teivy, Dovey, and other streams, all naturally salmon rivers.

Much depends upon the inclination of a river. Thus, looking at rivers generally we can observe that those which rise from and traverse a flat country have but little incline; they therefore flow in a sluggish stream. In these we find a corresponding species of fish, such as jack, roach, perch, carp, &c. In instances where the rivers get, as it were, a little tilt at their origin, we shall immediately find that salmonidæ begin to appear in their waters; "salmo fario" is common in the upper streams, "salmo trutta" is found at the lower portions of the river, and "salmo salar" occasionally appears. Rivers which have their origin in mountains, and whose tributaries flow from a considerable elevation above the sea, are those which are most frequented by "salmo salar;" in fact a salmon may be called a mountain fish, in contradistinction to a jack, which is a lowland fish.*

I am unwilling here to prolong instances of these facts, or to take cognizance of the great system of the Yorkshire and other northern rivers, except to quote the words of a gentleman well acquainted with geology:—"It is worthy of notice that nearly every

* I state this as a general rule, though no doubt many rivers that have not a great tilt in their course may by cultivation be much improved as regards salmon. My colleague reminds me of the Thames. In former times the salmon spawned in the gravel reaches about Laleham and Staines. I trust they will do so again within the next three years. Mr. Ponder and myself, acting for the Thames Angling Preservation Society, have done our best to stock it with fry.

" salmon river in Great Britain and Ireland has its birth and career in one of the older " formations known as primary, such as the fundamental rocks, cambrian, lower and " upper silurian, old red sandstone, and carboniferous." The same subject is now being worked out, as regards the rivers of Ireland, by a friend of mine, a government officer on the geological survey.

Some of these rivers rising from mountains make long courses through the country, others make short courses. The Dee and the Severn take the lead as the early rivers. At the same time, there are many short rivers in Wales, and also in Devon and Cornwall, which take their origin from elevated ground. The inclination of the features of the country through which they run being abrupt, the rainfall will quickly escape in spates into the sea. These will, I fear, never be early rivers, for the simple reason that the salmon utilizes them only as a spawning ground.

Under the above circumstances, therefore, if a prohibition exists against salmon being killed in the tideway, they will not be killed at all, and thus will be lost as food to the public. I am fully aware that it may be argued that spawning fish unfit for food will thus be destroyed, inasmuch as the spawning time as a rule is in the winter months. This is certainly a delicate question, but it is argued that in these late rivers salmon keep up their condition further into the year than in earlier rivers. (See my report on the Fowey.)

The presence or absence of a lake has a great influence in causing an early ascent of salmon. The Tay is proverbially an early river, so early indeed that it is my belief that if it were tested with the nets it would be found not more than one month behind the Rhine; in fact, several anglers have expressed their desire to be allowed to fish with the rod in January, as fresh run fish are then in Loch Tay.

It is, therefore, the innate self-preserving faculty which prompts the salmon to leave the security of the sea and make a run for the lake, where it somehow knows that it will be safe till the spawning time arrives, when it can run up the tributaries of the lake.

We must now take the converse of these matters. A diagram should be made representing a funnel; A the sea, B a river, C a lake at the head of the river. This will give an idea of the general features of an early river, provided always temperature and other circumstances be favourable. The diagram being reversed, we see a river, arising as it were from nothing, gradually expanding itself into a lake. In this latter case the lake is not at the top of the river, but at the bottom of the river.

The same marvellous instinct which admonishes the salmon to run at an early period of the year into a lake at the head of a river, also admonishes it that the estuary of a river is in fact its lake, and in this lake the salmon will remain till its necessities of ova deposition compel it to run up into the fresh waters above.

Supposing a fish to commence its journey in rivers of this kind, (that is, where the estuary performs the part of a lake,) I may ask where is the fish to go? The higher he gets the more insecure his position becomes. At the same time I believe it possible that even in these little rivers there are clean run fish ready to ascend in February and March, but these clean run fish are not in the river, but in the sea and tidal water, where they cannot be caught. My able predecessor, William Ffennell, Esq., was evidently alive to this fact, for in an article in the " Fisherman's Magazine," May 1864, I find this paragraph :—" In small rivers without lakes or deep pools the fish will not ascend at all " until autumn approaches, having divined by a marvellous instinct that they would not " find water enough in the summer to shelter them." He further goes on to say that no such thing as a new clean run fish with the roe scarcely developed is to be found in December, January, and February, except in rivers connected with lakes or large rivers with deep pools. There are, however, exceptions to the above, which exceptions may, I think, be generally accounted for.

Seasons and Floods.—This is the third point to be considered as bearing upon the question of salmon ascending rivers. I here venture to quote the following outlines of the machinery of springs and rivers, as described in the Bridgewater Treatise by the late Very Rev. Dr. Buckland :—

" The great instrument of communication between the surface of the sea and that of the land is the atmosphere, by means of which a perpetual supply of fresh water is derived from an ocean of salt water, through the simple process of evaporation. By this process water is incessantly ascending in the state of vapour, and again descending in the form of dew and rain.

" Of the water thus supplied to the surface of the land a small portion only returns to the sea directly in seasons of floods through the channels of rivers.

" A second portion is reabsorbed into the atmosphere by evaporation.

" A third portion enters into the composition of animal and vegetable bodies.

" A fourth portion descends into the strata, and is accumulated in their interstices into subterraneous sheets and reservoirs of water, from which it is discharged gradually at the surface in the form of perennial springs that form the ordinary supply of rivers. The remainder is discharged by submarine springs.

" As soon as springs issue from the earth, their waters commence their return towards the sea; rills unite into streamlets, which by further accumulation form rivulets and rivers, and at length terminate in estuaries where they mix again with their parent ocean. Here they remain, bearing part in all its various functions, until they are again evaporated into the atmosphere, to pass and repass through the same cycles of perpetual circulation."

The salmon is the most important creature that represents animal life in this cycle of perpetual circulation. It naturally follows that it is materially affected in its migrations by the occasional supply to the rivers from rain, and by the perpetual supply from the fountains and springs, as above described by Dr. Buckland. To the salmon the floods are the most important links of the above chain of events. I think it will be acknowledged that the great majority of salmon which ascend a river come at the close of the year when the floods are coming down, the largest and heaviest fish being the last to leave the sea, and every one knows what great influence a spate has in the summer and autumn months in tempting the fish up a river.

The philosophy of this, I think, is that the parental instinct of the fish prompts it to take advantage of the floods, because it knows that by their assistance it will be able to reach the only place fit for the deposition of its ova, and suited for the future welfare of its young in the spring and summer months. To reach these places, therefore, it thinks no difficulty too great and no danger too formidable.

It is also probably aware that in floods it will be enabled quickly to traverse long distances, and surmount obstructions which under other circumstances would prove barriers to its progress.

In big rivers, according to the natural law of water supply, the current of water will generally be more equable than in little rivers. In cases of short rivers, rising as before observed from high altitudes, the salmon will not be tempted up by the summer floods which run off quickly, but it will remain in the sea till the abundant floods of reduced temperature inform it that it may take its journey in safety.

The fourth cause which influences the run of salmon is temperature.

I begin with the fact that the salmon is a cold-water fish. Its geographical limits are as distinctly marked out as those of the aqua-fauna, and flora of terrestrial zones of animal life. The salmon is found in the northern parts of Spain, which seems to be its southernmost limit; none are found in rivers emptying into the Mediterranean. Its southernmost boundary appears to be latitude 45; this applies equally to the European and American continents.

England, situated widely speaking between 50 and 60 northern latitude, is as it were in the very heart of the great zone of salmonoid life, and between 50 and 60 degrees on the western hemisphere we know that salmon are abundant. Granting then the main fact, that the salmon as a species of fish is very much under the influence of temperature, it is not an unfair deduction to suppose that in minor points temperature has a great effect upon its habits. During the past summer the rivers of England and Wales have, on account of the intense heat of the weather, been of a temperature abnormally high,—I take temperatures on every opportunity,—and it would have been contrary to the nature of the salmon to have left the sea to face water in the river at from 60° to 80°, a degree of heat consonant neither to its own comfort or the welfare of its ova, which, as Mr. Youl's Australian experiments prove, can be packed in ice for upwards of 90 days and then spring into life.

It must, however, be remarked per contra that water if too cold will not be faced by the fish. When snowbroth is running down a river the fish as a rule will not be running up; this is a fact which requires explanation, and I hope one day to be able to discover the key to this curious phenomenon. The electric state of the atmosphere and the presence of ozone may also have great influence upon the actions of the fish.

I should much desire that a regular system were established to take the temperatures of our salmon rivers with regularity. I am convinced some great truth would arise from well-recorded observations. Gentlemen residing on salmon rivers would much oblige my colleague and myself by instituting observations on this point.

The fifth point worthy of consideration is development of the ova and milt.

There can be no doubt but that the development of these organs have great influence in warning the fish that the season has arrived when they should ascend from the salt water to the shallow tributaries of the rivers; that the period when these organs develope themselves is different in different rivers I think I can show from the numerous casts and preparations in my museum. The conclusion I have come to is, that the more developed the ova and milt become, the more anxious the fish is to be quit of it, and the more strenuous efforts it makes to reach a repository where it will develope itself in safety.

The sixth point to be considered is the effect that weirs have upon the run of fish.

In the report of the special commissioners for Irish fisheries of 1867 there are some very valuable remarks on early and late rivers, which I shall not here repeat, as the report should be read in full by everyone interested in this most important question.

The main point of the argument, however, seems to be that the shyness of the spring salmon as compared with the late season salmon is the main key in the question of early and late rivers. This is a point well worthy of consideration, but at the same time it will not explain all the facts; its main bearing, however, is upon the question of weirs. These early fish are shy because in my opinion they are not prompted by the desire to spawn; their ova or milt is slightly developed, and they ascend the river, firstly, because they are tempted so to do by the floods, and, secondly, because there are physiological reasons for their so doing. There can, however, be no doubt but that if there were no weirs the upper proprietors would get a larger proportion of fresh run salmon than they do at present. I am nevertheless of opinion that the doing away with weirs, supposing it possible, would scarcely have the effect of making the fish run up it at an earlier period than is their natural wont; but at the same time it is possible that a greater number of early run fish may be obtained by the upper proprietors if the weirs were abolished, or made easily passable, and this brings me into the consideration of Spring or early run fish.

Spring or early run Fish.—This is a class of up-running salmon the natural history of which has hitherto been a great puzzle to all observers. I mean the clean scaled well-developed fat fish, that run up some rivers in the months of February and March, and I believe that if some of our large rivers were tested, this class of fish would be found to be present even as early as December and January. The large Dutch fish which come to the London markets are good examples of these early fish; so early as the end of November of last year, 1868, these fresh run fine fish, from 50 lbs. in weight downwards, were seen in the fishmongers' shops, and they continued to be sent for many weeks. Casts of the milts and ova of many of these fish are in my museum, and they form curious contrasts to the milts and roes of English fish at the same period of the year.

In England these fresh-run fish are caught in February and March, and in their upward progress they cross the paths of the great majority of their brethren who are coming down as kelts.

I have heard of an instance where at one haul of the net in the tideway a fisherman caught a female salmon full of ova, secondly a fresh run fish, and thirdly a kelt. My explanation of this fact is, that the female fish was a very late spawner, that the fresh run fish was a specimen of the class I am about to describe, and that the kelt was going down stream in the proper course of things.

Having examined the anatomical conditions of several of these clean run spring fish, and at the same time carefully considered this most difficult subject in all its bearings, I now venture to propose a solution to the question. These clean run fish are in fact a Secondary Migration of salmon, a spring migration in contradistinction to an autumn migration. I have shown elsewhere that the amount of fat upon the pyloric appendages will be a safe guide to ascertain the real history of a given fish. I therefore apply it as a key to help unlock the mystery of the spring fish.

These clean run fish, therefore, in my opinion are those who have laid up a sufficient amount of fat during the time they have remained in the sea (dating from the kelt stage) to last them during their stay in fresh water, and I fancy (although I have no direct grounds as yet to prove it) that they are the early kelts of the previous year, who having reached the sea, say, in January 1868, now reappear as clean run fish in February 1869, or may be even as very large fresh fish in 1870; much, however, depends upon the quantity and quality of food they find in the estuary; there are I understand enormous numbers of smelts in the estuaries of the Dutch rivers, and the food afforded by these, combined with other causes, goes a long way to make the Rhine fish lay up its stock of fat quickly, and therefore renders it ready to proceed all the earlier on its upward pilgrimage. I believe large numbers of smelts are also found in the estuary of the Tay. The early fish, therefore, having laid up a sufficient quantity of fat for their inland sojourn, do not wait till the descent of the autumn floods, but they avail themselves of the spring floods, being tempted by the state of the temperature and the great body of descending water, which informs them their road is clear, and also by the non-necessity of their remaining longer in the sea. This theory I think may be strengthened by the fact that the fat upon the pyloric appendages of most of the fresh run British fish which I have examined is not nearly so abundant as in the fresh fish later on in the season; these very fish if there had been no floods in the spring would probably have remained in the sea, and would have appeared in the river either in the first floods in July or August, or if there were no floods in these months, they would have come up in November and December, as the large fish which, as experience shows, are generally the latest to come into the river, and which for the most part spawn in the lower portions of the river.

These fresh run fish which form the "secondary migration" are certainly not, as some suppose, barren fish; they will, I believe, spawn the following winter; thus a fish ascending the river in the month of February 1869 will, if not caught, deposit her eggs about Christmas 1869, or even earlier; these fish do not, as a rule, come in large numbers, they are caught here and there singly.

Both to the angler and the owners of commercial fisheries they are of great importance, to the one as affording excellent sport, and to the other as fetching large prices in the market. It becomes, therefore, a problem of the greatest importance, severely taxing the resources of science to multiply their number.

It is a great point of dispute whether we can convert a late into an early river; there are able advocates of both sides of the question. My interpretation of the disputed points is:—

Firstly. That whereas the river governs the fish, and not the fish the river, that no early run fish will attempt to ascend unless the conditions are suited for it.

Secondly. Careful preservation (which is the same thing as increasing the number of fish) in the river and the abolition of weirs will not make the fish run up the river a minute earlier, but it will increase the number of fish which form the secondary migration.

Thus, in a river badly preserved, say in 1868, one fresh run fish only may be caught, and we will suppose this one fish to represent 1,000 which are remaining in the sea as kelts or semi-kelts. If the river is preserved for several years, the 1,000 kelts or semi-kelts remaining in the sea will be vastly multiplied, and we will say for the sake of argument that there are 3,000 in the sea; of these 3,000 a certain proportion will be in the condition (as before explained) to take their upward journey when the spring floods are coming down; the proportion therefore of fresh run fish forming the secondary migration in a well-preserved river ought to be greater than in a river which is badly preserved; preservation therefore will have the effect of multiplying the number of fish which will be probably in condition to make the spring migration, providing always that floods be present, and other concomitant circumstances be favourable, so as to tempt them to leave the sea, not with the main army of their brother salmon in the autumn months, but as representatives of the "secondary migration" in the spring months.

My colleague and myself in our last reports ventured to state that the law of close time required alteration. It has been objected to our argument that we should be breaking down the law of uniform close time, which was the result of a prolonged and expensive investigation on the part of a commission appointed in 1861. We did not advance these ideas hastily, nor without sufficient evidence. It is therefore satisfactory to find that we were in the main right as to our ideas, for without any prompting whatever on our part we find that when the deputation, composed of most of the influential gentlemen connected with the English and Welsh salmon fisheries, attended the Home Office the 3rd of March 1869, among the points on which the general law required amendment the following paragraph was adduced: "The law as to 'close time' also "requires alteration (sections 18 and 19 of Act of 1861)." Still the case is beset with very great difficulties, inasmuch as it is alleged that the prolonging of the fishing season in the smaller rivers would lead to poaching in the larger rivers. At present the law gives no power to the Home Secretary to allow the sale of fish caught in an extended annual close time.

This power I think should be given in a new Act, and strict arrangements should also be made that in any case where the annual close time is extended, every box of fish from the district where the fishing has been prolonged by law, should be duly certified by some appointed local authority.

I would even go further, and would wish that even every fish should be individually certified by the method which is called by the French "applombe."

Even in the present state of affairs some Irish and some Scotch rivers are open during September.

Personally I should be most unwilling to extend the close time in any river where the fishermen do not strictly abide by the provisions of the law in all its points, as it is but just to allow the doctrines of those who preceded us to be practically tested.

I have sufficient confidence in the sound practical common sense of the majority of my countrymen who gain a livelihood for themselves, wives, and families by the capture of salmon, to feel assured that a plain statement of truth, the result of local observation, and careful generalization, will have more influence upon them than strict legal coercion; and that when it is pointed out to them that Parliament, the Home Office, the Inspectors, the Boards of Conservators, and the Water Bailiffs have but one object in view, namely, the increase of salmon as food for the public, and consequently increasing the well-earned profits of their labour, that they will abide by the law, and thereby reap benefits to themselves; whereas if they are disobedient to the law, nothing can follow but a disunion of purpose and immediate loss to their interests.

YOUNG OF SALMON.

By the 15th section of the Act of 1861 there are penalties fixed on the taking the young of salmon. Salmon and young of salmon are defined in the 4th section of the Act of 1861; nevertheless it is often difficult for conservators and water bailiffs to get convictions, inasmuch as the natural history evidence brought into court is not always such as to be satisfactory to the magistrates It is difficult by words only to describe the young of migratory salmonidæ; nevertheless I make bold to give at least one broad rule: it is that any young fish that is found to present red markings at the end of the "fatty," "dead," or "adipose fin" is certainly not one of the migratory salmonidæ, but is a common trout.

RETURNS OF SALMON SOLD AT BILLINGSGATE MARKET.

By the kindness of Mr. George Ridpath, of the firm of Messrs. Forbes, Stuart & Co., I am enabled to continue the returns of salmon sold at Billingsgate Market. As I stated in my last report, these returns are compiled for private use. I am therefore the more obliged to Mr. Ridpath and Mr. Stevenson of this firm for allowing me to publish the only accessible figures.

ABSTRACT of BOXES of SALMON delivered in BILLINGSGATE 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868.

Average Weight of each Box, 112 lbs.

Year.	Scotch.	Irish.	Dutch.	Norway.	English and Welsh.	Total Number of Boxes.	Total Weight.	Total Value.
							Tons.	£
1865 - -	19,009	6,858	1,479	1,069	868	29,283	1,464	190,296
1866 - -	21,725	9,326	1,772	1,632	1,563	36,018	1,801	218,521
1867 - -	23,006	5,411	1,203	1,296	2,405	33,321	1,666	213,803
1868 - -	28,020	3,487	807	407	1,725	34,446	1,722	233,084

The average price during this last year has been 1*s.* 2½*d.* per lb.

It would appear from the above figures that during the year 1868 the quantity of salmon which arrived at Billingsgate from all quarters was 56 tons more than in 1867. The English column in 1868 does not come out so well as in 1867. The Irish column is also behindhand, but the Scotch supply shows a great increase.

I do not think that it can be argued from the above returns that the English and Welsh fisheries are falling off, for, as my colleague reminds me, London is not the only market in England for the products of our salmon rivers, and that as the total amount of English and Welsh salmon received at Billinsgate in 1868 was less than the amount taken in one river only—the Tyne—it is clear that there must be other large markets which absorb a large proportion of the capture from our English and Welsh rivers.

This view is quite confirmed by the answers to our questions (see question 2), "What is the chief market for the fish caught in your district." If the reader will refer to the various answers to this question he will see that in nearly every case the bulk of the salmon caught are not sent to London at all, but to the large towns in the immediate neighbourhood of the fisheries.

The main bulk of salmon caught in Scotland are, I understand, sent direct to London, and this may account for the number of boxes from that country having been so much increased; still there can be no doubt that the exceedingly hot weather and drought during the fishing months of last summer were most unfavourable to netting throughout the kingdom. I look upon this fact on the whole as favourable to the salmon fisheries, inasmuch as the salmon have had as it were a year of jubilee, a very large stock being left uncaptured in the sea after the legal fishing time was passed. The unusual drought* was succeeded by unusual floods, which were generally so heavy that no fish in the estuary who wished to ascend to the spawning beds could have any excuse for remaining in the sea. The weirs being flooded over, the "up fish" had free access to their spawning beds, and although many nests were probably made so high up that the floods would run down before the young fish were hatched out, yet I feel convinced that the conjunction of a dry summer succeeded by a wet winter will eventually be found to have been most favourable to the general welfare of our rivers, and that the stock of fish for future years has been very much increased.

SALMON SOLD IN THE PARIS MARKET.

By the kindness of my friend and correspondent, Monsieur Coumes, Inspecteur Général, Ponts et Chaussées, France, I am enabled to give an extract of the money value of salmon and trout sold in the Paris markets:—

	France.	Foreign.	Total.
1866.	£13,750 0 0	£87,916 13 4	£101,666 13 4
	or 330,000 francs.	or 2,110,000 francs.	or 2,440,000 francs.
1867.	£18,750 0 0	£139,583 6 8	£158,333 6 8
	or 450,000 francs.	or 3,350,000 francs.	or 3,800,000 francs.

M. Coumes remarks that the prices per kilogramme varied from 5 to 9 francs, the kilogramme being equivalent to 2·2 English pounds; the above prices correspond to 2 fr. 30 c. to 4 fr. 10 c. English pound, corresponding to 1*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.* per lb.

I should be very curious to know what proportion of these foreign salmon come from Her Britannic Majesty's dominions, the Rhine, and elsewhere.

MUSEUM OF ECONOMIC FISH CULTURE.

Since my last report, I have added considerably to my collection exhibited under the sanction of the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education, and now open free to the public, at the Royal Horticultural Gardens, Kensington, and I do not think that any remarkable salmon or other fish have been sent to London during the last year that I have not examined. If they illustrated any new fact I have cast them, either whole or in part, with my own hands, and I here take the opportunity of thanking those who have kindly lent me the specimens, often of considerable money value.

The hatching boxes last year and this have been well stocked with salmon ova. When the young fish were in a fit state to travel I have made them a present to the various Boards of Conservators to be turned down in the upper waters of their rivers. During the season of 1867–8, I sent away 7,800 young salmon in perfect health to the following rivers:—To the Ribble, 3,000; Axe, 700; Exe, 600; Wye, 500; Itchen, 500; Stour, 500; Usk, 500; Dee, 1,000; Conway, 500; Total, 7,800. This year I hope again to send away between 5,000 and 6,000 young salmon.

Besides the eggs collected by myself, and presented last year by J. A. Youl, Esq., I have received very large numbers through the liberal kindness of the French Government authorities at the piscicultural establishment at Huningue. In the museum will also be found, as before stated, models of salmon ladders, various kinds of nets as used in fisheries, as well as casts of the internal anatomy of the salmon, &c. &c. My object is to establish a museum which at present I believe is unique as a Museum of Pisciculture; and although I am often at very great expense in obtaining for it specimens, &c., yet I shall spare no pains nor trouble to render it worthy of the great and important fisheries of the United Kingdom.

MR. WALPOLE'S THIRD REPORT.

SIR,

LAST year was a year of a peculiar and, so far as salmon fisheries are concerned, of a disadvantageous character. A long drought, for which there has been no parallel in our time, extended not only through the entire summer but even late into the autumn. We hear consequently from all parts of the country that the anglers have been deprived almost completely of their favourite sport, and that even the net fishermen have had an unprofitable year. We must expect, therefore, to find discouragement prevailing in many parts of the kingdom. But, though the exceptional character of 1868 may have produced a temporary feeling of discouragement among fishermen, there is no reason to suppose that there is any cause for any real misgivings. On the contrary, if 1868 was peculiarly unfavourable to the capture of fish it afforded peculiar facilities for their protection and production. The fish forced to remain in the deep estuaries preserved themselves; the high floods of December enabled them to ascend obstacles which are usually impassable, and surrounded the calling of the poacher with peculiar difficulties. In all parts of England we hear tidings of an unwonted number of fish. The rivers are still so high that the kelts will have peculiar facilities for returning to the sea, and we may surely consequently hope that the very causes which have proved so disastrous to the fisherman in 1868 may have been sowing seed to ripen into a harvest to be gathered to good purpose in future years.

Taking advantage of the low water of the summer, I have inspected since the date of my last report a large number of rivers, and those inspections have in some cases led to results which, I trust, may prove a permanent source of congratulation.

I have visited this year the following rivers :—the Eden, Ellen, Derwent, Calder, Ehen, Irt, Mite, and Esk, which are not in fishery districts, and the Kent, Lune, Ribble, Dee, Elwy and Clwyd, Conway, Seiont, Dovey, Wye, Usk, Avon (Bristol), Taw and Torridge, Avon and Erme, Dart, Exe, Avon and Stour, Canterbury Stour, Wharfe, Tees, Tyne, and Coquet fishery districts, and I now venture to offer a few observations which have occurred to me in the course of these inspections.

Cumberland, with the rivers of which I was almost wholly unacquainted when I made my report of last year, possesses the most important qualifications for the production of salmon. Its geographical position at the north of England, its mountainous character, its noble lakes, its great rainfall, are all considerations which deserve attention. Cumberland

The most important river in Cumberland is unquestionably the Eden. The Eden is in fact as fine a river as there is in the whole country. The mere mention of its length, 70 miles, or of the extent of its catchment basin, 916 square miles, gives but a faint idea of its peculiar capabilities as a salmon producing stream. The main river rises in the Pennine range of hills: its tributary, the Caldew, in the slopes of Skiddaw: the Eamont is the outlet of Ulleswater, the Lowther of Haweswater. The estuary of the Solway is one of the noblest in the kingdom. The main river is nearly unobstructed. There are two "coops," as they are locally called, or fishing weirs at Warwick and Corby: but both of these have been provided with a free gap, and consequently present no serious impediment to fish. But there is a difficult weir at Armathwaite, passable only under certain circumstances, which places a limit on the productive powers of the Eden. The tributaries are chiefly closed:—the Caldew by some impassable weirs close to Carlisle; the Eamont by a weir at Penrith, to which a wholly unsuccessful ladder has been attached; but, notwithstanding these facts, and that, in consequence of them, the great majority of the fish in the Eden are bred below Armathwaite, the production of the Eden, which was a comparatively barren river before 1861, amounts to at least 15,000 fish a year. The benefits of this increased production have been sensibly felt by the riparian owners, as the decision of the Special Commissioners has removed the destructive poke-nets on the English side, with which the estuary was originally studded; but, great as the improvement is, it might unquestionably be still greater if wiser measures were adopted for the government of the river. The Eden.

The Cumberland Quarter Sessions have hitherto resisted the formation of fishery districts in that county. I visited the Eden for a second time in January last, for the especial purpose of explaining the objects of a fishery district, in the hope that the magistrates might be induced to afford the river the protection which the formation of a fishery district is calculated to give, and I trust that the meeting which I then attended may tend to secure this desirable object.

At present the river is only protected by two associations, one at Carlisle, and the other at Penrith, which, being solely dependent on the proceeds arising from the sale of tickets and on the voluntary contributions of the neighbourhood, are of course unable either to execute the permanent works which ought to be undertaken, or to afford an adequate protection to the river.

The Eden has one peculiar qualification which deserves notice. It is the earliest river in all England. Clean fish ascend the Eden in January, and the most important fishing in the Eden is carried on months before it is worth while to put a net into many other rivers. The causes of the difference in the season at which salmon migrate in different rivers I have referred to in another place, but I could not avoid alluding in my account of the Eden to a circumstance which so greatly enhances the importance of that river.

The Ellen. The Ellen is the only one of the Cumberland rivers which I was able to mention last year. This year I took occasion to inspect the upper portions of the river which I had not previously seen. There are two milldams at Harby Brow and Torpenhow, neither of which offers much obstruction to fish, and at the first of which the owner has consented to place a grating in accordance with my suggestion; and there are two other mills still higher up, at Ireby. It is gratifying to find that a considerable improvement has rewarded the exertions of the proprietors of the Ellen, and that migratory fish passed in the autumn of 1867, higher up the river than they had done years before; but unfortunately in the autumn of 1868 an accidental escape of lime from a large factory occasioned, as I am informed, a most terrible destruction of fish. Tons of fish were found dead in the river after the accident; it is, however, to be hoped that the great reproductive powers of salmon may remedy the loss which has thus unfortunately occurred.

The Derwent. The Derwent, though only 35½ miles long, and with a catchment basin of only 268 square miles, is a river of great capabilities. Having its source in Borrowdale, and swelling into the great lakes of Keswick and Bassenthwaite, it runs—or almost falls, so rapid is its course—into the sea at Workington. Its chief tributary the Cocker, which joins it at Cockermouth, drains the great lakes of Buttermere, Crummock, and Loweswater; the Greta, or, to speak more properly, its tributary St. John's beck, flows from Thirlemere. There is, probably, no river in England which contains so large an area of water in proportion to its watershed as the Derwent. The Derwent has naturally only one drawback; the river is as late as the Eden is early, and the harvest of the Derwent is consequently not reaped to such advantage as that of the Eden. The improvement which has taken place in the Derwent is most gratifying: two local associations—one at Cockermouth, and the other at Keswick—have undertaken the preservation of the river, a task in which they have been largely assisted by the lessee of the famous Salmon Hall Fishery. The results of the preservation have in a great measure been satisfactory, since, notwithstanding an extraordinary prevalence of poaching, with which the associations are powerless adequately to deal, there has been a considerable improvement in the river; so much so, that I was informed when I was at Cockermouth last January, that the river had never been known to be so full of fish. The chief obstructions on the Derwent are a fishing milldam at Salmon Hall. The dam, which is a very long one, is divided by an island which separates the river at this place into two channels, into each of which there were up to 1861 fishing coops. The coop on the right side of the island was closed in 1861 in consequence of the necessity which would otherwise have existed of making a pass in each channel of the river; and one of the coops on the left side was at the same time converted into a pass. The dam has become the subject of so elaborate a judgment by the Special Commissioners that its circumstances are well known, and it will be sufficient for me to say that, in deference to a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench,* the Commissioners have allowed the legality of the dam; though they have directed the removal of some hecks which it was the custom to place on the top of the dam in such a way as effectually to prevent fish from passing over the dam at any place. The second obstruction on the Derwent is Fitz weir, a steep sloping stone dam near Cockermouth. With these two exceptions there are no obstacles of any importance either in the Derwent or its tributaries, and though there are pollutions in connexion with an extensive flax factory and other works in Cockermouth, and though the river suffers from "coal washings," its waters are on the whole comparatively pure. The real obstacle to the progress of the Derwent is the opposition which has been raised to its formation into a fishery district. I have personally endeavoured at a meeting at Cockermouth to remove the misapprehension which exists in Cumberland on this subject, and I am not without hope that a district may be formed embracing not only the Derwent, but the Ellen within its limits.

Ehen and Calder.

The Ehen and Calder flow through loose shingle, in which their course is constantly changing into the sea. The former is 14½ miles long, and has a catchment basin of 59 square miles; and the latter is 8¾ miles long, with a catchment basin of only 23 square miles. The estuary is fished by "garths," to use the old Saxon word, which still survives in the neighbourhood, of but little use, but undoubted antiquity. Though so near each other* on reaching the sea the circumstances of the two rivers are very different. The "bonnie brown Calder" brawls merrily along through its entire course without being checked by a single weir or stained by anything except the moss it drains. Its soft sandstone banks are undermined with deep holes, in which the fish habitually lie—a circumstance which may possibly account for their almost uniformly declining to rise to any lure in this otherwise miniature salmon river. The Ehen from the moment it leaves Ennerdale winds its way through a busy population. The very waters of the lake itself are pent up for manufacturing purposes, and are only allowed to supply the river at the will of a manufacturer. Without mentioning minor obstructions, four weirs, presenting considerable difficulty, block the passage of the river. At the lowest of these, which belongs to Sir R. Brisco, a ladder, unluckily unsuccessful in its results, was many years ago built; at the highest, which has only been erected a year, I insisted on a slight alteration being made in accordance with the provisions of the 13th section of the Salmon Fishery Act. I am still in correspondence with Mr. Ainsworth, the owner of one of the other weirs in regard to the alteration, which I trust he will be able to make, to facilitate the passage of fish; and this gentleman, I ought to add, has already complied with many of the suggestions I have ventured to offer to him. A local association works hard to effect the preservation of the Ehen, and has succeeded in increasing the supply of fish.

Irt, Mite, and Esk.

The Irt, Mite, and Esk flow into the sea at Ravenglass, and might, I think, be conveniently formed into a district with the Ehen and the Calder. The Irt is 16 miles, the Mite 10, and the Esk 25 miles in length. There is no organization whatever to protect these rivers, and, as a certain consequence, the supply of fish is annually decreasing. The fishing at Ravenglass only lets for 15*l.* a year. A mode of fishing, which I have not met with out of Cumberland, exists on these rivers. A peculiar structure, locally known as a "hod," composed of hurdles and wattling, and covered with boards and turf, is built five feet from the bank and parallel to it, and the fisherman spears the fish which are tempted to rest in the "hod" through a small hole purposely left open in its roof. The device may seem a very rude one, but as the river is studded with "hods," and as the fish are naturally inclined to rest in them, it is very destructive. It is of course illegal, because the use of the "leister" is illegal; but it is just one of those offences which it is impossible to put down without constant protection: and the Irt, Mite, and Esk are absolutely unprotected.

I am very anxious that some measures should be taken for including all these rivers in a fishery district, and until this can be done I am afraid that there is little hope of their produce being materially increased.

Kent Fishery District.

South of the Esk we reach a country where happily the legislation of 1865 has been wisely accepted. The Kent fishery district embraces a wide tract of country and some very important rivers.

The Duddon.

The Duddon, 27½ miles long, with a catchment basin of 117 square miles, flowing through a narrow and comparatively little frequented valley, possesses, in addition to its magnificent estuary, considerable natural capabilities for the production of salmon. It is fished by some fishing weirs belonging to the estate of Duddon Grove, in which I found the requirements of the Salmon Fishery Act had not been attended to, as the gaps made in these weirs were neither so deep nor so wide as those which the law prescribed; and by two "hods," which had been condemned by the Special Commissioners, whose order, however, had not been obeyed. I of course directed attention to these omissions, and am glad to say that I have since been informed that they have both been repaired. Two little brooks, the Lickle and Kirkby Pool, up which sea trout run in great numbers, fall into the estuary of the Duddon. The Lickle is barred by a fishing weir, in which the Special

* Mr. Stanley, the proprietor, I believe, of the whole of the Calder, told me, when I was in Cumberland, a curious old tradition, that when the Calder and Ehen came together the world would come to an end. The two rivers did come together a few months before my visit to Cumberland.

Commissioners properly ordered the construction of a gap in accordance with the terms of the law; but this order had not, at the date of my inspection, been obeyed. The owner of the weir at Kirkby Pool had also neglected to comply with the provisions of the law, and I have begged the conservators of the river to see that the law is obeyed in all these cases; and this, as I have since been informed, has been done.

The Leven. The Leven, the most important river of the district, connects Grasmere, Rydal Water, and Windermere with the sea. Its tributary, the Brathay, flows from Elterwater. The Leven has consequently the merit of being the outlet of the most important of the English lakes. Four weirs block the Leven in the short distance between Windermere and the sea, and three of these, at the time of my visit to the river in the spring, were without passes. I suggested what I hope may prove an effectual method of passing the fish over the two most difficult of these weirs, and these suggestions have been carried out at the expense of the Duke of Devonshire. The commercial value of the Leven as an angling river will, if these passes succeed, be enormous. Windermere affords a boundless field for anglers, but Windermere is a striking instance of the defects in our present law. It is largely fished by the "otter." The flies which are fixed to "the lath" or "otter" are so numerous that a great many fish rise to them; but equally a great many of these fish are only "pricked" by the device, and not securely hooked. The fish constantly pricked become shy, so that where the "otter" is used the sport of the angler is almost certain to decline. The other lesson which may be learned from Windermere is the necessity, which I have alluded to elsewhere, of fixing a close season for char.

Troutbeck is probably the best spawning tributary of Windermere, and Troutbeck was, I am glad to learn, this winter full of spawning fish. The Rothay, which unites Rydal Water with Windermere, is free from obstructions; but the Brathay, an important tributary, the connecting link between Elterwater and Windermere, is blocked by a natural fall, 14 feet in height.

The Crake. The Crake may be almost considered as a tributary of the Leven; it is a fine river, uniting Coniston Lake with the sea. At Penny Bridge, a few miles from the estuary, there is an extensive paper factory, which, as it works night and day, diverts in summer the whole of the water from the river, and is consequently a considerable obstruction to the ascent of fish. A coop, which used to be worked in connexion with this weir, has since 1861 been abandoned. There are three other weirs on the Crake, viz., at Spark Bridge, Nibthwaite, and Lowick Bridge, but none of these weirs present much obstruction to fish. The rich vein of copper ore which has been discovered among the hills above Coniston has proved a source of injury to the river; the upper waters of the lake are much discoloured, and considerable numbers of fish have been killed by this most destructive of mine pollutions.

Rusland Pool, a little brook draining a narrow valley between the Crake and the Leven, and naturally suitable for sea trout, is blocked by an impassable sluice weir, 18 feet high.

The Beela. The Beela, which falls into Morecambe Bay east of the Leven, is a river 16½ miles long, but blocked by a wholly impassable weir a short distance above the tideway, which it is absolutely impossible for any fish to pass; and therefore, although the Beela above this weir possesses all the natural qualifications essential to the production of salmon, it will probably be found impossible—at any rate till the obstructions in other rivers have been removed—to take steps to effect its cultivation.

The Kent. The Kent, a river 26½ miles in length, with a catchment basin of 196 square miles, is, next to the Leven, the most important river in the district to which, in fact, it gives a name. It has the disadvantage of flowing through the busy town of Kendal, and consequently receiving the many pollutions which the thriving manufacturers of Kendal throw into it. There is, however, an immediate prospect of the sewage of Kendal being diverted from the river, and I have impressed upon the corporation—though without succeeding in eliciting a satisfactory assurance from them—the extreme importance of diverting from the river the pollutions of the mills as well as the sewage of the town. Six obstructions of great importance bar the Kent. The first is a natural fall, over which fish could, I think, without any great difficulty, be passed at all seasons. The second and third, at Bassingwill and Sedgwick, have each passes, though defective passes, attached to them; and I have explained the manner in which, in my judgment, these passes could be improved. The fourth obstruction, a weir at Helsington, presents no great difficulty; but a weir immediately below and another immediately above Kendal, respectively belonging to Messrs. Ireland and Whitwell, offer considerable difficulties to the ascent of fish; the more so, as they habitually divert all the water from the river for the use of the extensive factories with which they are connected. Though, therefore, the natural qualifications of the Kent are very considerable, and though considerable attention was paid to the river by a very zealous association prior to the constitution of the present board of conservators, much difficult work remains to be done before the Kent can acquire the position to which it is physically entitled.

The Lune.

The difficulties with which the Lune is beset I dealt with last year. But as Halton weir, to which I then alluded, this year has changed hands, and, as the present owner intimated his readiness to take any steps with regard to that weir, which were taken equally by the owner of Skerton, I went down to Lancaster again. Though the suggestions which I then made were not all adopted, I trust that the little that was done may in some measure obviate the mischief these weirs occasion. I found that at Skerton, the lowest of the weirs, no water had been flowing through the fish pass for many weeks, and that, consequently, fishing within 50 yards of the weir had been temporarily discontinued. But I of course pointed out that a pass which was dry for weeks could not be said to satisfy the conditions of the 12th section of the Salmon Fishery Act, of having water constantly flowing through it; and I therefore insisted on the permanent enlargement of the pass, or on the abandonment of the right of fishing within 50 yards of the dam, and the latter alternative the owner adopted. Skerton, therefore, at once became an ordinary milldam; and, though the means for passing fish over it are still defective, there is some prospect of the fish being enabled to wait in the pools below it till the height of the water enables them to pass over it. Taking advantage of my being at Lancaster, I drove down to the estuary of the river. The estuary of the Lune is fished by a large "baulk," or stake-weir, the legality of which its owner has been able to establish, and by draft, and "haaf" or heave nets, a description of fishing to which I shall more particularly allude in my account of the Ribble.

The Ribble.

There are few rivers which are more interesting than the Ribble, and perhaps there is none other which proves so clearly the wisdom of the provisions of the present Salmon Fishery Acts. The Ribble was so fully described by my colleague last year that I shall not venture to add much to what he then said. Flowing as it does through a thickly inhabited country with large manufacturing towns on its banks, it is naturally terribly polluted in parts of its course: but the happy circumstance that there is no obstruction in the river below Clitheroe, and that the Hodder, its chief spawning tributary, joins it below Clitheroe, and is also unobstructed, has raised the Ribble to the first rank among English rivers. The extent of its productiveness can be proved by one illustration. The estuary of the river is largely fished by haaf nets. A haaf net is not unlike a monster shrimp net, and is held by the fishermen in a stationary position in the direct run of the fish. Some short sharp spikes, attached to the bottom beam, enable him to plant the net firmly in the bed of the river. The destructiveness of the haaf net must consequently depend on the depth or shallowness of the water in the river, and the Ribble happens to be so peculiarly shallow that there are places where at low water the whole channel of the river is capable of being blocked by haaf net men standing shoulder to shoulder. In the summer of 1867 no less than 77 haaf nets were licensed on the Ribble, and they occasioned so serious an injury to the upper proprietors that the conservators suggested that it was desirable to place some limit on the numbers by raising the rate at which they were licensed: the Secretary of State accordingly sanctioned the rate being raised from 2*l.* 10*s.* to 5*l.* on each net. But high as the rate was the event proved that it was not more than the net could fairly bear, for whereas only 77 nets were licensed in 1867 at 2*l.* 10*s.*, no less than 82 were licensed in 1868 at 5*l.* There can be no more satisfactory proof of the capability of the river, or of the advantages it has received from recent legislation. Low Moor weir, near Clitheroe, the first obstruction on the river, was fully described by my colleague last year. I endeavoured, though I regret to say unsuccessfully, to arrange with the owner for an improvement being made in the pass attached to the weir; but the owner, since the Court of Queen's Bench has decided in his favour,* on his appeal from the decision of the Special Commissioners, is unwilling to allow any amount of water, however small, to be diverted from the factory for the supply of the pass; and a constant supply of water is one of the objects at which the Commissioners are, in my judgment, wisely aiming. The pollutions on Pendleton Brook, an important stream flowing into the river near Clitheroe, are very serious. They arise from two paper mills, and I think I may say that I know of no paper mills in any part of England more injurious than these. The conservators have some intention of taking steps to prevent these pollutions under the 5th section of the Salmon Fishery Act, but of all the sections in the Act those regarding pollutions are probably the most difficult to put into operation; and I cannot help repeating what I have alluded to in another place, that, if the recommendations of the Pollutions Commissioners on this subject be really practicable, there does not appear to be any real reason why Parliament should not insist on their being rigidly enforced.

* "Garnett v. Backhouse," L. R., Q. B., 30.

The Dee.

The Dee, which unhappily is in this generation the next river in the circuit of our coasts which is productive of salmon, has very great natural capabilities, and, thanks to the care that has been bestowed upon it, is productive of great quantities of salmon. But there are considerable difficulties which still remain to be overcome, and which unfortunately it is almost impossible to deal with. The Shropshire Union Canal, one of the few canals which are still of importance, is entirely fed by the Dee, and practically diverts the whole of the river in the summer into its leat. I was able to insist at the time of my visit last summer on the construction at the head of the canal of a grating, which will I feel confident answer its immediate purpose, but I was of course unable to insist on the application of the real remedy for the existing grievance, a stipulation that a certain quantity of water should be always allowed to flow down the natural bed of the river. The result must be evident to anyone at Llangollen, which is a short distance below the canal weir. The bed of the river is in summer almost dry, and of course the ascent of fish above Llangollen is absolutely impossible in the summer months. The loss which this state of things occasions to the upper proprietors is increased by the fact that four weirs, all presenting a certain amount of difficulty, at Chester, Erbistock, Llangollen, and Pentrefellyn, in addition to the canal weir at Llantysylio, bar the passage of the river. Three of these, those at Erbistock, Llangollen, and Pentrefellyn, have been provided with passes, passes which deserve the commendations which my colleague bestowed on them last year. But they are instances of the universal law that weirs, even provided with the best of passes, do materially interfere with the passage of fish. The weir or causeway at Chester is a great obstruction to the river. Though the trap near the left bank of the river has long been closed, and though, as no pass has been attached to the weir, no fishing can be conducted within 50 yards of it; still, as the weir diverts the whole of the river from its natural channel, it is a complete bar to the ascent of fish, except on the comparatively rare occasions of high spring tides or high river floods. My attention has been so frequently directed to the extent to which petroleum was calculated to affect fish, that I thought it my duty to take advantage of my visit to the Dee, personally to inspect a large petroleum yard. The effects of the oil on the water were visible at the time of my visit, and the destructiveness of the oil was amply proved to me; but I believe that there is no reason why there should be any drain from a petroleum factory, or why, though the oil no doubt is capable of oozing through a great deal of earth, there should be any pollution coming from a petroleum factory at all; and in this view I was confirmed by the manager of the works. But as long as pollutions are practically permissible evils, so long will it be impossible to force our manufacturers to take any real steps to remedy them.

Elwy and Clwyd.

I have but little to add to the account which my colleague last year gave of the Elwy and Clwyd, though I was glad to find that the rivers have shown a slight improvement. At the time of my visit they were suffering to a great extent from the extreme drought, and later on in the summer large numbers of fish were found dead in the river from this very cause. Seven weirs bar the passage of the Elwy; at the third of these, at Wigfair, a pass was at the time of my visit in course of construction; at the sixth, Llanfair Talhaiarn, a pass, though unfortunately a not very successful one, has been built.

The Conway.

The Conway, 78 miles long, with a catchment basin of 224 square miles, is, naturally speaking, one of the most beautiful rivers of North Wales, though a large portion of its area is practically cut off from fish by the impassable Conway falls. It is not necessary for me to enter into the reasons which have made the ladder, constructed at great expense, at these falls, absolutely useless. It is sufficient to say that it is too steep to walk up; but I entirely agree with my colleague that the passage of fish could be effected at a trifling cost over a subsidiary or bye-fall which presents peculiar advantages for effecting this object. It is unsatisfactory to find that the Conway has suffered a serious decline since the Act of 1861, and it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that that decline is directly due to the universal close season which that Act practically enforced. Salmon do not frequent the river in any numbers till after the fishing season is closed, and as a natural consequence there is a growing disinclination to preserve fish which the law forbids to be caught. I have dealt so fully with this important subject in another place that it is not necessary for me to refer to it any further now.

The Seiont and Gwyrfai.

The active board by which the Seiont and Gwyrfai are administered has adopted most of the suggestions which were made by my colleague and myself last year. It is satisfactory to find that their adoption has improved the ladders which had been attached to the weirs. A baulk of timber was placed diagonally across one of the weirs in the autumn of 1867, and proved an entire success; but this year in replacing it permanently spurs of timber were attached to it at right angles, of an equal height to the baulk, with a view of affording the fish rest in their upward course. I stated to the conservators at the time of my visit that I thought these spurs were certain to interfere with the efficiency of the baulk, and I see that experience has realized those anticipations. The spurs, however, can easily be removed. I have explained to the conservators the manner in which a natural fall, the only obstruction on the Gwyrfai, can be made passable, and I trust that the adoption of that plan may open out this most promising little river.

Dovey. I have no addition to make to the remarks I offered last year on the rivers which compose the Dovey fishery district, in consequence of the short visit I paid to them last summer; and I consequently am able to pass at once to the rivers which it is always pleasant to consider, those that flow into the Bristol Channel.

The Wye. Of the Severn I must leave my colleague to speak, as he has on more than one occasion visited it this summer. The upper portions of the Wye I have carefully inspected. There is probably no river in England better adapted from its source to its mouth for salmon than the Wye. With trifling exceptions it has no obstructions to the ascent of fish throughout its entire course. But great as the natural capabilities of the Wye are, and encouraging as its freedom from obstruction must be considered, it is unsatisfactory to find that there is a general feeling, in its upper waters at any rate, that the new law has not tended to increase the stock of fish which there is in the river; and though, so far as I have been able to ascertain, this state of things is exaggerated, and a slight improvement has taken place, the improvement has been so slight as to be certainly discouraging to its upper proprietors. There are, I think, two reasons for this state of things. The close time before 1861 was not materially different from that fixed by the new law, and though the illegal destruction of "last spring" and kelts has decreased, the instruments for the legal capture of fish have enormously increased. I am not specially alluding to the engines in the estuary, for it is the inevitable, and, I may add, legitimate result of all salmon protection to increase fishing in the estuary of a river; but it is the peculiar misfortune of the Wye to be netted throughout almost its whole course, so that even those fish that are able in the weekly close time to pass the estuary, are almost certain to be captured before they reach the Upper Wye by the incessant exertions of the net fishermen in the river. It of course rests with the proprietors to decide whether this netting of fresh waters shall be continued or no; but if it be continued there seems little prospect of an improvement in the angling in the upper waters. Nor to meet the requirements of the greatly increased fishing, had any of the tributaries of the Wye been up to last year opened; last year I had the pleasure of arranging with the Conservators for the construction of a pass over the lowest weir of the Clwydog, a weir which is the more important to deal with as poaching is carried on to a disastrous extent among the fish which annually in considerable numbers endeavour to pass it. I found serious danger threatening the Wye by the opening of lead mines on its upper streams. A conclusive proof of the poisonous character of the "hush" was afforded by the fact that the cottagers in the neighbourhood have been forced to leave off drinking the water. The proprietors of the mine, which is on Crown property, and which I have alluded to in another place, have promised me that measures shall be taken to prevent any injury occurring to the river, and the observance of this promise I have begged the conservators of the river to notify to me.

The Usk. The Usk board of conservators have not allowed the present season to pass without taking vigorous action to improve this river. Arrangements have been made for the purchase of Trostre weir, the lowest weir on the Usk, and consequently the very slight obstruction which Trostre weir now offers will be got rid of. The arrangement is of prospective importance, because a right of fishing exists at Trostre which might possibly, under certain circumstances, have occasioned the board some trouble. The pass which had been attached to the weir on the Bran has been greatly improved, and the weir is now no obstruction to fish. An important tributary, the Senni brook, has for the first time been opened by the construction of passes on its two lowest weirs. The first of these passes is quite perfect; the second is susceptible of a little improvement, but has made the weir, I feel satisfied, practicable to fish. But the real question in connexion with the Usk—to which all other questions must give way—is the right of the Brecon Canal Company to abstract water from the river to the extent to which they now do. In the extreme drought of last summer, for a considerable number of days, every drop of water was diverted by the canal company from the bed of the river, even the gap for the passage of fish having for this purpose been closed. On the legal right of the company to this amount of water I must be excused, with the possibility of litigation on the subject, from offering an opinion. The loss to the Usk, the neighbourhood, and the town of Brecon is absolute and clear. I had the pleasure, a few months ago, of attending a meeting of the corporation of Brecon on this subject, and I have since been in personal communication with the secretary of the canal company and the conservators in the hope that some compromise might be made satisfactory to all parties. There is still, I hope, some probability of such a result being arrived at, and I confess that it would afford me the greatest satisfaction to learn that I had been able indirectly to assist in this way in promoting the good of a river, which I have always regarded as in some respects the pioneer of our English rivers in the good work of salmon preservation.

The Bristol Avon.

The Bristol Avon is a river 78½ miles long, and has a catchment basin of 869 square miles. It flows through a comparatively flat country, but has the advantage of emptying itself into the Bristol Channel. But it has the disadvantage, as far as I am acquainted with it, of being in what I may term an unnatural state. For purposes of navigation and for milling purposes it has been blocked at close intervals by a succession of weirs, and has by these means been reduced to little better than a succession of millponds. Nor unfortunately are weirs the only evils inflicted on the Avon. The river, I regret to say, is, like many others on the banks of which a busy trade is carried on, polluted with solid and liquid refuse; cinders and slag are tipped into it; lime, vitriol, and other poisons are allowed to flow into it, while the sewage of a large population is emptied into it. So far as salmon are concerned, it will probably be wisest for the conservators to leave to the salmon themselves the decision as to whether the Avon is a salmon river or no; and this decision could best be arrived at by breeding salmon artificially, and turning the smolts, when they are a year old, into the best of the tributaries near the mouth of the river. Six considerable obstructions—at Keynsham, Swinford, Saltford, Brass Mill Saltford, and Upper and Lower Twerton—bar the passage of fish. I have pointed out how each of these can, in my judgment, be most easily made practicable.

The Brue.

The Brue, a river 36 miles long and with a catchment basin of 197 square miles, flows, equally with the Avon, through a flat country, and is blocked by a series of very difficult weirs. The Brue, in fact, can never produce salmon or sea trout unless they are able to pass up the river above Glastonbury, and as far as Alford. Considerable difficulties exist in this respect, as, in addition to the extremely difficult weirs with which the river is blocked, there are double flood gates at the mouth of the river, constructed not only for keeping the tide out, but for keeping at certain times the fresh water in.

The Parret.

The Parret, the most important river of the district, has always produced, and does still produce, a few salmon. The Tone, its most important tributary, which joins it above Bridgwater, has an abundance of fine gravel, and might, if the weirs—three of which, at Ham, Creech, and Bathpool, I have inspected—be made passable, become a productive stream. Carrington brook, a little tributary which joins it in the tideway, is a favourite resort for a small fish locally known as peal, but probably white trout. It is probably too small to be ever much frequented by salmon.

The estuary of the Parret is fished with long rows of putts, a great majority of which are probably illegal; by a long "hang," as it is here called, or stake weir; and by a great number of "hose" nets, a kind of net which was described by Messrs. Ffennell and Eden in 1862, and which I cannot characterize better than in their words as "a purse made of two nets, one within the other, acting on the principle of a mousetrap."

Taw and Torridge.

The visit which I paid to the Taw and Torridge fishery district was mainly occasioned by a report which had been made to the Home Office, that a weir at Clappery, on the Mole, had been raised since 1861, and consequently required a pass to be attached to it under the 13th section of the Salmon Fishery Act. From the inquiries I made at the time of my visit I found that the report was due to misapprehension, and that no addition had been made since 1861 to the height of the weir. I took advantage of my visit to inspect some other weirs on the Mole, one of which, at Meeth, is a considerable obstruction to fish; and to see the alterations which, in accordance with the decision of the Special Commissioners, had been made in Umberleigh fishing milldam, and which have materially assisted to open out the Torridge.

Devonshire Avon.

The poaching to which I had occasion to refer in my last year's account of the Devonshire Avon, has not, I regret to say, decreased; at least 1,000 breeding fish were destroyed in the winter of 1867–8 by poachers. The very general feeling that the present close season is inapplicable to the Avon prevents the residents in the neighbourhood exercising any interference with this unsatisfactory state of things. Few fish are taken in the legal netting season. The anglers openly avow that their only fishing consists in the illegal capture of kelts, and there is no sign whatever under the new law of the river becoming earlier.

The Erme.

The Erme, a beautiful sea-trout stream, has not a very close connexion with the Avon, though its position on the map has led to its being included in the same district as the latter river. I have this year arranged that a pass shall be attached to Fleet weir, which I had occasion to refer to last year as being still unprovided with one. But the real difficulties connected with the Erme arise from the terrible pollutions at Ivybridge. I found a large portion of its channel below the town a dry rocky bed. The water diverted for manufacturing purposes rejoins the river below the town in a foul and stinking state, and not only is the beauty of one of the most beautiful spots in Devonshire destroyed, but the salmon fishing of the Erme must soon cease to exist if this state of things is allowed to continue. The pollutions are mainly due to a large paper mill, which has grown in the last few years from a small factory to be one of the largest in the kingdom: so that the Erme supplies an additional instance of evil arising from a pollution, which the Pollution Commissioners have distinctly declared to be preventible, and which, if that report is trustworthy, I cannot too often repeat, there is consequently no sound reason why the Legislature should not absolutely prohibit.

Dart.

Totnes weir still remains the great obstacle to the improvement of the Dart, naturally one of the most important of the Devonshire rivers. Totnes weir is vested in certain trustees for the benefit of some local charities in Totnes, and the value of the property has been of late years so depreciated that there is little, if any, money to keep the weir in repair. The high floods of the spring of 1868 nearly completed the ruin which through want of repair had been gradually effected, and a large portion of the apron of the weir was washed away. The charity trustees, unable to incur the great expense of its effectual repair, contented themselves with temporarily strengthening the up-stream side of the masonry, practically, in short, converting a sloping into a perpendicular weir. The result has been that the passage of fish has become more difficult than ever, though at the same time it became impossible to take any permanent steps for assisting them over the weir until it was seen what was done by the trustees in rebuilding it. Delay has, I understand, taken place in constructing a pass on Buckfastleigh weir, a weir which has been raised since the passing of the Salmon Fishery Act; but I am in communication with the Dart board of conservators on the subject.

The Teign.

Every passenger by the South Devon Railway has ample opportunities of judging for himself the magnificence of the estuary of the river Teign, along the banks of which the railway runs for a considerable number of miles; but an inspection of the higher portion of the river will show capabilities equally great, above the estuary, for the cultivation of salmon. But these natural advantages have been entirely neutralized by mine pollution. Two mines near Chudleigh have almost completely destroyed the salmon in the Teign. The most destructive of these, I have little doubt, is the Wheal Exmouth, a mine which is now practically unworked, but from which there is constantly discharging a small quantity of water pregnant with a rank mineral poison. The water from the second mine, which is in actual working order, is far more discoloured, but I believe far less deadly. I sent samples of the water from each of these mines to Dr. Frankland shortly after my visit to the Teign for chemical analysis, and Dr. Frankland discovered that poison not only in suspension, but also in solution was present in them. How the effects of these poisons could be removed he declined to give an opinion, at any rate until after the report of the Pollution Commission, of which he is a member, is published; and, guided by this view of Dr. Frankland's, I have suggested to the conservators that the measures which may be taken for the purification of the river should be deferred till after the publication of that report. This decision seems the wiser, as I am quite convinced that the impure water is really the reason which is interfering with the production of the Teign. Bella Marsh Mill, the only weir which requires mention on the river, is of more importance in consequence of the facilities which it affords to poaching than for the obstruction it offers to fish. A weir at Jew's Bridge, which obstructs the Wrey, the most important tributary of the Teign, presents greater difficulties; but there is no reason why each of these weirs should not be made passable, and they certainly would be dealt with immediately if it were not for the pollutions which have destroyed the fisheries of the river.

The Exe.

My colleague is so much better acquainted than I am with the Exe, a river to which he has devoted great attention, that it is hardly necessary for me to refer to a short visit which I made to that river last summer. I then arranged, in company with Mr. Buckland, a form of pass for Trews' weir; but the most important condition which was attached to our plan, the removal of a board at the top of the pass so as to make an inlet for the water, was not carried out, and as it was on that condition that we mainly relied to obviate the disadvantageous position in which the pass was placed, I am not surprised to learn that it has been unsuccessful.

The Avon and Stour.

In my report last year I was able to refer to the visit which I had paid to the Avon and Stour fishery district. I have this year arranged that for the first three months of the fishing season the fish should be allowed a free run through one of the hatches in Knapp and Winkton, the two lowest weirs, and the experiment will prove whether the Avon is sufficiently early, as I hope it will prove to be, to enable the fish to pass in these months up to the higher waters. A considerable advantage will necessarily result from attention being paid to the early fish in the Avon, as the Avon is a river in which weeds grow so rankly, that they alone have frequently been quoted as an insuperable obstacle to the cultivation of the river. If, however, it be possible to pass the fish up the river before the weeds begin to grow, the advantages which the upper proprietors will reap will lead, we may hope, to a far more extended cultivation of the river.

I have thus dealt with the rivers which I have personally seen in the past twelve months flowing into the sea on the west and south coasts of England. It remains for me to mention those which flow into the sea on the east coast.

The Coquet. The Coquet, the most northern of those which I have visited this year, I described last year as "in some places a slow and muddy stream," and I am afraid that my words were considered as unnecessarily depreciating the qualifications of the river. I am consequently glad to have had this year the opportunity of again inspecting the Coquet. My visit last year was paid to the lower portion of the river, which is blocked by so many weirs as to have been converted into a series of ponds, a circumstance which made me give it, perhaps unjustly, the character of a slow and muddy stream. The upper portions of the river present, however, qualifications of a very different description, to which I am glad to be able to afford unqualified admiration. Still the difficulty remains that the weirs on the lower portion of the river are so destructive that they have resulted in the decrease of salmon and in the enormous increase of the more worthless fish—bull-trout; and considerable difficulties exist, from the present law affording equal protection to each fish, in extirpating the bull-trout, a condition inseparable from the successful cultivation of salmon. The Secretary of State has allowed, with a view to this object, a great extension of the netting season, and the greatest efforts have been made totally to extirpate the vermin fish; but, even if this object be accomplished, it must not be forgotten that as long as the weirs on the Coquet remain there is not much probability of salmon proper passing up the river until after the fishing season. Still the experiment on the Coquet is so interesting, and its successful result would be of such importance, that I cordially hope the constant endeavours of those by whom it is carried on may result in success.

The Tyne. The circumstances which have made the Tyne the most productive river in all England I alluded to last year. This year I received early information that a large amount of fishing was carried on illegally at the mouth of the river, and I thought it my duty to go down to Northumberland personally to investigate the truth of this report. For this purpose I went out to sea at night, as it is at night and at sea that the illegal fishing is carried on. No clearer proof could be adduced than what I then saw of the prodigious increase in the salmon of the Tyne, or of the necessity for further legislation. As the night grew dark hundreds of lights glimmered in every direction from literally hundreds of boats engaged in the fishing. These lights, which of course were used under the pretence of a protection from collision, afforded, I have little doubt, considerable assistance to the fishermen, as everyone who knows the effect a light has on salmon will be ready to admit. Nets tied together floating along with the tide barred the passage of the harbour in every direction; it was impossible to reach the harbour without steaming through the nets. I found the more distant nets usually anchored in defiance of all law, and the same man constantly fishing with three or even four nets, but with only one licence. My visit and the energetic steps which were subsequently taken by the Board resulted, I am glad to be able to say, in much good. That part of the fishing which was illegal was checked; but amended legislation must clearly be necessary if it is possible for fishermen out at sea effectually to bar the passage to a river by placing nets as destructive as stake nets in the direct run of the fish.

Two other matters deserve attention. At the request of the Board I inspected a dam on the Reed, which reduces the production of that important tributary, and on which it would be possible to construct a pass; but the Board with the example of Bywell before them, and with a clear appreciation of the benefits which immediately resulted from the removal of Bywell dam, are disposed if possible to remove instead of bridging the dam. Warden paper mill I alluded to last year. Delay took place in attaching the pass which Mr. Horsfall,* of Leeds, was about, as I stated last year, to attach to it, and I am sorry to say that the pass when it was constructed was unsuccessful. It consisted of some baulks of timber joined to the weir, much after the manner of a Forsyth ladder, but with a broader interstice between them at the top than at the bottom. In my judgment its position on the weir alone would have ensured its failure. A local mechanic devised a cheaper and more effectual pass, in a rough baulk of timber fixed diagonally across the face of the weir, but he made the mistake of placing in the centre of the baulk a sort of step, and this step, which broke the current of the water and threw it over the baulk, contributed to its failure.

* Since these words were written I have read with regret of Mr. Horsfall's sudden death, and I hope that it may not be improper for me to add that, whatever judgment may be formed on Mr. Horsfall's own proposals for salmon passes, and I must frankly admit that I am not personally in favour of them, Mr. Horsfall must be given the credit of having been one of the first to call attention to the failure of the Forsyth ladders which have been built in England, and of having been one of the ablest of all the critics who have advanced their views on the ladder question in the public press.

The Tees.

A visit which with my colleague I paid to the Tees for the express purpose of inspecting the famous dam at Dinsdale was unluckily paid at a time when the river was so high that it was impossible to decide what were the exact requirements for insuring the efficiency of the pass which by the order of the Special Commissioners has been made in it. Nor, as it is possible that an appeal may still be lodged against their decision, is it certain that we shall have the opportunity of dealing with it. It is satisfactory to find that, notwithstanding the obstacle which Dinsdale still presents to the cultivation of the Tees, improvement has taken place in this river; but there can be little doubt that if the example of the Tyne could be followed, and Dinsdale dam absolutely removed, the Tees might become, as nature intended that it should become, as productive a river as the Tyne.

The Yorkshire rivers.

Though I have had the pleasure of paying a short visit to the rivers of Yorkshire, the floods at the time of my visit were so high that the weirs were literally covered, and there is therefore some hope that these exceptionally high floods may enable the fish to ascend these beautiful rivers to a higher point than they have done for years past. I only mention them now because the Navigation Board of the Ouse have, as I am informed, given notice to the conservators of the Wharfe to remove the ladder which at considerable expense has been attached to Linton weir. The plea urged for its removal is, that the ladder throws the water against the bank below the weir in such a way as to be likely to injure it. My colleague and I are now in correspondence with the Navigation Commissioners on the subject; but I should hardly be justified in being silent on a matter which, notwithstanding the fact that the ladder is not so efficient as it might be, is calculated to give so much discouragement to the conservators of the district.

The Canterbury Stour.

The only other river to which I need allude now is the Canterbury Stour, a river which, thanks to the protection it is receiving, is daily improving. When I was at Canterbury my attention was directed to the injury inflicted on the river by the drainage from the barracks, and to this injury I have alluded in another place. It is satisfactory to see from the report of the Stour Board, that the War Office have taken measures which it is hoped, will remove the injury in question.

It may be proper to supplement this account of particular rivers with some general observations on the present condition of our salmon fisheries, and on the means which in my judgment might be taken to improve them.

Alterations in districts.

And in the first place, it may be useful to say that the only alterations which have been made in the boundaries of fishery districts, are, a more equal division of the Humber between the Derwent and the Trent; an addition of part of the Yorkshire coast which has not hitherto enjoyed the advantages of protection to the Derwent; and the addition of a little tributary of the Wye, which flows through a portion of Cardigan, to the Wye district—an alteration that will give completeness to that district.

Take of fish.

The take of fish I have already stated has been materially affected by the exceptional drought of last summer. With hardly an exception there has been a diminished take in all our rivers, and with hardly an exception the diminution in the take is attributed to the drought.

Number of men engaged in fisheries.

But probably the truest way of measuring the productiveness of our salmon fisheries is by a consideration of the number of men who are engaged in them. The Appendices to this Report will enable this to be very clearly seen. It will be seen that no less than 3,728 fishermen are, in the 32 districts which have sent in these returns, employed in net fishing for salmon; while in the 25 districts which sent in a return last year as well as this year, and which consequently afford an opportunity for a comparison being made, there is an increase, notwithstanding the unfavourableness of last summer, of no less than 895 net fishermen.

I always purposely avoid regarding the Salmon Acts from a mere sportsman's point of view, but a good angling water is of such unquestionable commercial value that I may be pardoned for referring for a moment to the question of rod licences. No less than 1,805 rods found sport in our English rivers in the driest year that has occurred for years; and the amount of sport may surely be fairly quoted as a great incidental advantage to salmon preservation.

But though at first sight the number of men concerned in our salmon fisheries seems respectable, a more careful consideration of these figures will show how enormously this number is capable of expansion. One river alone—the Tyne—draining only 1,053 square miles, supports, notwithstanding that its two largest tributaries, the Derwent and the South Tyne, are absolutely unproductive, no less than 1,272 net fishermen and 176 rods. If we take the Tyne as our standard, the Humber ought to contain upwards of 10,000 fishermen and its tributary rivers 1,000 rods; and in lieu of the comparatively small number of persons engaged in salmon fishing, our English rivers ought to afford profitable occupation to about 50,000 net fishermen.*

It is quite true that the Tyne last year was largely over-fished, and that so large a number of men will probably never again be dependent on it for employment. But the figures are nevertheless worth quoting, as they prove in a forcible way the remarkable fecundity of a good salmon river.

It may be interesting to consider the causes which have made the performance fall so infinitely below the promise, and to these causes and their remedy I shall devote the remaining portion of this Report.

Physical capabilities of England for salmon.

England and Wales, to which the English Salmon Fishery Acts are applicable, contain an area of about 58,320 square miles, or a little more than 37,000,000 acres. It is hardly necessary to say that this area is divided into different watersheds, varying in size and geological conditions. It was asserted by Mr. Eden, in his able report of 1865, that "the number of square miles of country" which a river drains is a "fair index" of its capabilities, and it has been frequently stated that a river ought to produce food of equal value to that produced by the land in its catchment basin. But although the catchment basin of a river may be taken as a rough index of its capabilities, and though the production of a river may under favourable conditions exceed in value the produce of the basin it drains, both propositions must be accepted with considerable modifications.

Nature has not made every river equally suitable for the production of salmon, and has not afforded every district the same rainfall. In the mountainous districts of Cumberland the rainfall is twice as great as the rainfall in the valley of the Thames. The undulation of the ground has contributed to the formation of great lakes in which the fish can rest in comparative security, and therefore a river in Cumberland will generally contain a far greater proportion of water, and be enriched with a far greater supply of rain, than a river in the south of England. Nor is the question of rainfall the only physical advantage which one river has over another. Salmon, as a rule, prefer water tinged with peat or coal, and avoid the limestone streams. It is generally safe to assume that the tributaries of a salmon stream will naturally be well stocked with salmon accordingly as they rise in the limestone or no; but the chief conditions essential to the successful production of salmon are, that there should be a sufficient fall in the stream to produce a succession of fords on which the fish can make nests, and that these fords should be covered with gravel of a suitable size. Some streams are almost entirely one noble spawning bed from the source to the estuary; but the best salmon rivers are those in which the fords are separated by deep pools in which the fish can securely lie, and which retain at the driest times a sufficient amount of water for the fish to lie in.

As a certain portion of England does not, as the merest glance at a map will show, possess the rises which are necessary for the formation of these fords, it is clear that if the areas of our rivers are to be accepted as a medium of calculating their value, a considerable deduction must be made from the 58,320 square miles which the country, subject to the English Fishery Acts, comprises.

To these deductions it may be interesting to allude. They are, first, the rivers flowing into the sea south of the Humber and north of the Thames, which drain an area of 9,006 square miles; second, the rivers flowing into the sea south of the Canterbury Stour and east of the Test and Itchen, which drain an area of 1,657 square miles; third, small portions of low land contiguous to the coast which are drained by no river, but which may be roughly estimated as comprising an area of about 1,500 square miles.

It will therefore be safe to assume that rivers in England and Wales, draining an area of 46,000 square miles, are more or less adapted to the production of migratory fish of the salmon genus, and that rivers draining an area of about 12,000 square miles are not adapted, or certainly are not adapted, speaking commercially, to the production of this valuable fish.

Of the 46,000 miles adapted to the cultivation of salmon, 6,159 are drained by the Thames and Medway; 9,388 by the Humber and its tributaries; 4,437 by the Severn, reckoning the mouth of the Severn at Dunball Sands. The only other rivers draining above 1,000 square miles of country are the Tyne, draining 1,053 square miles; the Mersey, draining 1,706 square miles; the Wye, 1,655 square miles. It does not take, therefore, much reflection to show that these rivers, draining 24,398 square miles, or more than half the whole area of the country, physically adapted for the production of salmon, ought to be the rivers from which our supply of salmon should be mainly drawn; but it is a melancholy reflection that, with the exception of the Severn, the Tyne, and the Wye—for the few fish caught in the Humber and the Trent are too few to be worth noticing for the purposes of this argument—these rivers do not yield a single salmon throughout the year.

* Probably one of the best means of testing the fertility of a river is by a comparison of the number of men employed in its net fisheries, and the number of rods fishing its upper waters. Applying this test to 10 of the most important rivers in the country in a salmon sense, and to the Humber and its tributaries (including the Trent), we arrive at the following results:—For every 100 miles of its catchment basin the Tyne employs 122 net fishermen; the Ribble 36; the Dee 32; the Towy 31; the Taw and Torridge 30; the Lune 21; the Tees 18; the Wye 12; the Severn 9; the Usk 2; and the Humber less than 1. If we take the case of rods the result will be slightly different. In that case the Ribble will be at the top of the tree, with 48 rods for every 100 square miles of catchment: then will come the Taw and Torridge with 13 rods; the Usk with 30; the Tyne with 17; the Towy with 12; the Wye with 9; the Tees with 8; the Lune with 7; the Dee with 5; the Severn with 2; and the Humber with a fraction so small as to be not worth mentioning.

The reflection is still more startling when it is remembered that the Severn below Stourport is useless as a breeding stream, that the Warwickshire Avon, its most important tributary, is entirely closed, that many others of its tributaries are in the same condition, that in short not one half of the area of the Severn is accessible to salmon; that, though the main stream of the Wye is open, all its important tributaries are closed by weirs; and that even if we turn to the case of the Tyne, the smallest of the rivers but immeasurably the most productive at present in salmon, the whole of the South Tyne and of the Derwent, its most important tributaries, are inaccessible to salmon.

It is not too much to say, therefore, that of the six largest rivers of the kingdom physically adapted to salmon, draining above 24,000 square miles, three only, and these three draining only 7,450 square miles, or not one third of the whole, produce salmon at all, and that of this 7,450 square miles less than 3,500 square miles are accessible to the fish.

The rivers in the second class, draining upwards of 500 square miles, are fortunately in a slightly better position. They are—the Eden, 916 square miles; the Avon, 869 square miles; the Dee, 850 square miles; the Tees, 744 square miles; the Avon (Wilts), 666 square miles; the Usk, 650 square miles; the Exe, 562 square miles; the Parret, 561 square miles; the Test, 544 square miles; the Towy, 522 square miles; the Ribble, 501 square miles. These 11 rivers, therefore, drain 7,385 square miles, but of these the Avon (Bristol), the Parret, and the Exe are practically unproductive, so that 2,000 square miles must at once be deducted from the 7,385 square miles these rivers drain. The Wiltshire Avon is in a hardly better position, and, great as the improvements in the Ribble have been, the weirs on the Ribble and the pollutions in the Ribble are a serious drawback to the production of that river. The Test is almost unproductive of fish. The upper portion of the Tees and many of its tributaries are entirely closed. It is difficult to calculate exactly the amount of breeding ground from which the fish are excluded, but I think that I have written enough to show that at least 3,800 square miles must be deducted from the 7,385 square miles which the rivers, which I have placed in the second category, drain. There are 10 rivers which drain above 250 miles and less than 500 square miles of country. They are—the Cumberland Derwent, 268; the Dovey, 264; the Elwy, 306; the Lune 434; the Stour (Kent), 291; the Stour (Dorset), 497; the Tamar, 381; the Teifi, 389; the Torridge, 349; and the Wear, 455 square miles. These rivers drain 3,634 square miles, but of these the Tamar, the Dovey, and the Wear are almost ruined by mine pollutions; the Elwy and the Torridge are much obstructed by weirs. On nearly all these rivers the present close time is considered by many persons inapplicable, and the supply of fish which, speaking commercially, is drawn from them is confined to that from the Teivy, the Derwent, the Elwy, the Lune, and the Torridge. It is no exaggeration therefore to say that not more than 2,000 miles out of the 3,634 square miles which these rivers drain is productive of salmon.

The rivers which drain less than 250 miles of country are of course of less importance than those which I have hitherto noticed. They are so numerous that it would be confusing to instance them. The residents on their banks consider almost without an exception that the present close time is inapplicable to them, and, speaking generally, they have shown no improvement since the legislation of 1861.

I shall have occasion later on in this report to consider the case of these rivers more particularly. For the present it will be sufficient to point out that hardly any of them are at present sufficiently productive of fish to make their further mention in a discussion of the sources from which our fish markets are supplied at all necessary.

For the sake of clearness it may be useful for me to add a summary of the facts which I have been hitherto submitting:—

Total area of England and Wales - - - -	58,320	square miles.
Deduct physically unsuited to salmon - - -	12,320	„
Area of England and Wales suited to salmon - -	46,000	„

Rivers draining each above	1,000	square miles	24,398
Do. do.	500	„	7,385
Do. do.	250	„	3,634
			35,417	square miles.
Productive of salmon:—
Class A., Rivers above	1,000	square miles	3,500	square miles.
„ B. „	500	„	3,500	„
„ C. „	250	„	2,000	„

Let me briefly point out what these facts mean. The streams which drain 46,000 square miles of country are physically capable of producing salmon. Of these, in round numbers, 36,000 square miles, or more than three-fourths of the whole area, are drained by rivers in one of these three classes, and of this 36,000 square miles, salmon are practically excluded from 27,000 square miles, or exactly three-fourths of the whole.

It is true that this calculation is in some respects imperfect; a few fish are produced in some rivers like the Trent, the Wiltshire Avon, and the Dovey, and I have not credited the fish which such rivers produce, but, on the other hand, I have omitted obstructions which materially interfere with the passage of fish. For instance, every inch of spawning ground on the Severn is shut out by weirs. The Tees is blocked by a difficult weir at Dinsdale So that if I had dealt with the case as I should have been justified in dealing with it, I should have been easily able to show a still more startling state of things. But even as things stand it follows that, notwithstanding the legislation of 1861, out of 36,000 square miles of country which ought to be productive of this most valuable fish only one-fourth, or a little over 9,000 square miles, produces salmon at all.

Is there any further necessity for any explanation of the fact that the increase of salmon since 1861 has not been more rapid, or that the price of salmon is not lower than it is now?

That there has been an increase of salmon, and an increase which is very satisfactory for many reasons, there can be no question; but if the increase which has taken place be properly considered it will probably be found that it adds a moral to the tale which the foregoing figures have been quoted to tell.

The great increase in salmon since 1861 has taken place in the Tyne, the Eden, the Ribble, and the Dee.

The story of the Tyne has been told so often that it seems hardly necessary to repeat it. An insurmountable dam at Bywell blocked the passage of fish to the upper streams. Bywell dam was removed in 1863, and the Tyne from one of the least productive has become probably the most productive of our English rivers.

The Eden chiefly suffered from two fishing weirs at Warwick and Corby. Gaps were made in these weirs under the Act of 1861, and the main river of the Eden, which, like the Tyne, is, with the exception of a weir at Armathwaite which is passable under certain circumstances, fairly free from other obstructions, has rapidly improved.

The Ribble points to the same conclusion; there is no obstacle in it below Clitheroe; and the Hodder, its best spawning stream, is also practically unobstructed. The fish therefore meet no obstruction in their passage up the river, and their preservation has consequently resulted in a most marvellous and satisfactory increase.

The case of the Dee is slightly different. The Dee is injuriously affected by weirs, but it so happens that these weirs, although they materially injure the just rights of its upper proprietors, do not materially interfere with the passage of fish in the breeding season, when the autumn floods have reduced the difficulty which they ordinarily present. The weirs, therefore, on the Dee have hitherto only represented a lesser question, the value of which I should be the last to forget, but have not prevented the great increase which has taken place in the production of the river. But, though the improvement in the Dee is not due to its freedom from weirs, it is probably partly due to the removal of some other fixed obstructions—stake nets, which up to 1861 were fished in great numbers in the magnificent estuary of the river.

The Tyne and the Ribble are both seriously polluted. Excessive purity of water cannot therefore be the cause of the satisfactory increase in their produce. It is true that the pollutions of the Tyne are in the estuary of the river, and no doubt this fact has much to do with the comparative security with which the fish pass Newcastle; but the pollutions on the Ribble are higher up the stream. Every salmon has to pass on its upward journey the great manufacturing town of Preston. It is therefore fair to assume that, provided the pollutions do not represent an extremely poisonous feature as they do in a few mining and manufacturing districts, there is something more necessary for the production of salmon than an absence of pollution, viz., an absence of weirs.

Four rivers, with great physical advantages no doubt, but with advantages which other rivers also share, have materially improved. Two of them are so foul in places that the water would primâ facie appear unsuited for fish. One of them, and the one in which the improvement has been most marked, has been able to free itself from an impassable weir. All of them are comparatively free from weirs; it is surely, then, fair to say that it is the existence of weirs which has operated against the improvement of other rivers, by preventing the cultivation of the 27,000 square miles of country which I have shown to be inaccessible to salmon. The only other unobstructed rivers in the country are the Wye, the Usk, the Teivy, and the Dovey. The Usk is full of fish, though for local reasons the fish do not come in any numbers to any public market. Special reasons, which must be considered specially, have prevented the increase in the Wye, the Dovey, and the Teivy being so large as it might have been.

Weirs.

But it may fairly be asked how is it possible to reconcile with the theory of weirs, if I may so term it, the fact that though weirs have always existed the salmon have not been excluded from the rivers till within the last century, since, in fact, the time when the pollution question has rapidly assumed its present serious features? And, of course, I do not mean to assert that there are not cases where pollutions have not been the cause of the destruction of fish. It would be impossible for anyone who has visited so many rivers as I have to make such an assertion, but I do say that the chief cause which has destroyed our rivers in a salmon sense is the existence of weirs, and this, therefore, is the cause which I am most anxious, Sir, to impress upon you.

Those who think differently seem entirely to have forgotten a great change which has happened in the last century, a change which a study of the old Salmon Acts ought to have taught them. From Magna Charta downwards a series of statutes was passed by our forefathers, which have frequently been considered mere repetitions of each other, but which really all contain distinct provisions to prevent the erection and enhansing of weirs in the great rivers, "les grantz rivers"—to quote the old Norman-French—of the kingdom; and nearly all these statutes, which have been recently held by the Lord Chief Justice, on grounds to which it is unnecessary for me to refer, to apply only to the navigable rivers of the kingdom, give two reasons for their provisions, the first and apparently the chief reason being, as the statute of Edward IV. expresses it, "that ships and boats might have their free passage;" the second and minor reason for "a safeguard of all the fry of fish spawned within the same." Weirs in the time of our ancestors were the greatest possible obstruction to navigation. The barges had to be pulled up inclined planes to the higher level above the weirs. There is a very graphic picture in Stow of the danger and difficulty connected with the process. But when pound locks were introduced—and pound locks, though they had been invented in Italy in the 14th century, were not introduced into England till Brindley used them in the 18th century—this state of things was immediately altered. So far from being an obstruction to navigation, weirs at once afforded facilities to navigation by giving greater depth and less force to the stream. The height of the weir was of no importance to the bargee when the water raised his barge for him to the higher level. It at once became possible and desirable to raise the height of weirs. The inclined planes up which the barges were drawn, and which were equally available for the fish, became no longer necessary. The first object of the old statutes was at an end; the second object, the preservation of fish, was lost sight of.

The reason which I have thus given for the exclusion of salmon from our navigable rivers—the invention of pound locks—has not, so far as I am aware, been hitherto quoted, but it seems to me to explain very clearly the exclusion of salmon from many rivers, including the Thames and the Yorkshire rivers, which has taken place during the last century; and it is these rivers which a mere glance at the map will show ought to be our chief salmon producing streams.

Before, then, any great increase can be made in the production not of any particular river, but of the rivers of England generally, it seems absolutely essential that some steps should be taken with regard to the weirs by which they have been hitherto destroyed.

The machinery which the law at present provides for this purpose may be briefly stated—

1. By a series of old statutes which were repealed in 1861, but which would consequently have applied up to 1861, new weirs were forbidden to be erected, and old weirs were forbidden to be raised in the great navigable rivers of the country.

2. By the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, any person building a new weir "in waters where salmon are found," or raising, &c., an old weir, is compelled to attach a pass to it, to be approved by the Home Office.

So far as the great rivers are concerned, therefore, the statutory provisions affecting weirs seem, at first sight, all that can be required; since, if the weir were built after the passing of Magna Charta, or at least after the 12th Edward IV., and before 1861, it would be illegal under the old statutes, and, if it were built since 1861, the provisions of the Fishery Act of that year would be applicable to it. But in reality this is not the case. The weirs in navigable rivers are, I believe, without exception placed under private Acts of Parliament, and these Acts have specifically legalized the weirs, which but for them might have been considered illegal under the terms of the general statutes to which I have referred.

So far, then, from the law affording any assistance to the salmon conservators in the navigable rivers, and it is from the navigable rivers I cannot too often repeat that our chief supply of salmon ought to be drawn, legislation, passed with another object, and overlooking the salmon interest, has been the cause to which their decay as salmon producing streams may be distinctly traced.

But it may be urged that though I have given the law about weirs I have omitted to mention the law about passes, and that by the Salmon Fishery Act the conservators or proprietor of a fishery may attach a pass, with the consent of the Home Office, to any dam.

Two reasons make the clause inoperative; first, there is no one whose clear duty it is and whose clear object it is to restore the fish to a ruined stream, and that there is consequently no one to undertake the duty of attaching passes to the different weirs. Take the case of the Thames, a river which 300 years ago had the reputation of producing the best salmon in the whole of Europe. Who is to pay for the building ladders over the weirs on that stream? How, therefore, can the only step be taken which is at all likely to restore salmon to the Thames? The men who would really gain by the introduction of salmon, the fishermen of the estuary, would not contribute a farthing to the expense. The Thames, therefore, remains, and, notwithstanding that it is becoming a cleaner stream is likely to remain, an unproductive river.

But a still more important reason makes the provision in regard to passes of no effect. It is a mistake to suppose that any pass gets rid of the ill effects of a weir. I know that there are so many persons who differ from my conclusions in this respect that I venture to state them somewhat fully. A weir stops fish in two different ways. As an obstruction, the fish wait until there is a sufficient fresh in the river to lessen the difficulty it has in passing it. Even where a ladder is built, and if the ladder—unluckily a rare case—be at all times provided with water, fish will not leave the pool below the weir until a fresh is coming down the river; but when the fish has passed the weir he finds a still better pool, and he is again tempted to rest in his upward journey. Every angler knows how his water may be materially improved for angling purposes by placing some large boulders in the stream, so as to afford the fish a pool to rest in; but the pool the sportsman thus contrives for his own purpose is infinitely inferior to the pool which is made by the weir. In that pool, which but for the weir would not have existed, the fish "rest." The upper parts of the river are consequently made later than they would have been, the highest parts so late that the fish are useless to the proprietors.

A state of things arises which may be seen on the Dee now. In the lower waters there is a great increase in the take of fish, and, commercially speaking, the production of the river is, in the highest degree, successful; but in the highest waters there is nothing but discontent; the fish reach them too late to be of any service to the proprietors. The natural result—I am not speaking of the Dee now—follows: gentlemen will not preserve fish if they reap no advantage from them. Poaching increases, the spawning fish are decimated, and the production of the river declines. From a commercial success it becomes known as a commercial failure.

Nor is this the only evil in connexion with weirs; more especially with weirs in a navigable river. The moment that pound locks were invented it became evident that the more nearly a navigable stream could be reduced to the state of a canal the more useful it would be for navigable purposes. The reaches of the river were deepened by the simple device of raising the level of the water by a weir. The clear shallows which presented so much difficulty to the barge were converted into a still pool. But the spawning beds were by this device destroyed; the salmon's nest became a pike pond, and the capabilities of the river, as a salmon-producing stream, were enormously lowered. The construction of a pass or ladder over a weir is consequently immeasurably inferior to the abolition of weirs, and the abolition of weirs should consequently be the object to which the salmon conservator should mainly turn his attention.

Weirs were originally built for navigation, milling, and fishing purposes. Fishing weirs, using the word in its strict sense, are so fully dealt with under the Act of 1861 that I need not make any further allusion to them. Fishing milldams, or weirs partly used for fishing and partly for milling purposes, though few in number, are of great importance, and consequently deserve attention. Weirs in the third category are of course the most numerous, and in this sense the most important.

At the present moment there are probably few cases in which the navigation of a great river can be profitably conducted. The navigation locks throughout the country are in a neglected and sometimes ruinous state, and there cannot be many instances in which the dissolution of the Navigation Company would not be an actual benefit to its proprietors.

Nor are mills in the same position that they occupied a century ago. Manufacturers have to sustain too heavy a competition to trust entirely to the uncertain power which water implies, and the majority of large mills consequently supplement their water with steam-power, while a great many manufacturers find it actually more profitable to work with steam than water. The original use of water, therefore, as a means of communication and as a means of power may be almost said to have passed away; and with it has consequently passed the original use of weirs. Of course I do not mean to assert that in consequence it would be advisable to initiate a crusade against all weirs, and to insist on every river being restored to its natural state. There are now other uses for water, of at least as great importance as those to which it was originally applied, and it would be consequently idle to recommend the destruction of all weirs, as such a recommendation would manifestly tend to the destruction of some of the most important interests in the kingdom.

All that I have endeavoured to shew is, that in consequence of the application of steam to locomotive and milling purposes a great many weirs are maintained for objects which are either actually obsolete, or which are at any rate of less importance than the interests which their maintenance directly injures; and that it would consequently in those cases seem to be sound policy to afford facilities by legislation for the removal of those particular weirs: for the compulsory purchase, in short, of the one single interest injuriously affecting the other interests of the river valley.

It might of course be urged that it would be impossible to decide the preliminary question whether the interests of the weir itself were, or were not, more important than the interests for whose sake its removal was desired. But in reality it seems to me no machinery is requisite for deciding this preliminary question. The persons whose interests were affected by the weir would themselves have to decide whether their interests were of sufficient importance to justify their paying the sum of money which the removal of the weir would infallibly cost, and, if they decided on going to this expense we might surely be tolerably satisfied that the improvement which they would effect in their own property would be at least equivalent to the loss which would result to the state from the removal of the single interest of the weir owner.

Nor are the interests solely confined to the water interests. There is no question of the importance of the drainage of land and the attention which has been paid to it of late years. But the drainage of land is in many cases materially impeded by the existence of weirs. I will give three instances of my meaning: the weir at Topcliffe in Yorkshire, Lug Mill on the Lug, and Sandford Mill on the Thames ruin so much land that good authorities assert the improvement in the land which their removal would effect would actually more than repay the cost of their purchase. They are not purchased because they could only be purchased by the amalgamation of the interests of a great many persons whom it is difficult to get to act in concert with each other. There is probably no legislative machinery applicable for the purpose, and the nuisance consequently representing a distinct loss to the State is allowed to continue. The formation of a central board to deal with these many interests, to deal in fact with the whole government of each watershed, both as regards the land and the water interests, and the relation which those interests have to the health of the population is perhaps too large a subject for an inspector of salmon fisheries to recommend; but, brought face to face as I constantly am with the difficulties which such a board would be able to remedy, and conscious as I must necessarily be of the impotence of a mere fishery board to deal with evils not only affecting fish, but affecting, I am convinced, the true interests and the health of many districts of England, I venture to hope that I may with great respect be allowed to place before you these considerations.

Remedies applicable to Weirs.

But the fact that it may ultimately be necessary to deal with weirs on general grounds affords no reason for not endeavouring in some measure to mitigate the present evil which weirs occasion. The same remedy is usually suggested by every advocate for amended legislation:—"Extend," they say, "the powers of the Special Commissioners, "and let them inquire into the legality of all weirs, re-enacting the provisions of the old

"statutes which were repealed in 1861, so as to make the Prescription Act of William IV. "no longer applicable, as it has recently been held to be applicable, to weirs." I hope that I may not be thought to be urging a word against the Special Commissioners, who have done good work which I should be the last to ignore, if I venture to point out the extreme inefficacy of this remedy. In the first place, there would probably be an objection to giving any mere fishery commission power to inquire into the legality of the mill property of the kingdom. But even if this objection were got over, it would be manifestly impracticable for any commission to undertake more than a limited number of inquiries in a year; and there are so many weirs in the kingdom (on the Taw and Torridge alone there are 400) that it would be utterly impossible for any commission to accomplish their work within a reasonable period. Nor does there seem to be any reason for re-enacting the old statutes which were, it is alleged, improvidently repealed in 1861. The real question connected with the old statutes is not the propriety of their repeal, but their applicability or inapplicability to non-navigable rivers. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, in his famous judgment on the Umberleigh case, did not reverse the decision of the Special Commissioners on the ground that the old statutes had been repealed in 1861, but on the ground that those old statutes were not applicable to non-navigable rivers. If the Lord Chief Justice be right—and Government is surely bound to accept his decision—what advantage would the re-enactment of these old statutes be to the non-navigable rivers? And if he be wrong, then it follows that the Commissioners were right in applying these old statutes to the Umberleigh dam, and that consequently, so far from their repeal having been improvident, their repeal did not affect the question in any way whatever. If it be alleged that it is necessary to re-enact these statutes for the sake of the navigable rivers, the answer seems equally plain. All navigable rivers are, as I have already stated, under Private Acts of Parliament, by which the weirs that have been constructed on them have been specifically legalized.

These two remedies, then, seem wholly inapplicable to the present state of things. Their adoption would raise hopes and would result in disappointment. Some other remedies seem consequently necessary, and what those remedies should be it remains for me to consider.

In the first place, there does not seem to be any reason why the suggestions of the Tees Board should not be carried out, and the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, incorporated in the Salmon Acts, and compulsory power of purchase of weirs be given to the conservators.

If the Salmon Acts were passed, as they profess to be, for the good of the people at large, if the public good be materially interfered with by an individual interest, surely there can be no hardship in saying that the private individual should be forced, in consideration of a fair compensation, to give way to the public. The fact that possibly only comparatively few weirs would be purchased seems to afford no reason why these powers should not be given. If in a single case the conservators would avail themselves of a power, it is surely desirable that the power should be given to them.

Three other remedies, all of which I have previously suggested, might also be adopted. As I ventured to recommend last year, fishing mill dams should be placed on the same footing as fishing weirs, and fishing should be prohibited within 100 yards of any dam unprovided with a free gap; and as I equally recommended then no new weir should be allowed to be built across more than nine-tenths of the stream.

Still, however, these suggestions do not meet the case of the majority of weirs; the readiest means of dealing with the rest of the weirs would I believe be the adoption of the recommendation which I ventured to make in my first report, vizt. the imposition of a rate on every weir unprovided with a pass of a small sum not exceeding 1*l.*, to be applied under the supervision of the Home Office for the sole purpose of building passes, and to cease as soon as the passes had been built.

Pollutions.

The pollution question, which next after that of weirs affords the most fertile source of difficulty to the salmon conservator, must, I am very sanguine, be ultimately satisfactorily settled; but it will never be settled by a mere consideration of the salmon interest. It is the universal demand for water, the necessity which the consumer and manufacturer alike have for a constant supply of clean water, which makes me confident that this question will be brought to a satisfactory issue.

I have been this year in communication with a member of the Rivers Commission, and have ventured through him to bring before that Commission various circumstances which I have thought might be useful to them in the course of their inquiry. In doing so I followed the division which I found it advisable last year to make in pollutions as respectively arising from sewage, factories, and mines.

On the first head, it may be proper for me to allude to the extremely able and valuable report of Lieut.-Colonel Ewart on the drainage of the towns of Oxford, Eton, Windsor, and Abingdon. The report was made in accordance with the directions of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in consequence of a requisition from those towns for the appointment of an engineer to advise them as to the best means of disposing of their sewage which the Thames Navigation Act, 1866, had prevented them from continuing to pass into the Thames. Without following Colonel Ewart into his able argument for preferring the watercloset to the dry earth system, or into his consideration of the merits of the three rival systems, the joint, mixed, or separate systems of sewage, it may be proper for me to remark that generally throughout England there seems a growing feeling that the sewage question can no longer be delayed, but that steps must be taken for the disposal or utilization of sewage. Sewage, as I stated in my report last year, is not in ordinary circumstances fatal to fish; but the great heat and drought of last summer was the cause of so peculiar a state of things that my attention was directed to one or two cases where it proved not only fatal, but fatal in the most disastrous way. I will allude only to one of these cases here, a case which affords in itself a good illustration of a very important fact that in dealing with sewage an ill-considered remedy may prove worse than the disease.

At Canterbury "the drainage," to use Colonel Ewart's words, "after being filtered and treated with chemical deodorizing agents, is passed into the river," and though this system is in my judgment neither economical nor effectual, there is no doubt that sewage thus treated is not dangerous to fish life. But the barracks at Canterbury, which of course are the property of Government, have not been included in this system of drainage; but the sewage from the barracks has been passed into a large tank, where the solids are retained and used for the manure of a large market garden, and from which the overflow only passes into the river. In ordinary years the overflow from the tank has produced no evil consequences. This year it was reported to me that large numbers of fish had been killed by it. From inquiries which I personally made on the spot, I found that this account was not exaggerated; the stench arising from the outlet of the drain was sickening. I filled a bottle with water from the river three feet above it, where the water was clear and clean, while another bottle, filled with water from three feet below it, was foul and offensive in the extreme. It was so poisonous that a minnow, which I placed in it experimentally, was killed by it in four minutes; and an eel, the most tenacious of life of all fish, and the lover of dirt, died in thirty minutes after it had been placed in it.

I have very little doubt that the sewage derived its extremely poisonous qualities from the very steps which had been taken to abate its nuisance. The extreme heat of the summer generated noxious gases in the tank in which it was theoretically retained, and these gases were the cause of its peculiar virulence as a poison. If this reasoning be correct it surely proves that it is essential to deal with sewage while it is fresh.

I hope that it may not be improper to add that I have selected this case because it is a case of poisoning by sewage, in which Government itself is the poisoner. I believe the War Office, whose attention I of course drew to the subject, have now taken steps to remedy this great evil.

The second description of pollution—that by mines—affords the greatest difficulty, and, as I hope that the Rivers Commission will deal with it in their forthcoming report more exhaustively than I could, I may be pardoned from entering very minutely into it.

From the first I have felt satisfied that it was useless to rely on precipitation alone to enable us to get rid of this evil, and the experience I have since gained, enables me to state with great confidence that where the hush from a mine is conspicuously poisonous, some poison is held in solution in the water. It is of course unnecessary to add that a poison in a soluble state can only be got rid of by some chemical process, and that the mechanical devices, on which we have hitherto been relying, do not of themselves effect this object. Why the hush from a lead mine, for instance, is more poisonous in one place than in another is a difficult problem, which can of course only be solved by a careful consideration of the strata in which the lead is found; and it may possibly ultimately be discovered that in some places the poison is due to the existence of a mineral, soluble in water, which is present with the ore; while in others peculiar conditions may enable the water to dissolve the ore itself. On the whole, in all probability, the mines which have been opened in the Welsh hills have been the most injurious. Two rivers, the Rheidol and Ystwith, have been entirely destroyed. The Dovey is being seriously injured, and even the Wye and Severn are injuriously affected by these mines. The mines of Cornwall and Devonshire are hardly less poisonous; and it is impossible to exaggerate the injury which has been inflicted on such rivers as the Fowey, the Tamar, and the Teign. The mines in the Pennine Range may be placed in a different category. The fish drop back before the hush which meets them; but it is difficult to obtain evidence of their being actually killed by it. The same treatment therefore which may remedy the evil in the north will not necessarily be sufficient to meet the case of the mines in the south of England.

If we dismiss for a moment the case of long-established mines, which have gained what the law recognizes as a right to pollute the streams, some advantage would at any rate be gained by the adoption of the suggestion which I ventured last year to offer, that some very stringent measures should be applied in the case of new mines, and that they should be absolutely debarred from polluting a river. The remedy has already been insisted on by the Duke of Northumberland, one of the largest mine owners in the kingdom, and his grace has consequently proved that its adoption is possible. That it would be beneficial there can be little question; the opening of a new mine is by no means a rare occurrence, and will probably be a more frequent one when the present stringent state of the money market is abated. I ascertained last summer that a new mine has been during the last three years opened on the Upper Wye, one of the most important rivers of the country. The mine, which only commenced active washing operations a few months ago, is on Crown property, and the Crown appears to have exacted no conditions whatever in granting a lease to the company by which the mine is worked. Two small catch-pits, totally insufficient for the purpose of cleansing the water, were, I found, the only devices to which the company had resorted, though I am bound to add that my written remonstrance elicited from them a promise to resort to other and fuller precautions. I instance this case partly because the mine is on Crown property and worked under a lease from the Crown, and partly because a valuable property, the fishery interest on the Wye, is undoubtedly injuriously affected by the influx of the mine-water. However important mining operations may be to the country, and however impossible it may be to close a mine which is already being worked, it can hardly be contended that it would be unfair for the future absolutely to prohibit the opening of a mine until precautions have been taken effectually to prevent the flow of all poison from it into the river.

The pollutions which are occasioned by factories are so various in their origin and so different in their effects, that it would be impossible to deal with them in the short space which can be properly devoted to the subject in a fishery report. Yet I may on this subject not improperly add a few words. There are some matters of congratulation, there are others to be deeply deplored, in connexion with it. The most congratulatory feature is the means which the tinplate workers in South Wales are taking to entirely remedy the evil by which the rivers of that district have been almost completely destroyed. The tinplate trade, a trade of growing importance, is almost entirely confined to South Wales, where tinned plates for the use of nearly all the world are manufactured. To prepare the iron plate to receive the tinning it is subjected to a pickling process, the object of the pickle, which is a strong solution of vitriol, being to remove the excrescences and impurities of the iron. The process is a wasteful one, because not only is a large quantity of vitriol used in it, but by its action a large quantity of iron is destroyed. A means has now, however, been discovered by Mr. Pughsley, which has been extensively and beneficially adopted by several manufacturers in Monmouthshire, of recovering a large portion of the vitriol. The process consists in boiling the pickle and suffering it to cool for three successive times. After each boiling a certain quantity of valuable metal (copperas) adheres to the sides of the boiler in which the pickle is cooling, and after the third boiling that portion of the liquor which has not been deposited as copperas is found to be almost pure vitriol, and is capable of being used beneficially again. Copperas, fortunately, is an article for which there is a growing demand in the market, and of which large quantities are used, especially on the continent, in the manufacture of paint. There is a prospect that the adoption of this process may entirely restore the Afon Llwyd, a tributary of the Usk. But though the process is susceptible of profitable adoption, as I have been personally assured by the manufacturers who use it, manufacturers, as a rule, are so slow to resort to any novel process that even now comparatively few factories in South Wales have availed themselves of Mr. Pughsley's patent. Sooner or later, however, it must win its way, and thus one fertile source of pollution may, we hope, be for ever got rid of. That pollutions from factories are evils which must cure themselves is tolerably self-evident; for manufacturers on the whole are the largest consumers of water, and it is essential to their success that water should be comparatively pure. The pollution of streams, which some persons imagine can only be got rid of at the sacrifice of our commercial prosperity, really threatens in many places the continuance of that prosperity, by forcing the manufacturer at great cost to seek for pure water at a distance, instead of using that of the river on which his mill is built, and which the manufacturers above him have rendered unfit for his use. Still, however, little progress has been made towards the abatement of the evil; two years and a half ago the River Pollution Commissioners laid down in great detail certain rules by which the pollution of paper mills could be entirely avoided. I have lost no opportunity of personally impressing paper manufacturers in every part of the kingdom with the extreme importance of adopting the precautions which were thus laid down, and yet I do not know of a single instance where these rules have been adopted. The paper makers are not compelled to take the precautions, and till they are compelled they will not do so. Exactly the same remark applies to the recommendations which a year later were made by the same Commission, though not by the same Commissioners, in regard to the pollutions by cloth factors. No steps have been taken to remedy these pollutions, and I was even at one place (Kendal) informed that though it was intended to divert the whole of the sewage of the town from the Kent, it was seriously doubted whether the pollutions from the manufacturers of the town would be allowed to drain into the sewer. Now if these recommendations made by a Commission composed of gentlemen of the highest scientific attainments, after a personal examination of those practically acquainted with the subject, and a personal inspection of the places to which these recommendations apply, are really practicable, why should not their adoption be insisted on as absolutely and as unexceptionally as the conservators of the Thames have been allowed to insist on the diversion of the whole of the sewage from that river?

But if such legislation be practicable it will be useless to pass it, unless some means are taken to secure its being effectually carried out. To throw on the conservators of salmon the task of freeing a river from pollution would be practically to throw on one interest the burden of protecting not only its own interest, but a great many others. The pollution question I venture with great deference to think, therefore, proves even more clearly than the weir question that our present system requires extension: that a board should be formed in connexion with each river to exercise a complete surveillance over all the interests of that river, and of its watershed; and that to this board, who should of course be controlled by a central board in London, should be confided the care of the many interests connected with the river, such as the drainage of the district, the health of its population, the custody of the navigation, where the navigation existed, the prevention of the many causes of pollution of air and water, and last, though not least, the regulation of the fishing within the district.

I have dealt at great length with these two subjects because, viewed as I view them, they form the very pith and marrow of the salmon question. We may make laws to limit fishing within certain seasons, and with certain instruments; we may tax those instruments; we may appoint conservators and water bailiffs, breed, protect, and legislate; but we shall do comparatively little till we can deal with the two great evils—weirs and pollutions.

Common right of fishing.

But to turn from these questions of general policy to a consideration of the more immediate question involved in this report, the cultivation of salmon, it is right for me to point out a distinction between the Scotch and English law which has seriously interfered with the production of our English rivers. In Scotland the right of fishing for salmon with nets is classed "inter regalia," and vested as a beneficial right in the Crown, and can only be exercised by a subject on an express grant from the Crown. In England the salmon fisheries in our tidal navigable rivers are equally vested in the Crown, but they are vested in the Crown as the trustee for the public, and the general public has consequently a primâ facie right to fish in any lawful way in the estuaries of our great rivers. In Scotland, therefore, the net fisheries are worked by a few individuals, and are represented by a certain number of tangible interests. In England our net fisheries are common to all subjects, and may be worked by an indefinite number of persons who represent no tangible or taxable interest.

This distinction in the right of fishing has naturally led to a distinction in the law. In England, where any person may come and fish in our rivers, the clear means of raising a fund for protecting the river was by imposing a licence duty on the instruments used in fishing. In Scotland, where the right of fishing is limited to a few individuals, the easiest way of raising a fund was by levying a rate on those individuals. Each plan has much to say for itself, and in rivers of a high state of production each may prove equally useful. But it is the especial misfortune of the English plan that it is wholly inapplicable to the case of rivers where there are no fish to catch. Who would take out a licence to catch salmon in the Thames when there are no salmon in the Thames to catch? How, then, can any steps be taken to ensure the cultivation of salmon in a river when the profits resulting from its cultivation would entirely devolve on persons who would certainly refuse to take any part whatever in the expense attendant on it.

The English law, then, which gives the British subject a primâ facie right to fish in our tidal navigable rivers may consequently be the absolute cause of the noncultivation of those rivers. I know that the common right of fishing for salmon has since the days of Magna Charta been one of the most jealously regarded liberties which the public have been able to exercise; but if by the complete extermination of salmon the right has practically ceased to exist for years and years, if a certain expenditure of money be the only means of effecting the reintroduction of salmon into a river, and that say a great company were willing to spend the money without which the cultivation of the river is an impossibility, on the condition of being granted a lease of the whole right of salmon fishing in the estuary, is it not carrying out the theory of common rights ad absurdum to say that because those common rights exist, though they have not been for years, and are not worth a farthing, the task of cultivating the river shall not be undertaken? Surely such a case as that to which I have alluded is one in which it would be beneficial for the Legislature to allow the appropriation by individuals of this common property; and I have less hesitation in making the recommendation because, practically, this course has been taken with regard to our oyster fisheries, and, wisely or unwisely, the Legislature has sanctioned the exclusion of the public from common grounds because this exclusion seemed to be the only way of increasing the cultivation of oysters.*

But if there were no hardship in applying legislation of this description to rivers in which salmon were entirely extinct, would it not be equally possible to extend precisely the same powers to other rivers, if only the interests of those individuals who are engaged in the fishery were properly compensated?

If a certain number of men habitually work the public fisheries of a river, if these fisheries be much reduced, and these men be willing for a certain consideration to abandon to a public company their right of fishing; if the immediate result of the change would be a far more productive fishery, affording consequently employment, through the medium of the company, to a far larger number of men, could there be any real hardship, and would there not be public advantage, in appropriating to a company for a term of years the fisheries of the district?

The distinction between the two cases seems to me to be a very clear one. In the first case, where there are no fish and there are no interests to consider, the right might be appropriated to the company for a long or even indefinite period. In the second case, where there are fish, and consequently other interests besides those actually existing to be considered, the right of fishing ought to be appropriated to the company for a comparatively short period. But if these conditions were observed it seems to me that considerable public advantage might result from the scheme being tried, and that no real hardships could possibly be occasioned by it.

General recommendations.

I see no reason to alter the recommendations which in my previous reports I have ventured to urge. I still think that fishing milldams should be placed on the same footing as fishing weirs; that fixed engines for the capture of eels should be removed during the first six months in each year; that gratings should be placed at the entrance of all artificial channels; that a justice ought to be empowered to allow a water-bailiff to enter upon land for a longer period than 24 hours; that any person fishing at night with an illegal instrument should be liable to arrest; that the use of gaffs, after the net season was closed, should be made illegal; and that the police and the coastguard should be called upon to render, as they are capable of rendering, assistance to the conservators. But there are three recommendations in which my arguments have been in some respects misunderstood, and to which, before I close this Report, I may be allowed therefore to revert.

Fishing for other fish than salmon.

In the first place it seems to me clear that the poaching of salmon can never be properly prevented until all fishing, and not fishing for salmon alone, is placed under the Board of Conservators. As long as every little landowner, with a right of fishing, has the power of fishing for coarse fish at all times without control, so long will the temptation to him be almost irresistible to catch a salmon, if there happen to be one to catch. So long as the fisherman is allowed on leaving off fishing for salmon at noon on Saturday to take a net of a smaller mesh, and continue his fishing for other fish, so long will the temptation to take salmon, if salmon be in the net, be almost irresistible. Some people may, no doubt, think that this ought to be so: that if, for instance, a shoal of mackarel come into Dartmouth on Saturday afternoon it would be absurd to say that the mackarel should not be caught. But all legislation must proceed on the assumption that for the sake of the major interest the minor interest must give way. If it be really worth while to protect salmon it is surely worth while to make regulations which will prevent salmon being caught at times at which, and with instruments with which, their capture is illegal. If for the good of a salmon river it be essential that for 42 hours in each week there should be no net fishing for salmon, it is surely absurd to allow a man to go out with a more destructive net in those 42 hours, and under the pretence of catching less valuable fish, and thus practically to continue his salmon fishing.

My proposal therefore is, that above a point on each river, which the Secretary of State should determine, all net fishing should be under the Board of Conservators, and all the instruments for the capture of fish should pay their quota towards the protection of the river. I am quite aware that the possibility of carrying out this regulation would in a great measure depend on the point above which net fishing is to be protected being properly fixed; but there does not seem to be any real difficulty in fixing on the spot on each river above which the fishing for sea-fish is inferior to, and at the same time interferes with, the fishing for salmon; and this would be the consideration on which, as it appears to me, the point should be fixed. The advantages of placing all fishing under the Board are so evident that it is hardly necessary to refer to them. All fish would equally share in the benefit of preservation which the Board would afford, and even if the licences for their capture were fixed at a low rate the revenue of the Board would be considerably increased. But if the time be not ripe for such a measure as this there can hardly be any objection to the application of the salmon laws to the non-migratory species of the salmon family. Trout, to a certain extent, do already enjoy the advantages of protection. But still in many respects, trout are outside the pale of the law. It is true that the capture of trout at certain seasons within a fishery district, and the possession of trout spawn, is universally prohibited. But there are many circumstances in which trout are not under the protection accorded to salmon, and not only do the trout themselves suffer from this omission, but their exemption from the law affords an excuse for salmon poachers, under the pretext of taking trout, to continue their raid upon salmon.

The case of char is more difficult, since there are questions connected with the natural history of char which are doubtful; but local observation has proved that there is no real difficulty in enacting a close time for char. No doubt the capture of these fish is the most easy when they seek the shallow waters of the lakes for the purpose of depositing their spawn; but the fish are of course at this time in the worst condition, and there are no insuperable difficulties to their capture at other times in the deep waters of the lakes.

Close season

The second matter to which I wish to allude in detail is the present close season. It is argued, with great apparent force, that it is absurd to return to the confusion which existed before 1861, and to substitute for one universal close season a different close season for different rivers; that the old system imposed difficulties on the task of preserving our rivers, to which, having once escaped them, it would be folly to recur; that the fish spawn in every river about the same time; that the same proverb, "the first flood in May," may be quoted for the migration of the smolts in every river; and that the habits of the salmon being similar everywhere in these two respects they must be similar, if artificial preventions were removed, in every case. My answer to the argument is a very plain one. Experience has conclusively proved that there is a difference between the times at which salmon enter rivers, and as there is this difference it is simply idle to ignore it.

I will take two cases to illustrate my meaning. The Eden and the Derwent are both rivers in the same county of England. Their tributary streams rise actually in the same hill—Helvellyn. Both flow through great lakes, the Derwent, on the whole, having the advantage in this respect. There is one fishing weir on the Derwent and two on the Eden. There is an obstruction at Cockermouth on the Derwent, and there is as bad an obstruction at Armathwaite on the Eden. Both rivers are protected, though imperfectly protected, by fishery associations. Both rivers, in the spawning season, are literally full of spawning fish; all the conditions essential to the production of fish are equally shared by each river, and yet the most profitable fishing in the Eden is in February, while it is not worth while to begin fishing in the Derwent till May.

I will take one other instance—the Conway. The Conway has always been carefully preserved, and there have always been fish in the river. The new law was the cause of the removal of certain fixed engines in the Conway, and before the new law fishing was legal till the end of November. The Conway therefore ought to have been a river which should have been particularly benefited by the Act of 1861, because in addition to the very excellent provisions which that Act contained, and which have resulted in the improvement of other rivers, it adapted the close time to what is supposed to be the natural close time for salmon. And yet what has been the result? Year by year since 1861 the Conway has been declining; the funds of the association are consequently dwindling; the interest which used to be taken in the river is dying out. Of what use is it to tell the proprietors of the Conway that if they go on preserving the river it will become earlier?

they do go on preserving the river, and each year the result is less and less successful. They point to their own experience while their opponents are pointing to their theories, and I, Sir, venture to think that it is their experience, and not the speculations of theorists, which ought to be attended to.

If it be maintained that those rivers which are naturally late are small and therefore unimportant rivers, and that for the sake of the larger and more important interests it is worth while to sacrifice the lesser interests of these rivers, then we ought logically to exclude Irish and Dutch salmon from our fish markets during the whole of the close season. But why should we exclude food in an excellent condition from our markets? and, if we do not exclude it, why should we not extend to our neighbours in England the privilege which we accord to our neighbours abroad?

I stated last year the inconsistency in the law which practically prevented us advising you, Sir, from varying the present close season, because though you are able to vary the time in which salmon may be caught, you are unable to vary the time in which English and Welsh salmon may be sold. This inconsistency will, I trust, be remedied in the Act which I hope Parliament may be induced this year to pass for the amendment of our fishery laws.

Uniform mesh.

The third point to which I wish to advert is really very similar in its origin. It is that the law is too uniform; that it is not sufficiently elastic; the objections which apply to an uniform close time apply to an uniform mesh. What can be more absurd than that the net on the Severn, where the lordly salmon average upwards of 10 lbs. in weight, should be the same as the mesh on the Plym, where the little peal, with which it abounds, rarely exceed three-quarters of a pound? If the Home Office be given power to regulate the mesh for each river, so far from an anomalous state of things being created, an anomaly would in my judgment be removed.

Exactly the same kind of argument applies to the weekly close time. In many rivers the present weekly close time is all that is required. In some few rivers it is probable that the course which has I believe been adopted on the Tay of having the weekly close time higher up the river commence later than it commences at the river's mouth, might enable the fish to run through a longer netting reach than they can now. No possible hardship could result from the experiment. If the weekly close time does not exceed a certain number of hours, it can be a matter of little consequence to a net fisherman when it begins and ends.

I have thus, Sir, ventured to make some observations on the present state of our salmon fisheries, and on the alterations which might, I think, with advantage be made in the laws which regulate them. In doing so I must ask your indulgence for having travelled beyond the range of my immediate province, and approached the subject of river management from a broader point of view than as an inspector of salmon fisheries I was, perhaps, strictly entitled to regard it. To enable me to do so, I have necessarily been compelled to refer very shortly, or not at all, to the minor alterations which are required in our salmon laws; but if the great principles for which I have ventured to contend find favour with you, and with Parliament, if our rivers and our watersheds are only governed with a consistent regard for every interest, and the present system of throwing on one little interest the burden of fighting the battle for all the others be abandoned, I have little fear of the result. The restoration of our rivers to their natural conditions for sanitary and other reasons will necessarily tend to the restoration of the fish which nature intended should frequent them; and the public will then generally learn what they are only beginning to appreciate, how great is the wealth which might be derived from the successful cultivation of a great river.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
S. WALPOLE.

The Right Hon. H. A. Bruce, M.P.

GENERAL APPENDIX.

QUESTIONS FORWARDED BY THE INSPECTORS OF SALMON FISHERIES TO THE BOARDS OF CONSERVATORS.

1. Has the take of fish increased or diminished? What are the causes to which you attribute such increase or diminution?

2. Can you give any idea of the number of fish caught in the district—(a) with net, (b) with rod? What is the chief market for them?

3. About what period do the salmon commence to spawn? and when are they most "at hill"— i.e., depositing their ova?

4. At what period of the year, in your district, are the first clean fish taken? When is the main harvest taken? When do the grilse run? When are the "kelts" (fish that have spawned) well out of the river?

5. Have any new mines or factories using deleterious substances been opened on your river in 1868?

6. Have any steps been taken to prevent pollution from mines, factories, and towns, entering your rivers; and have such steps proved successful?

7. Have any new weirs been erected in 1868? have any old weirs been altered so as to create increased obstruction to fish? and, if so, have any steps been taken to ensure the construction of passes upon them, under the 25th section of the Act of 1861? Are the millowners in your district in the habit of shutting down their hatches, so as to allow the water to run over the weir at nights and on Sundays?

8. Have any ladders (i.e., gradients with water breaks or stops) been built, or have any old ladders been altered in 1868? If so, state whether the new ladders, or alterations in the old ladders, have proved efficacious?

9. Have passes on any other plan been constructed, or have any old passes been altered in 1867? If so, have the new passes, or alterations in the old passes, proved successful?

10. Have any gratings been attached to mill or mine lades, or other artificial channels? Are they effective?

11. What instruments for the capture of salmon were licensed in 1868? How many of each of these instruments were licensed? How many of these are usually used in private and how many in public waters? How many men are required to work each of them?

12. Have any prosecutions been instituted under the Salmon Acts? For what offences were they instituted? What has been their result? If failure has occurred, state the cause?

13. Have any "general" licences been issued? if so, how many have been issued? and what is the amount of revenue raised in this way?

14. Are there any other matters to which you desire to draw the attention of the inspectors?

15. Are there any defects or deficiencies in the Acts of Parliament for which, in your opinion, amendment is required? if so, state them in detail, and the remedy you would propose?

ANSWERS TO THE FOREGOING QUESTIONS.

N.B.—The Inspectors, in publishing this very valuable information, must explain that they do not necessarily agree with all the opinions advanced in it.

KENT, BELA, WINSTER, LEVEN, AND DUDDON DISTRICT.*

Kent.

1. This district has only been formed for one year. Salmon have been protected for several years by local conservators. Some increase has taken place, but not of a marked character. It was noticed in the Kent and Leven that more large fish were taken than usual.

2. No reliable estimate can be made. So far as repute allows of any, in the Kent about 1 ton of fish was taken with the net; in the Leven probably from 3 tons to 3½ tons; in the Duddon probably 2 tons. The rod fishing was indifferent, owing to the dry season. The chief markets are Kendal, Ulverston, and the Lake District.

3. Few, if any, fish spawn before November. The bulk of the fish in all the rivers spawn in December and January.

4. Occasional clean fish taken in April and May. The main harvest is in July and August. But fish continue to run from the sea as late as December. These are generally large fish. No distinction of time has been observed in the running of grilse and salmon; they were apparently together. Kelts go down principally in February and March, but they are not out of the rivers till the end of May.

5. The copper mines in Tilberthwaite. Their washing would flow into Coniston Lake by a stream where sea fish have been observed.

6. None. A paper mill discharges all its refuse into the river Bela, and seriously injures this stream. On the Kent everything is reported done which can be done without incurring considerable expense.

7. No new weirs have been erected. Mill owners have been instructed to shut down their hatches.

8. On the Kent the Powder works weir has been altered, and it is said to be successful. On the Duddon and Little rivers the fishing weirs have been wholly removed, or reduced so as to form no obstacle. On the Leven a new pass has been attached to the Eel Dams weir, and the rock at Backbarrow blasted away so as to allow the fish to ascend the fall without difficulty. Nothing can be stated with certainty as to the efficacy of these works, but the upper streams and breeding grounds have been full of fish, and there can be little doubt that this is in some measure due to the improvement of weirs.

9. On the Leven the pass over the Cotton Mill's weir has been much improved.

10. None.

13. Yes. Four general licences have been issued by this board, and the amount of revenue raised thereby was 27*l.* 10*s.*

* Signed by the chairman, but not, for want of time, submitted to the board.

14. The attention of the inspectors is respectfully invited to the suggestions of a memorial prepared and forwarded to them last year.

15. It is the opinion of this board that it would facilitate the suppression of poaching if a duly appointed water bailiff had power to go upon land without the authority of a justice of the peace, where he had good cause to suspect any offence against the Salmon Fisheries Acts. It is also thought desirable that the close time for trout should commence a month earlier than the present statutable limit, and that char should have a similar provision made for their protection. A minimum size of mesh for the capture of trout and char is exceedingly necessary, and this board is of opinion that a licence duty should be paid for every net used within a fishery district.

LUNE DISTRICT.

1. The take of fish was considerable in the tidal waters, but a very diminished supply in the upper waters. The low state of the river here arising from the long dry season and the natural obstacles presented by the weirs at Skerton and Halton prevented the fish from running, and thus detained in the tidal waters they were readily captured there by the heave-net fishermen.

2. We have no means of ascertaining the number of fish. Very few were taken with rod, but the heave-net men (who are purposely silent) reaped a harvest. Lancaster is the chief market, where good supplies of salmon existed through the season at 8*d.* and 1*s.* per lb.

3. Some few fish spawn as early as October, but they are mostly "at hill" in the month of November in the upper waters, and December and January in the lower waters.

4. A few clean fish are taken in February and March, but much depends upon the state of the river. The main harvest (though that term is quite inapplicable in the present state of the Lune) occurs in July and August. The kelts are generally well out of the rivers in May, after our spring floods.

5. None.

6. There are no mines or factories on the Lune above Skerton, but there is a linen manufactory on the Wenning, a tributary about seven miles above Skerton weir, and there are also south of Lancaster a silk manufactory and a skin yard on another tributary, the Conder. In all these cases the Board of Conservators have taken steps for the preservation of the rivers, which have resulted in arrangements which they consider satisfactory for the present, at all events.

7. No new weirs, and no alterations in the nature of obstructions. We are not able to speak positively as to the hatches in Skerton and Halton weirs. The former is frequently worked night and day.

8. The stops in the pass or gradient in Skerton weir authorized by the late Mr. Inspector Ffennell were removed in 1868, under the sanction of Mr. Inspector Walpole, and a new slope or gradient was introduced at Halton weir, (by consent of Major Whitle, the present owner,) with the like approval of Mr. Inspector Walpole. Both these alterations are considered to be improvements, especially that at Halton, but owing to the excessively dry summer we have not had an opportunity of testing them fairly. Of course during floods fish can pass over these weirs at every point.

9. Answered above.

10. None. We think it very desirable that gratings should be fixed in mill races in every instance. In a dry season mill streams afford great opportunities for poaching.

11. The rods, jacks, and crosslines were used on private waters, with some five or six of the draught nets. The remainder, including all the heave nets, were used in public waters.

12. One conviction, at the instance of a private prosecutor, of 5*l.* "for permitting poisonous matter to "flow into the Wenning tributary, whereby fish were "poisoned." This is one of the three cases alluded to in answer to Query No. 6, the Board of Conservators having previously given their full consideration to this complaint, and having obtained every assurance from the mill owners that the injury was not likely to occur again, and many expressions of regret that they (the Board) did not feel themselves called upon to prosecute the parties.

13. None whatever. These licences have hitherto been taken out by the upper proprietors, but the scarcity of fish in their waters offered no inducement to their renewing them.

14. The Board of Conservators purpose applying to the Home Office for permission to increase the charge for heave net licences from 2*l.* to 3*l.* under the 34th section of 28 & 29 Vict. cap. 121.

15. We think that Boards of Conservators should have power to make byelaws, subject to the approval of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, and we would suggest also that the conservators should have authority to fix a graduated scale of licences for nets, the maximum for which is now limited by the first schedule of the Salmon Act, 1865, to 5*l.* We would further propose that millers be compelled to fix gratings at their mill races, both head and tail. That it shall not be lawful to use a net within 100 yards of any dam, whether with or without a certified fish pass, and that the present weekly close time for baulks and nets should be extended, to allow the fish to pass the weirs and gain the upper waters. Lastly, that the Special Commissioners for English Fisheries should have powers of control and supervision over ordinary milldams.

RIBBLE DISTRICT.

1. Diminished. There are several causes for this; first, the dryness of the late summer; second, pollutions, viz., the sewage of Preston at the mouth of the river, the foul waters of the Darwen about a mile above Preston, and the foul waters of the Calder and tributary streams. During the great drought of the summer, the Calder became a mere sewer, the smell from which was frightful, and on the 26th of September, during a flood, the refuse of the chemical works on the Calder, and the Hyndburn, and other deleterious matter which had been accumulating during the summer, came down the Calder in a thick stream and poisoned almost every fish of any kind from its junction with the Ribble near Whalley down to Preston. It is considered that in consequence of the polluted state of the river, and particularly of the Preston sewage at its mouth, many salmon which were bred in the Ribble went up the Lune and other rivers. Ribble.

2. As nearly as can be ascertained, the total number of salmon and fish of the salmon kind taken in the Ribble district was about, namely,—

Haaf nets, about 9000, all in the estuary.
Draught nets, in estuary, about 600.
Do. in river below Preston, 900.
Do. at Preston - - 2,000.
Do. above Preston - 400.

Most of these were taken near Preston.

More morts were killed at and below Preston than was ever previously known.

(b.) By rod: about 20.

Chief markets: Manchester, Southport, Lytham, Blackpool, Preston, Blackburn.

3. Salmon commence to spawn in the Ribble district about the end of October or beginning of November. They are most "at hill" in December.

4. The first clean fish are generally taken in this district in May. The main harvest is in July. Grilse begin to run about the end of July. Kelts are generally gone in February or early in March.

5. No.

6. No such steps have been taken this year. The late dry summer has shown that the purifying works erected by the Corporation of Blackburn at a great expense, to render the sewage water from that town innocuous, are of little practical use, the effluvia from the river below the works being nearly, if not quite, as offensive as immediately above. The Board have the hope that the labours of the Rivers Pollution Commissioners will result in some practical measure being passed by the legislature with the object of preventing pollutions of all descriptions from being put into rivers or their tributaries.

7. No new weirs have been erected; one was in course of re-erection at Settle, but was washed away by the flood in September, and nothing further has yet been done. The mill-owners on the river generally put down their hatches at night and on Sundays so as to allow the water to flow over the weirs.

8. No fish ladders have been erected or altered during the year.

9. No passes have been constructed or altered during the year, but the Board of Conservators are in correspondence with the owners of the weir at Low Moor, near Clitheroe, as to the alteration of the fish pass at that place, and have reason to believe that a more efficient fish pass will soon be constructed.

10. No such gratings have been attached to mill or mine lades, or other artificial channels.

14. The board desire to draw the attention of the inspectors to the report of the appeal case, Rawstorne appellant, Birch respondent, and the desirability of amending the 11th section of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, either by making the owner of a net used illegally liable for such illegal user by whomsoever committed, or by making the persons actually using the engine liable to a penalty for so using it, notwithstanding that such persons may not be the owners or the servants of the owners.

15. We beg briefly to recapitulate the suggestions that we have from time to time had the honour of forwarding for the consideration of the inspectors of fisheries, namely, that—

1. Power should be given to use a graduated scale of licences.
2. The uncertainty as to whether a net licence attaches to the net or the owner thereof should be removed.
3. The Special Commissioners should have the same power over all weirs that they now have over fishing weirs.
4. Gratings should be compulsory wherever water is taken down a goit, or for any purpose, as well as when it is taken for supplying towns or canals.
5. Fishing (except with rod and line) should be illegal between where the water is taken from a river for milling purposes, and where the water is returned to its natural course.
6. Having a drag net held stationary by hand should render it a fixed engine within the terms of the Salmon Acts.
7. Water bailiffs should have power to go over all land adjoining rivers without any special leave to do so.
8. Nets should be liable to be seized in the yearly close time under the same circumstances that they can now be seized in the weekly close time.
9. No net should be used after July 15th of a less mesh than three inches from knot to knot.
10. The maximum penalty for polluting a river should be 100*l.* and the minimum 5*l.*
11. A minimum penalty should be fixed in all cases where penalties are imposed under fishing Acts.
12. Placing two or more nets behind each other should be illegal.
13. The weekly close time should begin at six o'clock on Saturday morning and end at six o'clock on Tuesday evening.
14. The maximum charge for a draft or hang net should be 25*l.*
15. That the common or brown trout should be added to the list of fish included under the head of salmon in the Salmon Fishery Acts.

We beg now further to suggest,—

16. That if the common or brown trout be placed under the Salmon Acts, persons fishing for the same shall not be compellable to take out a licence.
17. That Boards of Conservators should have power to make byelaws (especially with regard to net licences), subject to the approval of the Secretary of State.
18. That the licence for using a haaf net should attach to the user of the net, and not to the net itself, as is the case with rod licences.

DEE DISTRICT.

Dee. 1. The take of fish last season was not so great as that of the preceding season in consequence of the shortness of water, but the fish, running up the river after the netting ceased, showed a marked increase in their numbers, as they have also done on the spawning beds on all parts of the river, from below Bangor to the streams, running into Bala Lake. Last season an experienced water bailiff was confident that a good number of salmon spawned in Bala Lake, but this season the lake has been so full and rough it was impossible to see if such has been the case.

2. It is impossible, this being an open fishery in the salt-water parts of the river between Chester and the sea, to obtain any reliable evidence as to the take of fish by nets. The fishermen are particularly averse to giving any information on the subject. The same remark applies to the netted fresh-water parts of the river. The chief markets are, Chester, Manchester, Liverpool, and Llandudno.

3. Salmon begin to spawn about the middle of November, but very few so early as that, increasing till the middle of January when most spawn, but even now, the 20th January, great numbers are on the beds.

4. A very few clean fish are taken in February. The main harvest is in May, June, and July. The grilse run in August, September, and October. The sea-trout in June and July. The river is not clear of kelts till the end of May, though some have been seen going down the river during this month, when fresh spawners are running up, but there is plenty of room for any quantity on the extensive spawning grounds of this river.

5. No new mines or factories using deleterious substances have been opened in 1868, but several petroleum and paraffin works, which closed during the late American war, have been re-opened, and more are preparing to do so, and several of the old works are now doing a largely increased business. The alkali works are also doing much more work, and discharging a largely increased amount of poisonous refuse into the river, which must have a serious effect on the salmon fisheries, for, if a shoal of salmon fry gets into the stream of this poison they must all be destroyed.

6. Proceedings have been instituted in one case in 1868, against the manager of a petroleum work for permitting the poisonous refuse from his work to flow into the Dee, and a slight fine of 1*l.* was imposed, but the limited means of this board prevent proceedings being taken against the proprietors of large works of this kind on the Dee and its tributaries, which pollute the waters to an alarming extent. Within the last week the river Alyn, an important tributary, has been completely poisoned, as it was not many months ago, and it is believed every fish in it destroyed. The stream joins the Dee a few miles above Chester, and there can be little doubt that this poisoning will increase if not stopped, and the effect on the inhabitants of this city may be judged by the fact that a few months ago the fish contained in a small tank in the city, which was supplied with water from the city water pipes, were all poisoned by petroleum refuse.

7. No new weirs have been erected in this district in 1868, and no old ones have been increased. It requires much attention on the part of the water bailiffs to insure compliance with section 25 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, and this attention costs much money as the mills are miles apart.

8. No new ladders or passes have been erected in this district since those which were made in 1862–1863. These are as they were originally made on what, for want of another name, may be called the "pool-and-run-with-breaks" system. The approaches to two of these were improved in 1868, and the third would be the better for some addition, though as it is fish seldom stop long at it.

9. No passes or ladders on any other plan have been erected or altered in this district in 1868. The weirs on which passes or ladders were made in 1862–1863, are between seven and nine feet perpendicular, one being seven feet seven inches, another eight feet seven inches, and another eight feet seven or eight inches. By the present "pool-and-run-with breaks" passes the fish go up with perfect ease, if there is any water, but last summer there was none for a considerable time. Fish are known to stop in the "pools" in these passes for hours, apparently enjoying themselves on their way up stream.

10. No gratings have been attached to mill lades or races, they are much required as many fish are destroyed for want of them, by getting injured by the mill wheels. These gratings could be erected without damage to the working of the mills, which ought to be compulsory on the part of those who use the water. A new grating has been applied to the canal feeder at Llantysilio (where the water is divided by a weir into the canal) which has not yet been examined by the inspectors, and until after the approaching spring and descent of the salmon fry it is not possible to speak decidedly as to its effectiveness. It is made of iron and somewhat in the form of venetian blinds.

11. The instruments used in 1868 for the capture of salmon in this district have been stake nets, trammel nets, draft nets, coracle nets, and rods, and lines; the number of these have been as stated below. The trammel nets, illegal for taking salmon, were frequently used for that purpose under the pretence of taking other fish, such as flukes, &c., and there is therefore considerable difficulty in detecting them in the act of being used for or taking salmon, though the mode of using them for salmon is well known. The stake nets fixed to stakes, not so firmly set in the ground as the old stakes used to be, have been put up five times in the estuary, and each time have been taken and destroyed by the water bailiffs, no owners coming forward to claim them.

13. No "general" licences have been issued in this district.

14. This board would wish to draw attention of the inspectors to the unsatisfactory state of the Chester weir, (the key to the river, and complete barrier to the fish, except at certain tides or floods,) which they have been hoping and expecting the Special Commissioners would have dealt with ere this, as they reserved their decision. So long as this weir remains in its present state the upper proprietors of this district cannot be expected to take much if any interest in the improvement of the fisheries. This weir is within the limits of the tidal flow, and the navigable part of the river.

15. This board is of opinion that though the Salmon Fisheries Acts of 1861 and 1865, have tended greatly to increase the number of fish in this river, yet experience shows the necessity of further amendments, as the improvements which have taken place cannot be expected to continue without a more equal distribution of the increase, and would therefore respectfully suggest, firstly, that the clause which was struck out of the original Salmon Fisheries Bill of 1861, prohibiting net fishing within 100 yards of any weir, under any circumstances, should be re-inserted. Secondly, that there should be an extension of the weekly close time to the effect that there should be no netting for salmon during the whole of Saturdays. This extension is not much, as netting for salmon by the present Act is illegal after 12 o'clock on Saturdays. And this board is of opinion that this proposed extension of the weekly close time would tend greatly to improve the fisheries, and certainly after the first year not decrease the take of the netters, as more fish would get up to breed early, and the upper proprietors would also thereby have more fish in their waters during the fishing season, and would consequently take that interest in the fisheries without which they must inevitably fail. Thirdly, that the salmon fisheries of this district would be improved by including the month of February in the close season. Fourthly, that this board is of opinion that the board of conservators of the different districts should have the power of raising the licences named in the schedules of the Act of 1865, it being impossible otherwise (when the fish in a district increase greatly and consequently require more care), to provide sufficient funds for their proper preservation.

SEIONT, GWRFAI, AND LLYFNI DISTRICT.

Seiont, Gwrfai, and Llyfni.

1. The take of fish has diminished owing to the protracted drought.
2. No. Net fishing in the estuaries was a comparative failure owing to the drought; the same remark applies to rod fishing. In fact the great bulk of the fish escaped, and in consequence the number of fish spawning in the district is unprecedented. Liverpool is the chief market.
3. They commence in November. In December they are most "at hill."
4. A few fish are taken in June. The main harvest in August, September, and October. The grilse run in August and September. Kelts are well out of the rivers in April.

6. In one case of slate dust rather discolouring the water. That was put an end to.
7. None. Yes. The water bailiffs also attend to this.
8. The old "Forsyth" ladders were altered and greatly improved by removing each alternate step, but in heavy floods and when fish are "gravid" the water is still too turbid to allow them to run up freely. It is intended to dispense with these ladders by damming up the river when the funds of the association will permit.
9. A baulk of timber, as suggested by Her Majesty's inspectors, Messrs. Buckland and Walpole, was placed on a weir on the river Seiont, but probably owing to the "spurs" or "stops" being too high and thereby causing a great body of water to break over them it did not succeed. Owing to the incessant floods it could not be approached to reduce the height of the "spurs."
10. New gratings and old ones repaired have been attached to all mill lades. They are effective.

5. No new mines that I am aware of; the old mines have, however, greatly extended their works, and a larger body of noxious matter is poured into the Dovey than there was last year.

14. I have again to call the attention of the inspectors to the effects of the present period fixed for the fence time. In none of our rivers do we get any salmon, as they run up almost entirely during the fence months, and in consequence the subscriptions are rapidly falling off; what is required is an extra month in the autumn for rods, and if the alteration can be made for nets also, the fence months might be prolonged for six weeks in the beginning of the year with advantage.

The rivers in this district have been preserved for many years, and the salmon have certainly not altered their regular season for running up, nor is there any likelihood of their ever doing so; and I trust that we may hear before the autumn that our very reasonable request has been complied with as far as regards rod fishing at least.

15. Power should be given to water bailiffs and duly constituted river watchers to search fishing baskets, bags, &c., and also pockets, as many fellows fish for samlets and laugh at the keepers who may have good reason for supposing that samlets have been caught, but who are powerless to prove the act.

TEIVY AND AYRON DISTRICT.

1. In the upper waters of the Teivy the take of fish was certainly diminished, owing to the rocks at Cenarth preventing the fish from going up in the dry season for breeding purposes. It is believed that also in the lower waters the take of fish is diminished by the great take in the "Shot fawr" in the preceding year. In the Ayron there is a great increase of fish.

2. Of the number of fish caught in the Teivy district it is impossible to get any information, but the take was entirely by the nets, and principally that was at the mouth of the river Teivy. The chief markets are London and the large English towns.

3. In the month of August they commence to spawn, but deposit their ova mostly in September and October.

4. In the month of April. In the months of July and August. In the end of July and beginning of August. Not before the 1st of April, some remaining much later.

The Cenarth rocks were commenced to be blown up, but the mob which assembled there throwing stones at the workmen so frightened them that the work was stopped; and what was done has not proved successful, and the wall mentioned in reply to the seventh query has made the place worse. The tools, wheelbarrows, and planks used by the workmen were all broken up and destroyed and thrown into the river during the night time, having been taken away from the premises in which they had been put away.

Great failure in detection has occurred owing to the impossibility of thorough identification.

14. The "Shot fawr" at Saint Dogmells, the rocks at Cenarth, and the refuse of the slate quarries thrown into the river at Cilgerran. The fishermen are reported to be giving out that they will all fish the Teivy without taking out any licences this year.

15. A police constable not acting under a deputation from the Board has no power to seize nets or other instruments used, or fish caught illegally. They can only act by magistrate's summons. The same power should be given them as if they held the Board's deputation, which the Carmarthenshire chief constable refuses to sanction. It might also be advantageous if they had power to arrest offenders (as in the case of offenders under the vagrant laws), as the bulk of the illegal fishing is done at night, so that it is difficult to identify the parties. It requires two men in coracles to work a coracle net. It seems doubtful whether both are required to be licensed to the same net, either severally or jointly. This should be made clear one way or the other, and also whether anyone but the party owning a licence net or rod, &c. can use it for fishing. If they can the licence is transferable; this should be made clear. A proper means of identifying the net or other implements, coracle, &c., should be devised, either by a lead plummet stamped with the number and year of the licence, or the number printed on the coracle, &c. &c. A refusal to show the net should be made punishable. If only one of the users of a coracle net is required to be licensed, as the other must use a coracle, is it requisite that he should be licensed for it, or can he use another person's licensed coracle, or an unlicensed one? This should be cleared up. The "Shot fawr" is so destructive an implement that a special licence at a large price ought to be required for its use, and as a large number of men are employed in using it, they should all be required to have personal licences at a smaller amount.

1. The take has increased since the passing of the Salmon Fisheries Acts, 1861 and 1865, but the two past seasons have been bad in consequence of the droughts.

2. No number can be given with any degree of accuracy. Forms have been issued, but in very few cases responded to. New forms will this season be circulated. The chief market is Newport.

3. November. December.

4. End of March, sometimes rather earlier. Main harvest, July. Grilse run July. Kelts are well out by middle of May.

5. No.

6. To some small extent, but only partially successful.

7. The fish pass at Newton weir was closed for a time by the Monmouthshire Canal Company, but is now reopened. No; much to the injury of the fisheries on the river.

8. None.

9. Two passes have been made on Senny Brook, one on the pool system, and the other on the semi-pool system, the former being quite successful, and the latter partially.

10. One on Senny Brook. Yes.

15. Gratings are much needed at all mill weirs, and millowners should be compelled to maintain them. Canal companies should be restrained from drying up rivers. The existing Fishery Acts require considerable amendments for the reasons mentioned on this head in last year's report, to which should be added, all young of salmon, or unseasonable salmon found in any person's possession, should be deemed to be wilfully taken. Water bailiffs should have power to pass along the banks of a river in the execution of their duty, and to search persons on reasonable grounds of suspicion. Penalties should be fixed for throwing mine and other refuse into the river calculated to injure the spawning beds, &c., and for throwing in any deleterious matter whatever. The possession of trout during the fence months should be punishable.

WYE DISTRICT.

Wye.

1. Decrease throughout the river Wye, especially in grilse, owing to the drought of the season.

2. No idea can be given of the number of fish caught. London is the chief market.

3. Salmon commence spawning about the beginning of November, and are "at hill" in the middle of December.

4. The first clean fish are taken about the 1st March; June and July is the main harvest. The grilse run about the 5th July. The "kelts" are well out of the river in May.

5. A new lead mine was opened at Plinlimmon, and chemical works on the Llynfi.

5. The Conservators have caused notices to be served on the proprietors of the Plinlimmon mine works, the Llynfi chemical works, the Redbrook and Lydbrook tinworks, and the Whitebrook paper mills, to prevent pollutions, but the result has not yet been ascertained.

7. Not to the knowledge of the Board of Conservators.

15. The conservators suggest the following for amending the salmon fishery laws, namely :—

1. The Home Office should be empowered to vary and extend the weekly close time.
2. All modes of fishing (angling excepted) should be prohibited within 100 yards of mill dams and weirs.
3. Gratings or some other protection should be placed on mill sluices and artificial watercourses to prevent salmon ascending or descending thereto.
4. Stringent measures should be granted to prevent the pollution of rivers.
5. All milldams should be made passable for fish.
6. Clause 2 of section 34, 28 & 29 Vict. cap. 121, declares that the Secretary of State is to approve of the scale of licences, but omits to define what is evidence of such approval.
7. The powers of the conservators and water-bailiffs should be extended, viz. : To go upon lands on banks of salmon and trout rivers, in the execution of their duty during the close season. To search all persons found and suspected of having in their possession forfeited fish or illegal engines; and if such persons are found by night disguised, and committing a breach of the fishery laws, to apprehend and take them before a magistrate.
8. That the mesh of trout and coarse fish nets should be defined by the Legislature.

SEVERN DISTRICT.

Severn.

1. Increased. The cause of the increase arises from the improved protection of the district under the new system.

2. In consequence of a large portion of the fisheries of the district being public waters, and the extreme difficulty of obtaining correct information from the fishermen, it is impossible to give anything like an approximate estimate of the number of fish taken by any other means than the rod; it has been ascertained that by that mode 18 only were caught; no doubt the extremely dry season was the cause of so few being taken by this mode of fishing.

3. Salmon have been found spawning as early as the latter end of the month of October. They are most "at hill" during the month of December, but the spawning fish continue their operations up to the beginning of March.

4. The first clean fish are usually taken on the opening day of the season, 2nd February. The main harvest occurs in the summer months, the time is dependent materially on the state of the weather, but May is usually the best month. The grilse usually begin to run in June, and continue throughout July and August; but the last two seasons they have been much later, not showing in any quantity during the fishing season. The kelts are not well out of the river until the end of April and some remain much longer even than that time.

5. Not that the board is aware of.

6. No. The provisions of the Fishery Acts are inadequate to secure a successful result to any such proceedings.

7. No new weirs were erected in 1868, nor were any old weirs altered so as to create increased obstruction. In dry weather the millers frequently work their mills night and day, and Sundays as well as week days, and then of course do not shut down their hatches so as to allow the water to run over the weir, and the weir is often dry for a long time. During the exceptionally dry summer of last year many of the weirs had not a drop of water running over them for several months.

8. No new ladders have been built; an alteration was made in an old one in the navigation weir on the Severn at Diglis, which has proved a failure through the want of a floodguard.

9. Passes have been constructed in several other weirs upon other plans, some upon the pool system and others upon the system of a groove with diagonal board; and some slight alterations have been made in one or two of the old passes which have mostly proved successful; one pass attempted upon the straight run principle turned out a failure for obvious reasons.

10. Several gratings have been attached to mill lades and proved effective while they lasted, but two or three of them soon became damaged by floods.

15. Yes. The inspectors are referred to the suggestions made by the Severn Fishery Board last year, for amending the salmon fishery laws, which accompany this report. They have only to add that the experience of the last year has impressed them still more with the necessity for these amendments being carried out, and more especially of the importance of securing a free passage for the fish and of giving Boards of Conservators power to make byelaws such as are suggested.

AVON, BRUE, AND PARRET DISTRICT.

Avon, Brue, &c.

1. The take of fish in the river Parret in the year 1868 (which is the only river where salmon are taken) was larger than has been for some years. One reason given for this is the wasting of a sand bank at the mouth of the river whereby a more direct entrance has been provided for the fish. It has also been suggested that the fishery has been benefited by the increased protection afforded to the fish in the river Severn. Also, there is no doubt that the taking of fish was much facilitated by the low state of the river during the long drought of last summer.

2. About 500 or 600 fish in the river Parret, of an average weight of about 12 lbs. All these fish were taken in the tidal portion of the stream. They were taken in the following manner:—

In the "hang" about - -	150
In butts " - -	300
In dip nets and pitching nets	100

None were taken with rod and line. Bridgwater is the chief market.

3. Cannot say when salmon begin to spawn, or when they are most "at hill," our observations extending only to the tidal portions of the rivers, with the exception of a small portion of the Tone.

4. About Lady-day. The main harvest is May and June, the fish being locally known as "May blowers." The kelts are not out of the river until the end of March.

5. No.

6. There is no pollution to complain of.

7. No new weirs, or alterations of old ones. Cannot say what has been the practice of the millers, but the water having been very scarce they probably pounded it to the utmost.

8. A gradient, with stops, has been constructed under the advice of the inspector on the Tone, at Creech St. Michael, where there is an awkward weir. Not much can be said about the success of this, as since its completion the river has been almost constantly in flood, and all the hatches have been open, giving free passage for the fish.

9. See answer to the last question.

14. The attention of the inspectors is drawn to "the hang." It will be seen by the return that a large number of fish were caught in it. The men who worked it made a most inefficient opening by way of weekly free gap, but the committee were advised that none of the provisions of the Salmon Acts were sufficient to enable them to compel any weekly openings to be made in the hang, and that consequently the effect of taking proceedings would only be to make a display of their weakness. The Salmon Acts are further defective in not making it illegal to take salmon without a licence, unless the salmon are taken with some instrument contemplated in the licence. The river Parret is so muddy that the fish constantly swim upon the surface, with their back fins exposed, and are taken out of the water with the greatest ease, sometimes by hand merely, without any instrument of any kind. In one case a man put a basket down on a large salmon, and sat upon the basket smoking his pipe until the fish was dead. He did this on Saturday afternoon, and was convicted of taking a fish during weekly close time, but if it had happened on Friday afternoon he could not have been convicted, though he held no licence of any kind. Then again, there is no penalty on having salmon in one's possession without being able to account for how it was come by. The invariable story here is that the salmon was "picked up dead on the bank." It is believed that fish are taken at other places along the coast; inquiries will be made, and it is hoped before another year to bring these people under the operation of the Act.

TAW AND TORRIDGE (DEVON) DISTRICT.

Taw and Torridge.

1. Fish have undoubtedly increased; there are several reasons for the increase, viz., not so many salmon destroyed on the spawning beds, greater protection in the estuaries, and less destruction of the young fry by millers and by anglers. The improvement is clearly due to the Salmon Fisheries Acts of 1861 and 1865.

2. The Board can give no approximation to the number, but one of their members, Captain Whyte of Instow, considers that about 4,000 fish have been taken, assuming an average of 10 lbs. each fish. Owing to the long summer drought, salmon have been very infrequently caught this year with rod and line. The principal portion of the 4,000 caught by net go to London and other large towns by rail.

3. Seasons vary. From the middle or end of November, some few fish commence to spawn. The bulk spawn in December and January, many in February, and perhaps later.

4. Seasons vary. There are fresh fish caught with the rod in the Taw in February, but they are very often heavy in spawn, and such cannot be considered clean fish. Some few are taken with the rod in the Torridge in March. The middle of June, July, and August is the main harvest for the nets in the estuaries. It is thought that grilse, or young salmon, or greenbacks, as locally distinguished from salmon peal, were, through the summer, dependent on water, but the net fishers in the estuaries seldom go out before the commencement of May, as they consider it useless, and very few grilse are taken by rod. The great body of kelts have left by the end of May, depending on the first flood in the river about that time, but some kelts remain as late as August.

5. Captain Whyte stated that gasworks had been constructed at Hatherleigh, but did not know if they emptied themselves into the river as yet.

6. None.

7. There are no new weirs. One at Torrington, the Rolle canal weir, has been satisfactorily improved through Mr. Buckland and Mr. Pidgeon's suggestion. The Board have no means of knowing what the mill occupiers do on Sundays.

8. No ladders have been built.

9. At Umberleigh, pursuant to order of the Commissioners, the pass was materially altered in 1867. Major Scott, one of the Commissioners, saw it after completion, and expressed his approval of it.

10. New gratings have been applied at Collaton.

13. No general licences have been issued during 1868.

14. The following is the reply to this and the next question:—The amendment to any Act ought to alter the fence months in the west of England. For many years previous to the Act of 1861, the greater proportion of the salmon taken was in perfect order at Barnstaple fair, on the 19th September. An extension might safely be given to the last day of the month, and it would be considered a great boon to the fishermen; the rods also should have an equivalent extension, viz., the month of November. To do this, the lawful sale of salmon caught by net must be extended to a fixed date in the district to which the extension is granted; and some plan should in our opinion be adopted through the Custom House to identify the locality where the fish were caught. In most cases the proximity of the estuaries would render it easy for the Custom House officials. The number of spawning fish is in excess of the spawning grounds, and this board consider that the increase of salmon would not be injured by the extension of the time of one month to each kind of fishing, while much satisfaction would be given both to the fishermen at the estuaries and to the upper proprietors, in whose water the salmon are bred. That there should be a definition, as accurate as possible, of the two words "unclean" and "unseasonable," mentioned in the Acts of 1861 and 1865, as the construction put on these words by the magistrates is often very conflicting. The conservators are of opinion that greater discretion should be given to the board to form sub-districts, with the view of making more equitable the charges of licence duty on nets. That to prevent the entry of fish, either into the mill race or tail race of any mill, and also into watercourses diverted from the main stream for the purposes of irrigation, gratings should be placed by and with the authority of the board of conservators at their discretion; and in case of objection on the part of any person aggrieved, he should have power to appeal to the Home Office. The upper gratings might be put down on the 1st January, and taken up the 15th June; the lower might be put down on the 1st June and taken up the 1st October, with the requisite penalties for enforcing these provisions.

FOWEY DISTRICT.

1. It has increased as far as the Board of Conservators can ascertain. Fowey.

2. About 135, viz., with net 120, and with rod 15; independent of those caught off Polruan or Fowey, and sent to Mr. Buckland.

3. About November the salmon commence to spawn, and they are most "at hill" at the end of November and beginning of December. N.B.—Ova were taken (from a fish) on January 10th, 1869, for artificial propagation, and spawning fish are ascending to the beds still.

4. We are unable to answer this query, as we can obtain no reliable information.

5. Yes, a new clay work in the parish of Warleggan.

6. No; but the managers of Trevenna Mine and North Wood Cly works promised Mr. Buckland to make catchpits.

7. Two weirs have been raised, viz. Ashford and Treverbyn Mill weirs, on account of the drought in 1868; but passes have been made to each weir, and with great success.

8. At Treverbyn, Ashford, and Colitha Falls new ladders, i.e., gradients, with water breaks or stops, as suggested by Mr. Buckland, and since inspected by him, have been constructed with success.

9. Yes (see answer to the 7th query).

12. No prosecutions have been instituted by the Board of Conservators.

13. No.

14. By an order of the Secretary of State, dated the 13th November 1863, the close season on the river Fowey, and its tributaries, is extended from the 1st February to the 1st April, both inclusive. May we, therefore, conclude that our licences will hold good for the months of September and October, or is there any chance that this will be rectified?

15. There are numbers of mines that cause deleterious matter to flow into the rivers in this district, which matter is not so poisonous in itself to the fish as it is to the vegetation which breeds the food of the smolts; and the China clayworks, of which there are several, do great injury to the rivers by plastering over the natural spawning beds layers of sticky white mud and sand. The salmon fishery, therefore, suffers greatly in consequence of the inefficiency of the Salmon Fisheries Acts as regards the remedies against miners and others polluting the rivers; the Board finding it quite impossible to obtain a conviction against the parties offending under the present state of the law. The Board are therefore of opinion that whenever there is new legislation on the subject, the proprietors of mines should be bound under heavy penalties to take certain definite measures to prevent the flow of poisonous or injurious matters into any salmon river, and that such "poisonous or injurious" matter should not be limited to such matter as shall "cause the waters to poison or kill the fish," (see sec. 5 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109,) but it shall be considered as poisonous if it destroys the food of the smolts, or the spawning beds. All the duties connected with the preservation of salmon, and the enforcing the provisions of the Salmon Fisheries Acts in this district having devolved, from the Court of Quarter Sessions, on this Board. This Board is of opinion that all prosecutions instituted by the county constabulary should be instituted by them under the direction of the Board of Conservators, which Board should receive the fines that might be imposed on the parties offending. It appearing nothing but reasonable that as the Board have to bear all the expenses, they, and not the police, should benefit by the fines imposed, more especially as the Court of Quarter Sessions have, at the request of this Board, authorized the constables (under sec. 37 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861,) to require any person fishing with a rod and line, &c., to produce his licence. Another reason why, in the opinion of this Board, all prosecutions by the police should be with the sanction of the Board of Conservators, and under their control, is that in the majority of cases the prosecutions by the police would fail for want of the help of the Board to enable them to prove that the requisite notices, and the general provisions of the Act, &c., have been complied with. The Board are of opinion that each Board of Conservators should have power to make byelaws for, and enforce penalties in its own district, subject to the Home Secretary and Her Majesty's inspectors of fisheries. Also that protection should be extended to the smolts on their passage to salt water, either by a byelaw, as before suggested, naming the month for each district, or by a general law regulating rod and line fishing for trout in salmon rivers.

THE TAMAR AND PLYM.

Tamar.

1. In the Tavy.—Increased. Cause, the removal of a fishing weir at the mouth of the river; mineral refuse becoming less, and its having been efficiently preserved from netting.

In the Plym.—Decreased. Cause, the destruction by mineral water from Wheal Lopes mine and the filling up of the mouth of the river with mineral refuse and sand from the Morley china clayworks and Hillsboro' mines.

In the Yealm.—Increased. Cause, the better filtration of refuse matter from Lee Mill paperworks, and prevention of netting in estuary.

In the Tamar.—Slightly increased. Would be a very good river but for the Drake Walls mine sending all their refuse into the river, filling up the best fishing pools.

The Lynher.—Originally the best river in the county of Cornwall, but now entirely destroyed. Cause, mineral refuse at the rate of 100 tons per week; scarcely a fish been seen alive the last two years; the few that have been seen come up into the hole and die as it recedes.

2. In the Tamar.—About 100 with net.

In the Plym.—It has not been much fished, but as far as can be ascertained but few have been taken.

In the Yealm.—About 100 with box crib; no nets used.

In the Tavy.—About 500 salmon and peal; rod and line; no nets used.

The principal market is Plymouth.

3. In the early part of November, but principally in the latter part of that month, and in December, great numbers have gone up the different rivers of the district in the November and December floods.

4. A few in May and June. The greater number in August, September, and October. Grilse about June and July. Kelts not clear of the rivers until the latter end of January and February.

5. On the Plym.—China clayworks, the refuse of which will, it is feared, be injurious to fish. An iron mine also is about to be opened on same river.

6. Steps have been taken with success at the Devon Great Consols, the principal mine on the Tamar, but no efficient steps have been taken by any other mining companies, although their attention is continually being drawn to the matter by the clerk of the board, and the superintendent of the district. There is nothing injurious from towns entering the rivers.

7. No new weirs have been erected or old ones altered. Fish passes are attached to all weirs in the district now, but some may be much improved The millowners do not shut down their hatches as a rule, but the water bailiffs do all in their power to get them to do so.

8. A new ladder, one built of granite, has been erected at a cost of 150*l.* by his Grace the Duke of Bedford on the Tavy, and is a very superior one. The salmon have been seen to go up the same and are now in the river above it.

9. No other alterations.

10. None to mills. An effective one has been placed by the board on the Plym to the Wheal Lopes mine leat. Another has been placed by the Plymouth Waterworks at the mouth of their leat taken from the same river, but it does not answer, and a promise by the corporation has been given to rectify it.

The bench were divided in opinion on the last case as to the proprietorship of the net, although it was sworn by the witnesses for the prosecution that the defendant came down at the time of their seizing it and demanded it as his property. They gave the defendant the benefit of their doubt and dismissed the case. The net which was used was an illegal one was seized and a good result accrued from the prosecution of the case by its being destroyed, and no similar fixed engine has been used since.

13. None have been issued.

14. As in the replies made to the inspector's queries last year, attention was called to the great grievance existing in this district to the fishery by the deleterious mining waters and china clayworks refuse, and in the existing state of the law, the great difficulties arising in any prosecution by the board to prevent the same, the board again bring this important matter before the inspectors and urge the necessity of some more stringent and compulsory measures for the prevention of so much destruction being made, as the 5th sect. of the Act of 1861 is so broad and vague that it is impossible to obtain a conviction under the same. In mines or manufactories one person, the manager or other officer, should always be made responsible. An analytical chemist should be allowed by the Government to detect poison in the water and fish.

15. Sect. 5 of Act 1861 is very ineffective and requires amendment.

Sect. 13.—Should require gratings to be placed by the owners or lessees of every leat or other artificial channel taken from the rivers and used merely to those mentioned herein.

Sect. 34.—Justices should have the power to grant warrants to search persons as well as premises.

Act 1865, sect. 30.—The power of the conservators and water bailiffs under this clause should be extended to give them a right to traverse all lands on the banks of salmon rivers in execution of their duty, and power of search should be given them on suspected persons. A provision should be made making a night-line an illegal instrument for taking fish, and against the wholesale destruction of trout by netting.

AVON DISTRICT, SOUTH DEVON.

1. The take of fish with nets in the Avon has been less at the weir or head of the tideway than it was the previous season, but a few fish more have been taken at Bantham, near the mouth of the river, owing doubtless to the dryness of the fishing season. Had the season been more favourable for fishing, it is thought the take would have increased.

2. The conservators have no means of ascertaining how many fish have been captured in the river Erme, but they have ascertained that about 170 salmon have been legitimately caught in the river Avon, viz., about 140 with net, and about 30 with rod. Plymouth is the chief market, and a few are sent to London.

3. About the end of November. In December, and January.

4. The first clean salmon were taken last year in the latter end of May, but a few truff or sewin were taken in February and March. The main harvest is in August, but the fish continue to increase in numbers on their return from sea up to December. The grilse commence to run in August. The kelts are well out of the river the latter end of April and beginning of May.

5. No.

6. The conservators have visited the sail cloth factory at South Brent, belonging to Messrs. Crossing, Phelp, and Co., who, at the instance of the board have taken some steps to prevent the escape of deleterious matter, such as oil of vitriol, &c., extensively used at the factory in the process of bleaching. The means, however, taken to prevent the pollution of the river are insufficient, and consequently trout are frequently seen lying dead in the river just below the factory, poisoned by the deleterious fluids and other destructive substances from the factory. If, therefore, it has the effect of destroying trout of a mature age, it must be very fatal to salmon in an infant state, and when it is considered that salmon are in the habit of spawning within a few yards below the mill, it is obvious that the consequence must be very serious.

7. No new weirs have been erected, or old ones altered in 1868. Yes, except in floods.

14. That the town of South Brent, with a population of about 1,500 people, is situate on that portion of the river Avon where salmon are principally in the habit of spawning, but for want of funds, the board are not in a position to provide sufficient protection for the vast amount of poaching carried on there. The board would suggest that there should be an extension of the fishing time for nets in the fall of the year, as there are so very few fish now enter the rivers of the district before the 1st of September. They would, therefore, recommend that net fishing be continued to the 1st of October, and that rod fishing should cease after that date. That the close season should cease at the same time as at present. To prevent the poaching which is now extensively carried on during the breeding season of salmon in the upper waters of the river Avon, it would be very desirable if the rural police were instructed to set a watch on poachers, and summon before the justices any they may detect ; and also if the coastguard men were ordered to do the same, with regard to poaching in the estuary and river's mouth. That as the money raised under the powers conferred by the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1865, are inadequate to secure proper protection to salmon whilst ascending our rivers to deposit their spawn, it is thought that a small public grant annually would be of great advantage and enable the conservators to organize and carry out an efficient system of preservation of rivers, and be the means of largely increasing the number of salmon.

15. Sect. 5 of Salmon Fisheries Act, 1861, is not sufficiently explicit and stringent to prevent pollution of rivers.

Sect. 8. Part 3 should be altered, and all persons having in their possession, or in their boat with them, on or near a salmon river or its tributaries any spear should be liable to a fine, &c., without it being necessary to prove that they intended to catch salmon by means thereof, and this should also be extended to a gaff, except it be in possession of a person who has a rod licence for fishing within the district. A water bailiff or conservator should be empowered to search any person's basket, bag, or boat, and if necessary, take from him any fish unlawfully taken. They should also have power to walk on any lands adjoining salmon rivers and their tributaries.

Sect. 10 should be extended so as to prohibit any trammel or other fixed net from being used either in a river or within two miles of a river's mouth.

Sect. 19 should be amended, as it virtually prohibits the Home Secretary from altering the close season. If he altered it at the instance of a board of conservators according to the present law, all parties buying, selling, exposing for sale, or having in their possession for sale, any salmon between the 3d of September and the 2d of February following, would be liable to a fine of 2*l.* for each offence. During the close season no salmon should be allowed to be in the possession of any person for sale, or otherwise (foreign salmon excepted).

Sect. 30 of Salmon Fisheries Act, 1865, should be extended, giving conservators and water bailiffs greater powers as to entering lands adjoining rivers or their tributaries.

The whole difficulty was explained to Mr. Walpole, and the board are now waiting for the report of the Pollution Commission; for unless the poison can be got rid of it is useless spending money on the river.

9. The weir belonging to the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company was extended, so as to lower the gradient, but the fish do not go up. The old ladder has been taken away, and a temporary pass made, but this weir will be dealt with next year; but in the present state of the weir it is impossible for the fish to get to the breeding grounds higher up the river.

11. Only one seine or draft net used with two or three men.

13. None.

14 & 15. That the Legislature should interfere to prevent the pollution of the river, and settle the question. Private individuals will not, and the board has no means.

Also. No fisherman should have a salmon boat except he has a licence. It is next to impossible in the estuary to see the salmon caught, unless the board had a staff of men and boats to follow every boat with a seine. In the estuary there are some dozen seines, which, in catching herrings or flatfish, also take in the autumn small salmon varying from two to six pounds.

That all dealers shall be obliged, on application by a conservator, watcher, or other authorised person, to give the name and residence of the person from whom each salmon was bought, under a heavy penalty. Every person fishing with a rod and line, fly or minnow, should be obliged to take out a licence.

OTTER DISTRICT, DEVON.

Otter.

1. The river Otter is a celebrated trout stream, and a salmon river during the winter months for breeding purposes only.

3. The river Otter is, I believe, the earliest river in the county. Salmon ascend as early as October for spawning purposes. They are mostly "at hill" from the middle of November to the 15th December.

4. The fish naturally from instinct descend before the 1st of February to the lower part of the stream, so far as the tide flows, about three miles from the sea at Ottermouth, near Budleigh Salterton.

5. No new mines or factories have been opened in 1868.

6. No part of the stream is known to be polluted.

14. The laws which apply to navigable salmon rivers, or partly navigable salmon rivers, do not apply to rivers frequented only by salmon for breeding purposes. Whether salmon bred in one stream frequent the other streams, or only return to the streams in which they are bred, is a matter of opinion. From the enormous quantity of salmon fry which descend from the river Otter, the first flood in February, they must go somewhere, for there is nothing to destroy them in the stream, and as none are now ever seen after April the 1st, or the summer months, as in large rivers.

AXE DISTRICT.

That eel racks should be removed by law at a fixed time of the year. Section 13 should be altered to compel millers to put gratings before their mill wheels, to prevent the descent of salmon into the wheel. That there are dams in some rivers, neither mill dams nor fishing mill dams, which the Act takes no notice of, and which prevent the ascent of fish, and over which power should be given by the Act to compel millers to raise the hatches that keep up the water for a certain time, either during the night or during a weekly close time. That the weekly close time for net fishing should be extended.

He thinks net fishing should close on 1st of August.

WHARFE AND DERWENT DISTRICTS.

Wharfe Derwent

1. Decreased considerably, owing to the very exceptional state of the weather and rivers during the fishing season of 1868. This deficiency, however, should not be considered as indicative of a decline in either the produce or value of the fisheries. That since the Act of 1861 came into operation the salmon have increased about 20 per cent. in the river Wharfe. In the year 1867, Lord Londsborough's fishery at Tadcaster yielded 3,272 lbs. of fish, each fish averaging 15 lbs.; but these were all taken below the weir, none taken above.

2. In the Wharfe district, 660; weight, 9,093 lbs. In the Derwent district, 707; weight, 8,860 lbs. All taken with the draft net. Only one rod licence was issued. The chief markets are Manchester, Leeds, and Hull.

3. In the month of November; and they are mostly "at hill" in the second week of December.

4. In the month of February; but the main harvest is in June, July, and August, increasing to the close of the fishing season. The grilse make their appearance in the month of June, and the kelts commence their descent in February, continuing until May and June. At Naburn lock, in a dry season, kelts are seen leaping 200 or 300 yards above the weir in considerable numbers. They appear afraid to go over, for fear of being trapped in the interstices of the rocks forming the apron of the weir, but if a little fresh shows in the river, they immediately descend and make their run for the sea.

5. None that we are aware of, except some flax steeping ponds made two or three years ago on the banks of a brook below Clifford, the refuse of which flows into the Wharfe, the evil of which is increasing.

6. The inspector of police has had his attention drawn to the above pollution, and whenever he observes the "beck" to be charged with any noxious matter, he is instructed to obtain a few pailfuls of water at the mouth where it is discharged into the "Wharfe" and to ascertain if it is poisonous, by immersing a few live fish therein, and afterwards report the result to the Board.

7. None; nor have any old weirs been altered. As a rule, millowners do shut down their hatches at nights, and at other times when the mills are not running.

8. None.

14. The importance of uniting the Wharfe and Derwent districts as quickly as possible; to urge the attention of the Legislature to the pollution of all our great rivers, navigable as well as non-navigable, which is increasing to such a frightful extent in populous places as to be extremely pernicious to the public health as well as destructive to fish.

15. On this subject we can add little to what we stated in our last year's report to be desirable, which we here recapitulate. That the public who fish in the tidal parts of the river, and the riparian owners who angle in the streams and upper waters, should have their ancient rights and privileges of catching migratory fish restored to them; taking, as we do, this view, we recommend that in any future legislation (which we are of opinion is imperatively demanded) compulsory powers should be given to fishery boards to enforce a free passage for migratory fish over or through all dams so as to ensure to the salmon a free and unimpeded access to the upper fresh waters, which are the natural spawning grounds of the fish.

That further powers should be given to the Special Commissioners to investigate the titles of all fixed engines, dams, and weirs that in any way facilitate the capture of fish or obstruct their passage, whether in contravention of any statute now in force or of those repealed by the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861. That they should be empowered to try the right or legality of any manufacturer discharging refuse or solid matter from manufactories or other works into a salmon river, or tributary of a salmon river, so as to poison or injure the fish therein.

That gratings should be provided by owners and occupiers of mills at the head and tail races of all mill leats.

That fishing of all kinds (except angling) within 100 yards above or below any dam should be prohibited, whether with or without a pass, and a penalty should be imposed for disturbing fish there. That all fish caught during fence time should be deemed "unseasonable," and all kelts caught in the open time to be "unclean."

That justices should be empowered to grant warrants to search suspected boats or vessels in salmon rivers and estuaries as well as premises, and that any person offering any obstruction to an authorized search be liable to a penalty.

That having salmon in possession during close time shall be deemed an offence without the necessity of proof that it is for sale.

That in salmon fishery districts all kinds of fishing for salmonidæ should be placed under the control of Boards of Conservators.

That nets of whatever description should be registered and pay a licence duty, and should not be used during weekly close time.

That all fishing vessels and boats employed in salmon fishing upon any river or estuary should be numbered with conspicuous figures painted on their bows.

That Clause 20 in the Salmon Fishery Act, 1865, should be amended so as to give power for two or more fishery districts being merged into one. This is a great defect in the clause. That millers and mill owners should be compelled to allow their surplus water to run through or over any fish pass attached to their weirs. Penalty for refusal or neglect.

Tees.

1. The take has considerably increased during the last few years. During the past year the take increased below Dinsdale Dam, but above the dam there was a very considerable decrease. The cause of diminution above the dam during the past year may be attributed in a great measure to the long continued drought in consequence of which no fish could pass over the dam.

2. There is no authentic record of the number of fish caught in the district either with the net or with the rod. Fish caught with the net are either consumed in the home market, or forwarded to Leeds and other places in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Fish caught with the rod are for the most part consumed in the locality.

3. They have been known to commence to spawn as early as November, but the principal time is during the months of December and January. They are most "at hill" during the month of January.

4. Clean fish have occasionally been taken in February, but the Dinsdale Dam occasions so great an impediment that fish have to wait there for the flood and frequently lose their condition. The main harvest is taken during the months of June, July, and August, when the summer cocks (grilse) run. The kelts are generally well out of the river by the end of May.

5. No new mines or factories have been opened during 1868, but there has been an increased discharge of water from the lead and copper mines at Merrybent, into the Clowbeck, a tributary of the river Tees.

6. Colonel Scurfield, one of the conservators has had some correspondence with the Rivers Pollution Commissioners with respect to the discharge of the sewerage at Darlington into the river Tees and to pollutions from the Black Bank Chemical Works upon the river Skerne. The Commissioners have promised to visit the district shortly, but beyond this no steps have been taken.

14. The Tees Fishery Board desire to draw the attention of the inspectors to the absolute necessity which exists for improved legislation on the subject of salmon fisheries, and with this view they would respectfully suggest that the operation of the Acts of 1861 and 1865 should be inquired into by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, or in such other way as appears likely to prove most efficacious.

15. The following amongst other defects or deficiencies require amendment :—

(A.) Boards of Conservators should have power to make byelaws with the sanction of the Home Office, or some other central controlling authority.

(B.) The close time should embrace the whole of Saturday and Sunday for net fishing, and the annual close time should commence on the 15th of February, and expire on the 15th of September.

(C.) Increased powers should be given to the Special Commissioners as to the removal or alteration of illegal dams or other obstructions.

(D.) Power should be given to Boards of Conservators to purchase compulsorily, if deemed necessary, dams, fixed engines, and any other obstruction or impediment to the improvement of the fisheries. It is suggested that powers similar to those given by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act should be conferred upon Boards of Conservators.

(E.) Boards of Conservators should have power to establish and maintain artificial breeding ponds, and, with the consent of the owners, to purchase or lease lands for the purpose.

(F.) Extended powers should be conferred upon conservators and water bailiffs to enter land in the discharge of their duties, and for this purpose the power contained in Sections 30 and 31 of the Act of 1865 should be enlarged and extended.

TYNE DISTRICT.

Tyne.

1. Diminished in the river itself. It is alleged that the diminution is attributed to the use of nets with large meshes at sea, and in the estuary, whereby salmon of a large size and in all conditions are strangled and killed in the net.

2. No. There are no statistical returns nor any means of enforcing them. The quantity of salmon caught at the mouth of the river was enormous. Illegal means of catching salmon were contrived to such an alarming extent as to make it necessary for the Board to ask for officers and men in H.M. Navy to assist the water bailiffs and police constables in their attempts to put a stop to the illegal fishing for salmon. Methods of using nets for the capture of salmon so as to evade the law were resorted to, and with such ingenuity, that in some cases the persons placing or using such nets eluded detection, though many miles of nets illegally placed were captured by the officers of the board with the help of the crew of H. M. Gunboat "The Surly." Sec. 11 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109. is not sufficiently comprehensive to meet the various modes from time to time devised to take salmon.

3. In November in this year. In December. Such has been the destruction at the mouth of the river, coupled with the drought which prevailed during the summer, that on the spawning beds this year it is believed that there is not one spawning fish to 50 last year.

4. See reply to No. 2.

5. We have no information of any. Probably new factories have been built in the neighbourhood of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

13. Ten general licences were issued, and produced 115*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*

14. The obstructions at Warden Paper Mill Dam and Woodburn Mill Dam still exist.

15. Some of these are provided for in the bill now before the Houses of Parliament introduced by this board. There are many which can only be amended by a Public Act. The principal are the absence of power on the part of the boards to make byelaws; to raise funds by way of rate on the rights of fishing for salmon within the district; to apprehend offenders detected in the act of breaking the Salmon Fishery Laws; and generally to act with effect against new methods of illegally capturing salmon.

On the 7th December 1868, the board prosecuted a charge under the 17th sec. of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, for attempting to catch salmon in the close season in the estuary of the Tyne. The evidence for the prosecution proved that the defendants were using a net in a place frequented by salmon, and in the manner in which salmon nets are usually used. That the wings or leaders of the net used were such as are usual in white fish nets, but that the bag of the net by which the fish caught are landed was an ordinary salmon net, and that the usual mode of fishing for white fish at that place, and in that season, was by line, hook, and bait, and not by net. These facts were considered sufficient to raise the presumption that the defendants were attempting to catch salmon.

For the defendants evidence was produced that the place where they were fishing was frequented by white fish as well as salmon; that the wings of the net were not of sufficient strength to hold a salmon if caught, and that though the usual mode of fishing for white fish was with line, hook, and bait, yet a net was more certain, and consequently if a fisherman could afford to buy a net he used one. The bench thought the evidence of the board raised a strong suspicion, but went no further, and dismissed the case. It is scarcely possible to conceive a stronger case of "an attempt" within the meaning of the section referred to. Therefore to meet such cases the board should have power to make a byelaw to regulate the use of nets in the estuary of the Tyne in close season.

COQUET DISTRICT.

Coquet.

1. Few salmon in the river, few having been seen in the river until this year. The take of bull trout has increased for the last four or five years, especially in 1868.

Cause.—Protecting the river, and removing obstructions between the sea and adjoining beds. In 1868 the great increase of take was caused by the extension of the open season from 1st September to 31st December.

2. Sixteen thousand three hundred and two bull trout were taken with nets during the last season, three-fourths of which were captured after 31st August. Cannot state how many were taken with nets in sea. There is no doubt a great many were taken with hang nets. Have no means of knowing what number was taken with rod.

3. Few salmon in the river. Bull trout the last week in October, and mostly at "hill" in December. Several salmon and grilse were taken in the fishing weir at Warkworth after the 1st October, and put back into the stream above the weir. Up to the present time it seems doubtful whether any salmon have reached the upper water to spawn, though several thousands have been hatched artificially and turned into the stream for the last three years.

4. Only one salmon was taken last year during open season and returned to river. A few bull trout in May, and the main quantities in autumn (grilse answered in No. 3). Spawned kelts out of the river about the first week in May.

5. None.

6. None.

7. No new weirs have been built in 1868. The mill owners at Acklington and Felton put down their hatches so as to allow the water to run over the weir at night and on Sundays.

8. A new ladder was built at Warkworth in 1868, which has proved very efficacious.

9. Passes have been erected at Acklington and Felton, and have to a great extent been successful.

10. A wheel grating was put up at the tail race of Felton mill, and which proved very efficacious.

14. Powers should be given to conservators to destroy bull trout, with the sanction of the Secretary of State at all times.

15. Amendments to the Salmon Fishery Acts are required to enable Boards of conservators to make byelaws regulating the length of net, size of mesh, and for raising money by a rate, and for acting with greater effect against new methods of illegally taking salmon. A copy of a petition to Parliament has been adopted by this Board, advocating public legislation to amend the Salmon Fishery Acts, 1861 and 1865, and for the improvement of salmon fisheries, and the protection and increase of their produce, and is sent herewith for the information of the Commissioners.
